Google

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. REG. v. AVES; REG. v. THE SAME.

Summary conviction—Plea of guilty by an attorney in the absence of the defendant—Want of authority.

The defendant, residing in London, was summoned before justices at Hastings to answer to two informations for maliciously injuring a window and maliciously injuring a bell-pull. Being unable from illness to attend, he admitted to his father that he had broken the window, but had not done it intentionally, and that there ought to be compensation. The father thereupon went to Hastings and communicated with an attorney there, who, under all the circumstances, recommended that he should appear and plead guilty. Accordingly on the day of hearing the attorney pleaded guilty, and the justices thereupon convicted the defendant and sentenced him to a term of imprisonment. From the affidavits it appeared that the defendant had given neither to his father nor to the attorney any authority whatever to plead guilty, nor did it appear that he was aware that his father intended to employ an attorney:

Held, that as the defendant had not authorised any attorney to appear and plead guilty, the conviction was bad.

Quære, whether it is competent to justices to convict upon a plea of guilty by an attorney in the absence of the defendant?

THESE were two rules to quash two convictions which had been returned upon writs of certiorari.

It appeared that on the 31st Dec. 1869 an information was laid against the defendant before a justice of the borough of Hastings, for malicious injury to a window, the property of Dr. Blundell, to the amount of 15*s.*; and that on the 4th Jan. following, another information was laid against him for malicious injury to a bell-pull, the property of Ellen Wynne, to the amount of 4*s.* The summons issued upon the first information was served personally upon the defendant on the 1st Jan. 1870, at 114, Leadenhall-street, London, which summons was returnable on the 6th of the same month at the Town-hall, Hastings, and upon being so served he said, "I admit all that is in this summons except the word 'wilfully;' can't you take 5*l.* and settle it?" He was then informed by the officer who served him that there would probably be another summons issued against him for another offence, and inquired if in that event he would consent to such summons being sent to him in London by post, so as to save the expense of a constable going to London on purpose to serve him with it? To which he consented, telling the officer to send it to him at that place. Accordingly, on the 4th Jan., such second summons was sent by post, addressed to the defendant at 114, Leadenhall-street, London, returnable upon the 6th of the same month. Upon the return day of the summonses (according to the affidavit of the clerk to the justices), and upon the cases being called on, Mr. Wm. Savery, of St. Leonards, an attorney, appeared on behalf of the defendant, and on the information being read over, he stated that the defendant was unable to attend by reason of a serious illness; that he had a medical certificate which the defendant's father, who was present, could prove, and that his son, the defendant, was unable to travel, but that he, the said William Savery, was instructed to and would, on behalf of the said Charles Aves, plead guilty to both charges, and he expressed a hope that the justices would not require his personal attendance; that after some discussion the justices determined to proceed; that the said William Savery, in the name and on behalf of the said Charles Aves and as his attorney, and also in the presence of the person whom he represented as the father of the said defendant, then formally pleaded "guilty" to both charges without any objection on the part of the said father; that a short statement of the facts having been made to the bench by the superintendent of police, Mr. Savery addressed the bench in mitigation of punishment, and ultimately the bench convicted the defendant upon both informations, and directed him to be imprisoned in the house of correction at Lewes for fourteen days in respect of the conviction for damaging the bell-pull, and passed a like sentence of seven days for damaging the window, to commence at the expiration of the former sentence.

The rules in the present case were obtained upon the affidavits of Mr. Savery, Mr. Edward Leopold Aves, and the defendant. Mr. Savery stated that he was instructed on the 5th Jan. 1870 by Mr. Edward Leopold Aves, the father of the defendant, without any communication, direct or indirect, otherwise than by the said father, in consequence of the ill health of the accused, whom he had never seen, and considering it a matter in which a fine would have been imposed, and also the age of the accused, and being the first offence, he advised that a plea of guilty should be pleaded, to which the said father assented; that he accordingly pleaded guilty to the said charges; that when the case was called on no evidence was given in support of the complaints, and that if he had thought that imprisonment would have been inflicted, he would have applied for an adjournment of the hearing, so that the accused might have instructed him personally as to the real facts of the case. Mr. Edward Leopold Aves, the father of the defendant, stated that previous to instructing Mr. Savery he conferred with his son, a youth of nineteen years only, as to the charge made for breaking the window, and to the best of his belief he did not confer with him as to the other charge, and he was not aware that he was ever served with a summons for that complaint; that his son was then lying dangerously ill at his house in Greenwich, in Kent; that the result of such conversation was that compensation should be made, his son having admitted that he did the injury to the window, although he denied having done it maliciously or intentionally; that he accordingly proceeded to Hastings on the 5th Jan. 1870, his son continuing too ill safely to undergo so long a journey, and that in the evening he saw Mr. Savery, and that after some discussion Mr. Savery thought that, looking at the age of the lad, the period of the year, and the first offence, that a fine only would be imposed, advised a plea of guilty; that he acceded to his advice, and Mr. Savery pleaded guilty accordingly, but excepting as to be inferred from general conversation between a father and his child, he never had any authority to plead guilty, nor had he in consequence of the illness of his son that full opportunity of discussing his guilt or innocence that he otherwise should have had.

The defendant himself in his affidavit stated that only one summons was served upon him, or came to his knowledge, namely, that for the injury to the window; that he did not authorise Mr. Savery, or any other person, to appear or to plead on his behalf to that or any other summons, and that he never in any way communicated with the said Mr. Savery, and that he did not give anyone any authority to appear or plead for him to the said summons or information before the said magistrates; and further, that at the time of the hearing of the said complaint, and for some days previous, he was confined to his bed with fever, and too ill to give any authority or instructions on the subject, and did not in fact do so.

This application was made upon the three following grounds:—First, that upon a proper construction of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 13, justices may proceed ex parte in the absence of the defendant, or if he appears by counsel or attorney they may proceed to hear the case, but that they can have no authority to adjudicate upon a plea of guilty, unless pleaded by the defendant in person; secondly, that an infant cannot appoint or appear by an attorney; thirdly, that upon the facts as disclosed by the affidavits the defendant had given no authority to any attorney to appear and plead for him.

As the judgment of the court proceeded upon the third ground only it will be unnecessary to give the arguments upon the other two.

Thesiger appeared in support of the convictions. —The father would seem to have the authority from his son to act for him. He knew that his father was going to Hastings to do the best he could, and he does not say in express terms that he never authorised his father to act for him. The father and the attorney did the best they could, and, thinking that a plea of guilty would be advisable, it was pleaded accordingly.

Sir J. Karslake, Q.C., Woollett with him, appeared in support of the rule.—The affidavits of Mr. Savery, the father and the son, go clearly to show that there was no authority from the son to appear and plead guilty. Mr. Savery had had no communication whatever with the defendant, and all that the father says is, "I conferred with my son, a youth of the age of nineteen years only, as to the charge made for breaking the window. The result of such conversation was that compensation should be made to Dr. Blundell, my son having admitted that he did injury to the window of that gentleman by breaking the window, although he denied having done it maliciously or intentionally." And further on he says, "But I say, excepting as is to be inferred from general conversation between a father and his child, I never had any authority to plead guilty, nor had, in consequence of the illness of my son, that full opportunity of discussing his guilt or innocence that I otherwise should have had." The affidavit of the son is most explicit and conclusive upon the subject. [MELLOR, J.—It seems that the first idea of pleading guilty came from the attorney. BLACKBURN, J.—If there was any authority at all, it was given to the father to go down to Hastings and do the best he could.] The son was quite ignorant as to what had been resolved upon by his father and the attorney.

COCKBURN, C. J.—When we look at the facts of the case it becomes quite unnecessary for us to express any opinion upon the very important legal points that have been discussed. I am very far from saying that a defendant may not appear and plead by an attorney; but without giving any opinion upon the law upon the subject, we are of opinion that the father had no authority to appear and plead. All that appears is, that he had some conversation with his son as to the charge of breaking the window whilst the son was lying ill, the son telling his father, "True it is I broke the window, but not intentionally, and there must be compensation." The father thereupon goes down to Hastings with the intention of coming to a settlement. He sees an attorney, who, under the circumstances, advises that a plea of guilty should be pleaded; and so it is arranged. Then, considering that the son says that he did not break the window intentionally, it can hardly be inferred that he authorised his father to employ an attorney, still less to plead guilty to an offence which might subject him to imprisonment. I think, therefore, that the facts fail to show that the father had any authority to employ an attorney.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. There is no doubt that upon the defendant failing to appear the justices may have proceeded ex parte, and have convicted. But that they did not do, but they acted upon the plea of guilty without hearing the evidence. It is most likely that the defendant being very ill, and not able to go to Hastings, wished his father to go for him, and the father accordingly went down and did as he thought the best for him. The evidence, however, seems to show that the son gave the father no authority either to employ an attorney or to plead guilty.

MELLOR, J.—There is no doubt that the justices convicted upon the plea of guilty, and that there was no authority from the son for pleading in that way. The first idea of so pleading emanated from the attorney; the son himself denied that he did the act complained of maliciously. It would be very strange, under these circumstances, to infer that he really intended to plead guilty.

HANNEN, J.—I quite concur with the rest of the court.

Convictions quashed.

SECOND COURT.

Wednesday, Jan. 25, 1871.

(Before MELLOR and LUSH, JJ.)

LEWIS (app.) v. ARTHUR AND ANOTHER (resps.).

Salmon Fishery Act 1865, ss. 33, 36 — Licensed persons having the assistance of persons who are not licensed.

Under the provisions of the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 121, a licence may be granted to a person for the use of a net for catching salmon, and a penalty is imposed upon any person for using a net without such licence.

A. and B. had each a licence for the use of a net, and on a certain day they and the two respondents were together using two coracle nets, each of which required the assistance of two persons. A. and B. were using one net, and the two respondents, who had no licence, were using another. The justices (upon an information against the two respondents) found that no fraud was intended, and as one of the licencees would have conferred the right to the assistance of one of the respondents, and the two licences therefore would have protected all four of the parties, they dismissed the information:

Held, that they were right.

THIS was a case stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, upon a dismissal by justices at petty sessions of an information for an offence under the Salmon Fishery Act 1865, as follows:—

At a petty sessions of Her Majesty's justices of the peace of the county of Carmarthen, in and for the Carmarthen petty sessional division in the said county, the 30th July 1870, Henry Arthur and Evan Harris, fishermen, the respondents, were charged upon information laid by Thomas Lewis, water-bailiff, the appellant before us, the undersigned, four of Her Majesty's said justices, for having, on the 19th July 1870, at or near Cynastanog, in the parish of Llangunnor, in the said county of Carmarthen, unlawfully used a coracle net for catching salmon in the river Towy, within the Carmarthen Bay fishery district, without then and there having a proper licence for the same, contrary to sect. 36 of the Salmon Fishery Act 1865.

The respondents used together, it is admitted, a coracle net, which is a net that can only be used by or between two persons at the same time in coracles, and a licence of the value of 1*l.* 10*s.* is required to so use a coracle net in the said district. It appeared that there were fishing at the same time and place as respondents two other men, named Lewis and Evans, who each held a licence in his own name of the value of 1*l.* 10*s.* Thus Lewis and Evans had two licences, while the respondents had none, at least not in their own names at the time, but it was also proved that Evans's licence was obtained and paid for by Arthur, with whom he had been accustomed to fish, and it was admitted that had Arthur been fishing with him or Lewis, or had Harris been fishing with Evans or Lewis, that no offence had been committed contrary to the penal enactment in the section referred to, as the licences granted in the names of Lewis and Evans to use each a coracle net with a partner or assistant, would have respectively protected the partner or assistant from incurring any penalty.

Considering, therefore, that if Evans's licence had been granted to Arthur who obtained it, it would have exonerated Harris; that there were but two nets used; that there were two licences with two of the fishermen authorizing the use of coracle nets, and that there was in fact no fraud by the use of an extra net or otherwise, we dismissed the information against the respondents, who we held were legally assisting two licensed persons to use two coracle nets. Whereupon the said appellant being dissatisfied with our determination as erroneous in point of law, has duly applied to us in writing to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and grounds of such determination for the opinion thereon of Her Majesty's Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, which we hereby state and sign accordingly.

Given under our hands this 6th day of August 1870, at the Shire Hall, Carmarthen.

JAMES JOHN HAMILTON, Bart.
ISAAC HORTON.
ROBERT BARRETT.
E. M. DAVIES.

By the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 121, the Salmon Fishery Act 1865, sect. 33, a licence is to be granted in fishery districts to the person named therein in respect of all fishing weirs, fishing mill-dams, putts, putchers, nets, or other instruments or devices, except rods and lines, whereby salmon are caught; and by the 36th section a penalty not exceeding 20*l.* is imposed upon any person for a violation of such section.

McIntyre appeared for the appellant. The licence is a personal one, and the name of the party is inserted in it. [LUSH, J.—He may have an assistant.] That is so, as it is necessary that there should be two persons in order to use the net. But although a licensed person may have the assistance of a non-licensed person to assist him with the net, he cannot authorise an unlicensed person to use a net. There must always be a licensed person with the net. [MELLOR, J.—There were four persons fishing with two nets, two of the persons having licences. The justices may have thought that there was a sufficient number of licences.] But it is not clear that they were all acting in concert. [LUSH, J.—The finding of the justices must be taken to establish that they were so acting. Certainly we cannot say that there was no evidence of the fact. Two licensed men take hold of one net, and two unlicensed men take hold of another instead of one licensed and one unlicensed man to each net. [MELLOR, J.—The justices really so state it in their finding.] They find it, as a conclusion of law, as legally assisting. [MELLOR, J.—They could not have been legally assisting unless they were actually together.] They were not shown to have been in partnership.

No one appeared for the respondents.

MELLOR, J.—There really is nothing to negative the conclusion to which the justices have come. They thought that all were acting in the same enterprise, and they negative fraud.

LUSH, J., concurred.

Judgment for the respondents.

WATTS (app.), v. LUCAS (resp.)

Salmon Fisheries Acts—24 & 25 Vict. c. 109—28 & 29 Vict. c. 121 — Fixed engine—Engine not intended to catch salmon.

The using of a net which is of itself bonâ fide not an instrument used peculiarly for catching salmon, and which is not fixed for the purpose, but which is fixed to the soil in tidal waters within the limits of a salmon fishery district, does not come within the penalty of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 109, s. 11. Lyne v. Leonard, L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 156; 18 L. T. Rep, N. S. 55; 16 W. R. 562, distinguished.

THIS was a case stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, upon a refusal by justices to convict. The case stated that at a petty sessions holden at Wareham, in the county of Dorset, an information preferred by Charles Dawswell Watts, of Holme Bridge, in the county of Dorset, water bailiff of the river Frome salmon fishery district (hereinafter called the appellant), against William Lucas, of Stoborough, in the county of Dorset, labourer (hereinafter called the respondent), under sect. 11 of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 109, intituled An Act to amend the Laws relating to Fisheries of Salmon in England, charging "for that he, the said William Lucas, on the 25th July last, at the parish of Arne in the said county, was then the owner of certain fixed engines, to wit, two nets, which were then unlawfully placed for catching salmon and fish in certain water there, called the estuary of the river Frome, and the same engines were so placed for several hours, contrary to the statute in such case made and provided," was heard and determined by us, the said justices, the said parties respectively being then present, and upon such hearing we dismissed the information.

Upon the hearing of the information it was admitted by the respondent that he fixed into the mud with poles two nets, one four feet deep and forty-six feet long, the other two feet deep and thirty-six feet long, with meshes of about one and a half and one inch, one net being placed higher up the stream than the other, and that the place was within the tidal waters, as stated in the information. But it was alleged by the respondent that the nets were so placed for the purpose of catching mullet and other fish not of the genus salmon; and no evidence of a contrary character was tendered by the appellant. It was contended by the attorney for the appellant, that the mere fixing of any description of net in a fishing district was of itself illegal, and that the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 121, s. 39, enacting, "fixed engines shall in this Act and the Salmon Fishery Act 1861 include any net or other implement for taking fish fixed to the soil," was made to amend the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 109, by using the word "fish" instead of salmon, and the case of Lyne v. Leonard, (16 W. R. 562; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 55), was quoted. The magistrates decided that if the instrument used had been one of those named in the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 121, s. 36, as requiring a licence, as a putt, putcher net, or other instrument or device for catching salmon, it would have been clearly illegal to use it without a licence, though there may be no further proof of intention to catch a salmon; but that if the fixed engine be bonâ fide not an instrument peculiarly meant for catching salmon, in order to bring its use within the operation of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 109, there must be some sort of evidence that the fixed engine (such as the net now in question) was placed for the purpose of catching salmon.

The question of law upon the above facts is, whether the using of a net, which is of itself bonâ fide not an instrument used peculiarly for catching salmon, and which is not fixed for that purpose, but which is fixed to the soil in tidal waters within the limits of a salmon fishery district, comes within the operation of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 109, s. 11.

By the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 109, s. 11, it is enacted that—

> No fixed engine of any description shall be placed or used for catching salmon in any inland or tidal waters; and any engine placed or used in contravention of this section may be taken possession of or destroyed; and any engine so placed or used, and any salmon taken by such engine shall be forfeited, and in addition thereto the owner of any engine placed or used in contravention of this section shall for each day of so placing or using the same incur a penalty not exceeding 10*l.*; and for the purposes of this section a net that is secured by anchors or otherwise temporarily fixed to the soil shall be deemed to be a fixed engine; but this section shall not affect any ancient right or mode of fishing as practised at the time of the passing of this Act by any person by virtue of any grant or charter or immemorial usage: Provided always, that nothing in this section contained shall be deemed to apply to fishing weirs or fishing mill dams.

By the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 121, s. 36, it is enacted that—

> From and after a time to be appointed as aforesaid, in a fishery district, any person using within that district any fishing weir, fishing mill dam, putt, putcher, net, or other instrument or device, not being a rod and line, for catching salmon, without having a proper licence for the same, shall be liable to a penalty of not less than double the amount to be paid for the requisite licence, and not exceeding 20*l.*

The 39th section enacts that—

> Fixed engine shall in this Act and the Salmon Fishery Act 1861, include any net or other implement for taking fish fixed to the soil, or made stationary in any other way, not being a fishing weir or fishing mill dam.

Pinder appeared for the appellant.—The justices were wrong in declining to convict, for the respondent came within the meaning of the 11th section of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 109 and sect. 39 of the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 121, as using a net, which is a fixed engine. [LUSH, J.—You must take the whole of the interpretation in the 11th section of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 109, "no fixed engine of any description shall be placed or used for catching salmon." This net was not used for that purpose.] The 36th section of the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 121 is general in its application, and the 39th section makes a net a "fixed engine." [MELLOR, J.—That only defines what is a "fixed engine." LUSH, J.—The offence consists in the purpose for which the net is used.] The decision in Lyne v. Leonard (L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 156; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 55; 16 W. R. 562) is in point. There it was held that the bare use of instruments and devices for catching salmon, enumerated in sect. 36, is sufficient to render an unlicensed person using them liable to the penalty, without evidence that they were used for the purpose of taking salmon. [MELLOR, J.—We must take it from the finding of the justices, that the net was not intended to catch salmon.] Then it must be taken not to be within the 11th section. [MELLOR, J.—We must not read it as prohibiting the use of all nets, but merely those which are intended to catch salmon. The 39th section of the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 121, does not enlarge the offence, but the articles whereby it may be committed.] The net was capable of catching salmon, and is within the mischief of the statute.

No counsel appeared for the respondent.

MELLOR, J.—Although I have entertained some doubt upon the case, upon the whole I have come to the conclusion that upon the facts the justices came to the right conclusion. The offence is created by the 11th section of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 109, which enacts that no fixed engine of any description shall be placed or used for catching salmon. Then we have the 36th section of the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 121, which enacts that from and after a time to be appointed any person using within a fishing district any net, &c., for catching salmon, without having a licence is to be liable to a penalty; and then the 39th section further defines the meaning of a "fixed engine." Now I do not think that this latter enactment was intended to alter the character of the offence, but only to put an end to any doubt as to what was to be considered to be a "fixed engine." We must, I think, regard the words "for catching salmon." This case is distinguishable from the one cited, for there the instrument was really calculated to catch salmon, though made to act otherwise. The case is somewhat imperfectly stated, but I think the justices were right.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the case of Lyne v. Leonard is distinguishable from the present one. The 33rd section of the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 121 provides for the granting of licences; then the 36th section provides the penalty for using a net without a licence. In the case cited, the defendant put down seventy putts, but alleged they were for shrimps and flat fish only. He alleged that he had placed some circles of wire in them to prevent salmon from passing into them, and which he could put in at any moment. The justices in that case refused to convict, because they thought that he did not intend to catch salmon. This court, however, said that such evidence was not necessary. I take it that in the present case the justices have found that the net in question was not such a net as is within the 39th section—that it is not such a one as requires a licence. This, not being a net for the purpose, but capable of taking salmon, the question is, were the justices right? That brings us to the 36th section of the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 121. The offence there consists in the purpose for which the net is used. Now I think we must read this section with the 39th. The offence itself is left as it was before. If the Legislature had intended to have excluded all nets which might be capable of catching salmon, they would so have expressed themselves. I think, therefore, that, according to their finding of the facts, the justices were right in their decision.

THE WEST LONDON EXTENSION RAILWAY COMPANY (apps.) v. THE ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF THE FULHAM UNION AND THE OVERSEERS OF THE POOR OF THE PARISH OF FULHAM (resps.)

Order of reference—12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 13 (Baines's Act)—Award—Costs.

An appeal against a poor rate having been entered and respited, the sessions ordered, with the consent of the parties, that "the matter in dispute" should be referred to the Queen's Counsel named to inquire into and arbitrate thereon.

Pending the award, the "hearing and determining the appeal" was formally adjourned from sessions to sessions. The arbitrator awarded that "the appeal be dismissed and that the appellants do pay to the respondents their costs of the said appeal." The Court of Queen's Bench on a motion of the appellants granted a rule directing the arbitrator to strike out the part of his award relating to costs, on the ground that the order of reference conferred no power upon him to give them. An application to the sessions to order the payment of the respondents' costs was refused, and a rule having been obtained for a mandamus commanding the sessions to give such costs as they might think fit:

Held, that the reference was in fact ordered under Baines's Act (12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 13), that the sessions, having parted with their jurisdiction to the arbitrator, had no power to add to or alter his award, but that their judicial functions were at an end, and they had merely the ministerial duty to perform of entering the amended award as their judgment.

Reg. v. The Justices of the West Riding of Yorkshire, 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 380, followed.

AN appeal, entered at the Middlesex Quarter Sessions, by the West London Extension Railway Company, against a rate for the relief of the poor of the parish of Fulham, was respited from time to time until the 20th Feb. 1869, when the sessions made an order, the material part of which was as follows:

It is . . . . ordered that the hearing and determining the matter of an appeal between the . . . . appellants, and respondents, touching a certain rate or assessment made on the 1st May 1868 . . . . do stand further adjourned until the next general quarter sessions of the peace, to be holden . . . . on Monday the 5th April next. And it is further ordered by and with the consent of counsel on both sides, that the matter in dispute between the appellants and respondents herein shall be referred to John Gray, Esq., ... one of Her Majesty's counsel learned in the law, to inquire into and arbitrate thereon, the said several parties agreeing and consenting to abide the report of such his arbitration. . . . . And it is further ordered that notice in the mean time be given unto the assessment committee of the Fulham Union and the churchwardens and overseers of the poor of the parish of Fulham, that they, and all persons concerned do attend the court at the . . . . Guildhall, Westminster, on Friday, the 30th April next, at the hour of ten in the forenoon of the same day, to hear and abide the judgment and determination of the said court touching the said appeal.

The "hearing and determining the matter of the appeal" was adjourned from sessions to sessions by successive formal orders, and on the 28th Jan. 1870, the arbitrator made his award, which contained the usual recitals and concluded thus: "Now I do make my award of and concerning the premises as follows:—I do award and order that the said appeal be dismissed, and that the appellants do pay to the respondents their costs of the said appeal, to be taxed by the proper officer of the court of quarter sessions in the usual manner. In witness," &c.

This award was sent back to the arbitrator by the Court of Queen's Bench, to be amended, on the ground that the sessions had not given him authority to award costs in their order of reference: (The West London Extension Railway Company v. The Assessment Commitee of the Fulham Union, &c., 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 523; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 361.) The amendment was made accordingly by striking out so much of the award as gave costs. After further regular adjournments of the appeal, an application was made on the 14th May by the respondents to the sessions, to adopt the award, and that as the appellants had entirely failed in their appeal the court would, in accordance with its invariable rule and practice, order the payment of the respondents' costs of the said appeal to be made by the appellants. The question as to costs having been argued by counsel on both sides, the sessions, after another adjournment, decided that their remaining duty was ministerial only, ordered that the award should be enrolled as the judgment of the court, and refused the application on the part of the respondents as to the costs of the appeal.

A rule was afterwards obtained calling on the justices to show cause why a mandamus should not issue, commanding them to enter continuances upon the said appeal, and at the next general quarter sessions to proceed to consider, award, and order such costs, as by the justices in their discretion should be thought reasonable, to be paid by the appellants to the respondents.

Against this rule,

Field, Q.C., Poland with him, showed cause.—The case was undoubtedly referred under Baines's Act: (12 & 13 Vict. c. 45 (a.) Before that enactment there was no power to refer: (Thorp v. Cole 2 C. M. & R. 367.) It was deemed to be a reference under Baines's Act when the former rule was argued in this court: (The West London Extension Railway Company v. The Assessment Committee of the Fulham Union (sup.) It is, however, now suggested by the respondents, that the award of the arbitrator was but a report. Yet they applied to the sessions to enrol "the award." Moreover the appellants made the order of sessions a rule of court under sect. 13 of the above Act, and no objection was made. Next a rule nisi was obtained to strike out such part of the award as related to costs, and this court made the rule absolute, on the ground that power had not been given to the arbitrator to award them. The court then called on Huddleston, Q. C., and Castle, in support of the rule.—There were successive adjournments, the quarter sessions continuing seised of the appeal. If this had been a reference under sect. 13 of Baines's Act alone there would have been no necessity to adjourn, for it has been held that from the time when a reference under that section is ordered the court of quarter sessions has only a ministerial duty to enter the judgment: (Reg. v. The Justices of the West Riding of Yorkshire, 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 380; 6 B. & S. 531.) When the matter was referred to Mr. Gray, it might have been referred under the old system. [BLACKBURN, J.—But you cannot construe this order as a conventional agreement such as you allude to.] In Rex v. Harding (2 Salk. 477), the court held that "a judge of Nisi Prius, by consent of parties, may make a rule to refer a cause, but the sessions cannot do so though by consent. They may refer a thing to another to examine, and make report to them for their determination, but cannot refer a thing to be determined by the other," and the same proposition is laid down in Nolan's Poor Law (4th edit., vol. 2, p. 547). Now here they adjourned the appeal, and referred "the matter in dispute," the parties agreeing to "abide the report," the very words used in Rex v. Harding (sup.). [BLACKBURN, J.—If the question referred had been one of figures only they might have referred it to an accountant, but they refer it as a matter of law to "John Gray, Esq. . . . . one of Her Majesty's counsel learned in the law."] It may be that the sessions thought it convenient that a legal arbitrator should apply the law to the facts, and report thereon, but kept their jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the appeal. [MELLOR, J. But the arbitrator orders the appeal "to be dismissed."] There may have been an omission of the sessions to insert a power as to costs in the order; but they can now remedy the hardship resulting therefrom by giving costs. They had a power to deal with the report when it came back to them. The award was made by the arbitrator, then at the next sessions counsel for the appellants applied to the court to "adopt the report," and the court "further adjourned the appeal to the next quarter sessions, and ordered that the parties should attend to hear and abide by the judgment and determination of the said court touching the said appeal." In Reg. v. The Justices of the West Riding of Yorkshire (sup.), Cockburn, C.J., says: "I do not agree with the respondents' counsel that the court of quarter sessions may respite the appeal from sessions to sessions, and then take into consideration the matters already referred to arbitration, and affirm and annul such part as they think right. There is no provision of that sort; the award or umpirage having been made at the next sessions, or next but one, the court is to be moved not to make any order respecting it, but to enter it as the judgment of the court of quarter sessions before whom the appeal came on to be determined." Where the sessions retain their jurisdiction to hear and determine the matter, as they have done in this instance, they have power when the report comes back to deal with it. Suppose they had said in express terms, "We do not intend this to be a reference under Baines's Act?" If they have not reserved jurisdiction over the appeal, they have reserved it over the question of costs by respiting from time to time. In Reg. v. The Justices of the West Riding of Yorkshire (sup.), "the appeal" was referred; but here only "the matter in dispute," and there is a distinction. Nor in this case are the sessions asked to exercise any discretion or to do more than to make the usual order according to their practice, that the costs shall follow the event.

BLACKBURN, J.—I think it is quite clear that this rule must be discharged. The moment it is understood what the order of quarter sessions really was, the case is plain. Now before Baines' Act the quarter sessions had no power to refer a matter at all. They might, by agreement, say that some question of fact, or even of law, might be referred to an individual who should report to them, and whose judgment they would take as their own, they making their award accordingly. But they could make no reference, and therefore the arbitrator could not be brought before this court for what he did. The whole matter must have been done privately. Then Baines' Act (12 & 13 Vict. c. 45) by sect. 13 enacts, that the court of quarter sessions may make an order with the consent of the parties that the matter of an appeal "be referred to" any arbitrator, and the award of the arbitrator . . . may on motion by either party at the sessions next or next, but one after such award . . . shall have been finally made and published, or after the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench on any motion for setting aside the same be entered as the judgment of the court of general or quarter sessions in the appeal, and shall be as binding and effectual to all intents as if given by the said court." Nothing can be clearer when one reads that section, even without reference to cases, although Reg. v. The Justices of the West Riding of Yorkshire (sup.), and the former decision of the court in the present appeal, are both express authorities on the point, that where there is a reference of this kind it may be brought before the Queen's Bench but after it has been altered all the quarter sessions have to do is to enter it, and they cannot vary it. Taking it that the quarter sessions did make the order whereby they said they adjourned this matter to a future day—that might have been necessary, but would do no hurt—and then they proceed, and it is further ordered ". . . that the matter in dispute . . . shall be referred to John Gray, Esq. . . . to inquire into and arbitrate thereon, the said several parties agreeing and consenting to abide the report of such his arbitration." That one word "report" formed the basis of an argument which Mr. Huddleston endeavoured to urge upon us. It seems to me that is not sufficient, and that the quarter sessions intended to refer the whole matter to Mr. Gray, and thereby parted with their jurisdiction.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I am satisfied that all parties considered it an absolute reference by the quarter sessions to Mr. Gray, and it is only because he had assumed power over costs which their order did not give him, that they have changed their decision. Now I think Reg. v. The Justices of West Riding of Yorkshire (sup.), the case used for the respondents, is a dscided authority against their argument. In it Cockburn, C.J. says: "Here the original order gave no power to any subsequent court as to costs; and under sect. 13 it can do no more than enter on record the award or umpirage. Therefore, on the true construction of this section, the court of quarter sessions which made the original order is functus officio as to these costs, and no subsequent court has authority to deal with them." Now that seems to me directly in point and conclusive. I think, therefore, the rule should be discharged.

LUSH, J.—No one can doubt the intention of the parties that this should be a reference under Baines's Act; indeed, if it were not so, the court would have had no power to do what they did when the case was before them. It was conceded on both sides that it was a reference under the Act. That being so, I am clearly of opinion that the quarter sessions had no power to add to or alter the award; so soon as they made the order of reference under the Act their judicial functions were at an end, and the duty only remained of entering the award when made. The case of Reg. v. The Justices of West Riding of Yorkshire (sup.) is directly against the respondents' argument. There the quarter sessions had referred a question of law in a rating case to this court, the parties agreeing that on our judgment being given the question of fact should be referred to an arbitrator; therefore, the judgment on the law was that of the quarter sessions. The arbitrator on the facts had made his award, and the court of quarter sessions confirmed his award, with costs to the respondents. On taxation of costs the clerk of the peace refused to allow so much of the costs as related to the reference, on the grounds that the sessions had no power to give them; and the Court of Queen's Bench held that he was right in so doing. That was the only point decided and is expressly against this application.

Rule discharged.

Metropolis Local Management Acts Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), s. 75—General line of buildings—Line fixed by architect—Powers of magistrate.

Under sect. 75 of the Metropolis Local Management Acts Amendment Act 1862, it is a necessary preliminary to the jurisdiction of the magistrate that the superintending architect of the Metropolitan Board of Works for the time being should have fixed the general line of buildings for the street in which the person against whom proceedings are taken under the section is alleged to have built beyond the general line; but the magistrate, before convicting such person under the section, is bound to receive evidence as to what is the general line of buildings, and to decide for himself whether the general line as fixed by the architect is the true general line.

ON appeal from a metropolitan police magistrate, the following case was stated:

2. On the 21st Oct. 1869, complaint was made before me as one of the police magistrates for the metropolis, sitting at the police court of Marlborough-street, in the county of Middlesex, within the metropolitan police district, by the respondent, on behalf of the vestry of the parish of St. George's, Hanover-square, for that the said appellant, on the 10th Aug. 1869, in the said parish and county, and within the said district, did unlawfully erect a certain erection, to wit a bay-window, without the consent in writing of the Metropolitan Board of Works, beyond the general line of buildings, in a certain street, called Stratton-street, in the said parish, county, and district, the distance of such line of buildings not exceeding 50ft. from the highway, contrary to the statute in such case made and provided, and a summons was thereupon issued by me requiring the appellant to appear on the Thursday then next, at two o'clock in the afternoon, at the police court, before me or such other magistrate of the said police court as might be then there, to answer to the said complaint.

3. On the 28th Oct. 1869, being the day so fixed as aforesaid, and at the time in the said summons mentioned, the respondent and appellant appeared before me respectively at the said police court, to support an answer to the said complaint.

4. It was proved before me, and I find as follows:—That the appellant carried on the business of a builder at No. 241, Tottenham-court-road, and that he did on the said 10th Aug. 1869, on certain premises situate on the west side of Stratton-street aforesaid, in the said parish and county, within the said district, erect a bay-window without the consent in writing of the Metropolitan Board of Works, such consent having been applied for by the appellant and refused; secondly, that George Vulliamy, who was the superintending architect to the Metropolitan Board of Works, as such superintending architect, had pursuant to the Metropolitan Management Amendment Act 1862, by his certificate, bearing date the 5th Oct. 1869, decided the general line of buildings on the west side of Stratton-street aforesaid; thirdly, that the distance of the general line of buildings so decided as aforesaid from the highway, did not exceed 50ft., and that the said bay window was beyond the said general line of buildings so decided as aforesaid; fourthly, that the appellant (who was not represented by counsel or attorney) gave no evidence as to the general line of buildings so decided as aforesaid, and I, considering myself bound by the decision in the case of Bauman v. The Vestry of St. Pancras (L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 528), to act on the superintending architect's certificate, decided accordingly against the appellant.

5. The appellant having subsequently applied to me under the stat. 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and grounds of such determination for the opinion of your Lordship's court, and having duly entered into such recognisance, and paid such fees as by the said statute in that behalf are required, I submit to your Lordships the question whether or not I was right in so determining such complaint on the decision of the superintending architect as to the general line of buildings.

6. If your Lordships should be of opinion in the negative then the case is to be remitted to me to decide the general line of buildings so decided as aforesaid; if your Lordships should be of opinion in the affirmative, then my determination is to stand, and the case is to be remitted to me to make such orders as by the statute in that behalf are required to be made.

The following were the appellant's points of argument: First, that the magistrate was not bound by the decision of the superintending architect as to the general line of buildings; secondly, that the magistrate was bound to judge for himself as to the true general line of buildings.

The following were the respondent's points: The respondent will contend that the certificate of the superintending architect as to the general line of buildings being valid in form, and no evidence being given to show that such certified line was not the true line, the magistrate was bound by such certificate, at all events that he was right under the circumstances in acting on it.

Field, Q.C. (A. Thesiger with him), for the appellant.—The question here turns on the construction of sect. 75 of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, and the case raises the question whether the architect of the Board of Works has power to fix the general line of buildings, so as to be binding on all persons living in a street, or whether the magistrate, when the case comes before him under the section, has power to hear evidence on the subject, and disregard the line fixed by the architect, if it appear to him not to be the general line. The case of St. George's, Hanover-square v. Sparrow (10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 504; 16 C. B., N. S., 209; 33 L. J. 118, M. C.), is an authority directly in favour of the appellants; but the case of Bauman v. The Vestry of St. Pancras (36 L. J. 127, M. C.; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 528), which has since been decided in the Court of Queen's Bench, was supposed by the magistrate to have overruled St. George's, Hanover-square v. Sparrow, and to oblige him to consider the line as fixed by the architect final and conclusive. The comments made by the court of Queen's Bench in Bauman's case on the judgment of this court in Sparrow's case certainly tend to discredit the latter; but it was not necessary for the decision of the former case to decide the point raised in the latter, nor is the actual decision in Bauman's case necessarily conflicting with that in Sparrow's case. [BOVILL, C. J. The learned judges in the Court of Queen's Bench are reported to have said that we overlooked the fact that it is the line fixed by the architect that gives the magistrates jurisdiction; that, however, is not so, as appears especially from the report of the case in 16 C. B., N. S. pp. 216 and 218.] If the architect's certificate be final and conclusive, the magistrate has nothing to do but to measure the building to see whether it comes beyond it. Moreover, the line may be fixed at any time before the hearing before the magistrate (Bauman v. The Vestry of St. Pancras), and it is obviously unjust that a man, who has built before the line is fixed, should be liable to have his building pulled down without any appeal against the architect's decision. That could not have been the intention of the Legislature. [M. SMITH, J.—It is confessedly the decision of the architect that gives the magistrate jurisdiction; the magistrate then has power under the section to order the demolition of so much of the building as may be beyond the general line so fixed. Suppose, then, that, yielding to your contention, the magistrate takes upon himself to fix a line different from that fixed by the architect and finds that the building in question goes one foot beyond the line so fixed by him, but ten feet beyond the line fixed by the architect. Would he be bound under the section to order the demolition of the ten feet? WILLES, J.—No; the part is included in the whole; if he has power to order the demolition of ten feet, he may order the demolition of one.] In Wandsworth Board of Works v. Hall (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 641; L. Rep. 4 C. P. 85), this court seems to have been inclined to uphold its ruling in St. George's Hanover Square v. Sparrow, but it was not necessary there to raise this precise point, as in that case the respondent had built beyond the line decided by the magistrate as well as the architect, to be the general line. The expression "general line" is substituted in sect. 75 of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102 for the expression "regular line" in 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 143. But it was held that even the latter expression was not to be construed too strictly: (Tear v. Freebody, 4 C. B., N. S., 228); whereas if the contention of the respondent be correct, the magistrate would have no option but to pull down every inch that went beyond the line fixed by the architect.

Huddleston, Q. C. (Streeten with him), for the respondent.—The magistrate had before him the evidence of the architect on one side, and no evidence at all on the other; under these circumstances he was quite right in regarding the evidence of the architect as uncontradicted, and therefore conclusive. [BOVILL, C. J.—I cannot for a moment think that that is the question submitted to us; the real question is, whether the magistrate had power to decide the line for himself and against the opinion of the architect.] He had no such power; the Act makes the architect's decision final and conclusive. The interpretation of the 75th section given by the Queen's Bench in Bauman v. The Vestry of St. Pancras, is the right one. The essence of the offence created by the section is acting contrary to the decision of the architect, and without the consent of the authorities.

Field, Q. C. in reply.

BOVILL, C. J.—It seems to me that the point which Mr. Huddleston contends is left to our decision is not the point which the magistrate really required us to decide. The magistrate arrived at the decision which he made, because he thought he was bound by the authority of Bauman v. The Vestry of St. Pancras, to which he has referred in the case, and he says that he decided against the appellant accordingly, and the question for us to decide is, whether he was right in so determining, in other words, whether he was bound by that decision to take the course he did. That appears from the 6th paragraph of the case, where it says, "If your Lordships should be of opinion in the negative, then the case is to be remitted to me to decide the general line of buildings as aforesaid." The real point, then, is whether the certificate of the architect was final and conclusive, so that the magistrate was bound to act upon it, or whether the magistrate was at liberty to exercise his discretion in the matter. There is no doubt great difficlty in construing the Act, and in discovering its true intention as to the effect of the architect's certificate. The case, however, of St. George's Hanover Square v. Sparrow, decided in this court, is a direct authority upon the point raised in the present case. The decision in that case was arrived at after a long argument and discussion, and the point was very carefully considered. That case is undistinguishable from this, and is in favour of the appellant. In Bauman v. Vestry of St. Pancras, the precise point now under discussion did not arise, because it was there agreed on all hands that the building was beyond the general line, and no question was raised as to whether it was beyond the architect's line or not. The first point there raised was as to the form of the summons, and the second, as to whether the certificate given by the architect after the erection of the building, but before the summons was taken out, gave the magistrate jurisdiction. It was assumed on all hands that the certificate of the architect was necessary to give the magistrate jurisdiction; indeed, it is obviously so, as the magistrate may order the demolition of all the building beyond the architect's line. Therefore, it being assumed and admitted that the decision of the architect was necessary to give the magistrate jurisdiction, the only point decided in that case was that this essential matter might be given at any time before the hearing. No doubt the Court of Queen's Bench proceeded to take into consideration the general scope of the Act; but the precise point that we have to determine was not before them. Cockburn, C.J., and Mellor, J., both put a general construction upon the 75th section, which was at variance with our decision in St. George's Hanover Square v. Sparrow, but Shee, J., thought that their decision was not inconsistent with ours, nor was it. Cockburn, C.J., in his judgment said, "it appears to me that the learned judges in the Court of Common Pleas, in holding that it was competent to the magistrate to fix and determine a general line different from that determined by the architect, overlooked the important fact, that it is the line fixed by the architect which gives the magistrate jurisdiction to determine whether or no the erection of the building is an offence, and that the magistrate has no jurisdiction except with reference to that line." But on reference to the report of our decision, I find that the fact was not overlooked, but it was referred to by my brother Byles on the argument, and the attention of the counsel on both sides was called to it. Further, there is the case of the Wandsworth Board of Works v. Hall, where, though it was not necessary to decide the point, this court adhered to the views expressed in St. George's Hanover-square v. Sparrow. In this state of the authorities, the decision in the latter case being directly in favour of the appellant, our attention is directed to the case of Bauman v. The Vestry of St. Pancras, and the language of the Act. It is impossible to deny that the language is very obscure. If it had been intended that the line fixed by the architect should be final and conclusive on all parties, I should have expected to find an express provision to that effect. The Act speaks of the line being decided by the architect, but it does not say that his decision shall be final and conclusive, and indeed the general scope of the Act seems to exclude such a notion, for the section provides that, in a certain event, proceedings shall be taken before a magistrate. Why was the magistrate introduced? Could it have been intended, that he should be a mere ministerial officer, whose only functions should be to measure so as to see whether the buildings complained of transgressed the architect's line? I cannot adopt such a view. I think it must have been intended, that the magistrate, having the matter before him, should decide the real question between the parties, especially as there is no provision in the Act for enabling the parties affected to be heard before the architect, or to exercise any control over his decision. It is revolting to common sense to suppose that there should be no appeal against such a decision. For these reasons, I think it must have been intended that there should be an appeal from the architect's decision to the magistrate. Again, if it had been the intention of the Legislature to make the architect's decision final, the Act would have said, in common fairness, that public notice must be given of the architect's decision, so that people might know what it was; and if the architect were empowered to lay down an absolute line, I could understand that, if, after such a line had been fixed and notice given, a man built beyond the line without the consent of the proper authorities, he would be held responsible for his conduct. But both this court and the Court of Queen's Bench have decided that the architect's decision may be given at any time before the hearing of the complaint by the magistrate, so that the result of our adopting the contention of the respondent might be that different certificates might be given at different times by different architects, and that a man, who had taken care to build within the line laid down at the time of his building, might, if another architect came and subsequently laid down a different line, be condemned to pull down all that part of his building that transgressed this line. It must be remembered that this is a very penal Act. It restricts a man's right of building upon his own land; it should, therefore, not be extended by construction to subject a man to have his property destroyed for doing an act lawful at the time, but subsequently made unlawful. Unless compelled by the language of the Act, we should be loth to adopt such a construction. The fact that the architect's decision may be given at any time before the proceedings are taken seems to me to show that it cannot be final and conclusive. Again, if no line has been fixed, how is a man who wants to build to know whether he is to apply for consent to the authorities or not? How is he to apply except with reference to what the Act says as to the general line? There is nothing to guide him except the general line in point of fact. It may be that, after he has built legally and properly, a question may arise as to whether he has transgressed that line. The architect's decision, is then, good evidence until contraverted. Such a construction satisfies the words of the statute; but if it be sought to stretch these words further, and say that the architect's decision, given after the building is finished, without hearing the parties and without giving any notice, shall be without appeal, that is a proposition so monstrous that I shall not affirm it unless compelled to do so by the express words of the Act. Again, the decision is to be given by the architect "for the time being." It is consistent to hold that this means at the time that it is wanted, e.g., at the time that a prosecution is being commenced. Supposing that an architect at another time has given a different decision, there is then no way of determining the question, except by inquiring whether the buildings transgress the general line in point of fact; and before a man is made responsible to the law, the magistrate must determine whether the line last fixed by the architect is that general line. He must no doubt take the architect's decision into account, but he must not exclude all evidence as to what is the general line. It seems to me that there is no view which does not present great difficulty, but, on the whole, I prefer to abide by the construction put upon the Act by this court in St. George Hanover-square v. Sparrow. My judgment is therefore for the appellant.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. At the time that Tear v. Freebody (4 C. B., N. S., 228) was decided, we had to determine on the meaning of the words "the regular line," which was the expression used in 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 143, for which the expression "the general line" was substituted in 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, s. 75, no provision having been made in the former Act for a decision to be given by the architect. It was laid down in that case that "regular" did not mean straight, but that it meant the general line, i.e., the line that would preserve a general appearance of uniformity. It was made a question of substance, not a mere matter of inches or feet. When the certificate of the architect was introduced as decisive, the language was altered from "regular" to "general;" but I do not understand that the Legislature meant to overrule the decision in Tear v. Freebody, but rather to adopt the view there expressed, and to enact that small departures from geometrical straightness of line should not have the effect of exposing a man to penalties as for a nuisance, but only such a departure as would cause an eyesore, and that there should be some latitude allowed to the judge who had to deal with the question, to decide whether the transgression was a petty matter to which the law would not apply, according to the maxim de minimis non curat lex, or a substantial departure from the general line of uniformity. This consideration is most material when we look at the decision upon the 75th section in St. George's, Hanover-square, v. Sparrow, where the departure had no substantial effect on the uniformity of the buildings, and was one which no jury would have found was beyond the regular line. But it is contended that the architect of the Metropolitan Board of Works has power to decide that the structure, which there was held innocent, is beyond the general line; but the effect of making his decision conclusive against the opinion of the magistrate would be to override the decision of this court, which held that the magistrate might exercise his discretion. I think that a wholesome decision. I see no reason why the court should go out of its way to pronounce the architect's decision final and conclusive, instead of holding it to be a decision in the first instance, and subject to the control of the general officer, before whom the matter is to go. I think it far better to hold that the architect's decision is a decision pro re nata, and, being so, that it is subject to the decision of the magistrate, so far as it affects a person whose agent the architect is not. To take an analogous case, it was held in Barraclough v. Greenhough (14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 889; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 1), that where the probate of a will was made by statute, under certain circumstances, sufficient evidence, it should be considered as conclusive evidence of the validity of the will; but that decision was reversed in the Exchequer Chamber: (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 612.) I hope I should be ready to refer on all occasions to the better opinion of the learned judges in the Queen's Bench if I thought their judgment showed that I had been wrong. But, in the present instance, it seems to me that the validity of our decision in St. George's, Hanover-square v. Sparrow, has not been successfully impugned either by the Court of Queen's Bench or at the bar.

M. SMITH, J.—The construction of this obscure clause presents great difficulties, and if the matter had been res integra, I think that I might hesitate in agreeing with my learned brethren. The ground upon which I feel doubt is, that it seems to me a question whether the Legislature did not intend to make the architect's decision final, leaving the other questions to be decided by the magistrate. But the question is not res integra, there being an express decision of this court in St. George's, Hanover Square v. Sparrow, and that being so, I do not feel sufficient doubt as to the true construction of the statute, to dissent from the opinion expressed by this court then and now. Any construction presents difficulties; but though I entertain a view upon the subject, which seems to me clearer than it does to others, I do not wish to dissent from the opinions expressed by my learned brethren.

BRETT, J.—I assume that the magistrate in this case considered that the architect's decision was conclusive, and that he was precluded from going beyond it. That being so, it must be contended by the respondent that, though what is the general line is a question of fact, and the certificate in the present case is wrong, and can be proved to be so, and although it was given after the erection of the building, and without hearing the parties, yet the magistrate was conclusively bound by it. The respondent must be prepared to go to this length, because argument on the question is futile, unless the appellant is prepared to prove that the decision of the architect was wrong. I think it is not a true proposition to say, that a certificate so final and conclusive may be given after the building is finished and after the dispute at law has commenced. Yet both the Court of Queen's Bench and this court have held that the certificate may be given at any time before the hearing before the magistrate. A further proposition is involved, that it may be given without hearing the parties; because when the Legislature wishes that the parties shall be heard, it makes provision to that effect, and it says nothing of the kind when speaking of the decision of the architect in this case. Of course, if the statute clearly affirmed the proposition as I have stated it, I should feel bound to decide accordingly; but if it does not, I do not think that this court ought to affirm a proposition so at variance with the ordinary rights of property and so revolting to justice. The affirmative of the proposition involves this consequence, that a man who has bought a piece of ground, and built up to the extreme limit of it (which it is his common law right to do), may be forced to pull down part of the building and leave his ground unoccupied on the architect giving a certificate, which, on the hypothesis, is wrong. That in any case seems revolting to justice, and all the more so, if it may happen without the man having a right to be heard. The question, therefore, for us to decide is whether the statute is clear in affirming such a proposition. The section begins with a prohibition, and if we take only the beginning of the section down to the words "between the line of buildings and the highway," the general line spoken of may mean the actual general line. Afterwards, when the section comes to speak of the mode of dealing with the supposed offence, it says that if any building be erected, &c., without consent of the Metropolitan Board of Works (which is only required when the building goes beyond the general line) it shall be lawful for the vestry &c. to make complaint before a justice of the peace. If I am right in saying that the complaint must be that the person complained of has built beyond the general line and without consent, that complaint must be proved. If so, is this enactment that a certain matter shall be decided by a magistrate, controlled by the provision in another part of the section, as to a decision being given by the architect. No doubt by saying "decided by the architect," the Legislature may have meant "conclusively decided;" but the provision as to the decision of the architect is not made any part of the prohibitory clause, but is only introduced to show what is a necessary point to be proved before the magistrate. The question then arises whether "decided by the architect" means "conclusively decided" or only decided in the first instance. I cannot think that the Legislature has distinctly provided that it shall mean "conclusively decided," and as, in my view, such a provision would be, as I have said, contrary to the common rights of property and revolting to justice, I think the Legislature cannot have meant "conclusively decided," but only "decided in the first instance." If that be so, I do not feel pressed by the argument, that the Legislature afterwards, in the same section, gives the magistrate power, in case he shall consider the complaint proved, to order the demolition of so much of the building as transgresses "the said general line so fixed as aforesaid." Even if the question were res integra, I should come to these conclusions; but I further think that we are bound by the decision of this court in St. George's, Hanover Square v. Sparrow, which has not been expressly overruled.

WHINCUP v. HUGHES

Apprenticeship, indenture—Master's death—Action for return of premium—Money had and received.

In an action by an apprentice for money had and received against his master's executor, the master having died within a year from the commencement of the service which was to have been for six years:

Held that, in the absence of any express provision to that effect in the indenture of apprenticeship, no portion of the premium could be recovered.

THIS was an action tried in the Salford Hundred Court, when a verdict was entered for 15*l.*, and leave was reserved to the defendant to move for a nonsuit.

The action was brought for the whole or part of the premium, 25*l.*, paid by the plaintiff on apprenticing his son to the defendant's testator, a watchmaker. The term of apprenticeship was six years, and at the end of the first year the master died. The instruction of the apprentice by the testator ceased on the 14th July, 1869.

The first two counts were framed upon the indenture of apprenticeship, and the residue of the declaration was for money had and received for the use of the plaintiff and for accounts stated.

The indenture was made the 26th Nov. 1868, between George Whincup the younger of the first part, the plaintiff of the second part, and Thomas Rogers Hughes, of Manchester, watchmaker and jeweller (the defendant's testator), of the third part, and witnessed the apprenticeship of George Whincup the younger to T. R. Hughes (the master) for the term of six years, to be computed from the 31st July then last past. The plaintiff, George Whincup the elder, for himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, covenanted that he, his executors, or administrators, should and would, on the execution of the indenture, pa to the said master the sum of 25*l.*, as by way of a premium on the indenture of apprenticeship, and should and would during the said term find and provide for the said apprentice good and sufficient, respectable, suitable, and proper meat, drink, washing, lodgings, clothes, and wearing apparel, also medical and surgical aid and medicines and attendance in case of sickness or accident. "And in consideration of the due and faithful services to be performed by the said apprentice, and of the covenants of the said George Whincup the elder hereinbefore contained, and also in consideration of 25*l.* sterling on the execution hereof, paid by the said George Whincup the elder to the said master, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, he the said master doth hereby for himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, covenant with the said George Whincup the elder, his executors and administrators, and also with the said apprentice, that he the said master shall and will during the said term teach and instruct, or cause to be taught and instructed, the said apprentice in the said trade or business of a watchmaker and jeweller, in all its various branches as carried on by the said master, according to the best of his skill and ability. And also that he the said master shall and will (except during such time as the said apprentice shall be absent from the service of the said master by reason of sickness or from any other cause) pay unto the said apprentice weekly, as and for his hire, wages during" the first year, 4*s.* a week; during the second, 5*s.*; during the third, 6*s.*; during the fourth 7*s.*; during the fifth, 9*s.*; and during the last year 10*s.* a week.

The learned judge at the trial said, "The question which remains for decision is whether the plaintiff can recover from the defendant, as executrix to one Hughes, with whom the plaintiff was serving as apprentice at the time of his death, a portion of the premium paid to Hughes by the plaintiff. I think he can. It was contended on behalf of the defendant that as the plaintiff received some part of the consideration for which the premium was paid, although not the larger part, he could not recover the money paid for it, for in order to entitle him to do so the failure of the consideration must be complete; but I think it was hardly denied that where the consideration is severable, complete failure of part may form a ground for recovering a proportionate part of the money paid for it. Now, although it cannot be denied that there is considerable difficulty in severing the consideration in such a case as this, it does not appear to me to be impossible to do so, and I think the plaintiff may recover such part of his premium as a jury may think he is entitled to. I think, too, I am concluded by the authority of Cottenham, L.C. (see Hirst v. Tolson, 19 L. J. 441, Ch.), who seems there to have decided this very question. There will therefore be a verdict entered for the plaintiff; and as the question of amount was by consent left to me, I think the verdict should be for 15*l.* The defendant will have leave to move one of the superior courts to set aside the verdict and to enter a nonsuit."

G. B. Hughes accordingly obtained a rule nisi calling upon the plaintiff to show cause why this verdict should not be set aside and a nonsuit entered, on the ground that neither the premium paid at the commencement of the apprenticeship, nor any part of it, is recoverable back, the consideration for its payment not having failed either wholly or as to any apportionable part.

J. W. Mellor showed cause against the rule.—There are many cases in which attorneys and their executors have been ordered to pay back part of a premium under circumstances of this kind, e. g., Ex parte Prankerd (3 B. & Ald. 257). In another case, Hirst v. Tolson (2 M. & G. 134, and 19 L. J. 441, Ch.), although the master was an attorney, Lord Cottenham expressly based his decision on common law principles applicable to all apprentices. The duty to instruct was made by the deed here to continue throughout the apprenticeship; and the increased advantage obtained by the master generally in the later years is compensated by the agreement for an increase of wages. [BRETT, J.—Would it be the same if the apprentice had died?] No; the master would then have still continued to be ready and willing to carry out his part of the contract:

Atwood v. Maude, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 369;
Astle v. Wright, 23 Beav. 77;
Cooper v. Simmons, 7 H. & N. 707; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 713.

Hughes supported his rule.—There is no case to be found of an ordinary apprenticeship to which this action has been held to apply. In Hirst v. Tolson the decision was founded on a mistake, and in all the other cases in which attorneys have been ordered to return part of a premium, it has been admitted that no action would lie:

Hunt* v. Silk, 5 East. 449;
Blackburn* v. Smith, 2 Ex. 783;
Park on Insurance, "Premium," p. 585;

Ex parte Bayley, 9 B. & C. 691; Re Thompson, 1 Ex. 864.

BOVILL, C.J.—This action was brought to recover back as money had and received to the plaintiff's use, part of the premium paid to his master upon his apprenticeship. The consideration for the premium was the master's promise to instruct and keep him during the term; this must be governed by the ordinary rule concerning contracts of this kind. Where there is no fault on the part of the person who makes the promise, and he partly performs his contract, none of the consideration can be recovered. There may be exceptions with regard to contracts which can be severed; as, for instance, if a man purchase and pay for ten sacks of corn at so much per sack, and six sacks only be delivered, he can recover clearly the price of four sacks under any circumstances, because the contract can be severed as to each sack. Here, however, one contract was made for the whole period of the service, and the premium was paid for the whole of that term at the commencement of the apprenticeship. The master received and taught the boy according to the covenants of the deed for about a year, when the teaching was put an end to by the master's death. Personal instruction was necessarily terminated, and unless some express stipulation were contained in the deed to the contrary, the whole contract was at an end by the act of God. In the same way the permanent illness of the apprentice has been considered a sufficient conclusion of the contract. There is no right of action here upon the contract itself, for there is no provision as to what should happen upon the death of either party; that being so, the usual consequence must follow, viz., the end of the contract. It has been said that there is an equity against the executor for the return of part of the premium under the circumstances of this case. There is no principle, however, upon which such a return could be apportioned. The services of an apprentice are at first but of little value, and the duties of the master are at the same time more burdensome. This is to some extent recognised by the scale of wages agreed to be paid to the apprentice, but it is impossible to say how far that scale represents the relative value of the respective duties. There is no instance that I am aware of in which an action has been brought successfully upon an ordinary apprenticeship under circumstances like the present. Sometimes, however, an application for return of premium has been made upon attorneys' articles of clerkship. In Ex parte Bayley (9 B. & C. 691) a clerk had been articled to one of two partners, and the application was made for a return by the surviving partner of part of the premium paid to the deceased. The amount found by the master was ordered to be refuunded, but Lord Tenterden was careful to state his opinion that the case was not to be decided by any strict rule of law. The court came to that conclusion with reference to their special jurisdiction over attorneys, and also in consequence of the Act of Parliament which prohibits attorneys from having more than a certain number of clerks. On the other hand, Re Thompson (1 Ex. 864) is an instance of the refusal of a court to order the repayment of any portion of a premium by an attorney whose articled clerk died within a month after he was articled for five years. It was admitted that no action would lie, and Pollock, C. B. stated that it was an application to the equitable jurisdiction of the court. They declined to order the return of any part of the premium. There could not be a stronger case than this against the contention on the plaintiff's behalf in this case. Notwithstanding the general jurisdiction of the court over its officers, they refused to exercise it in opposition to the law as it related to apprenticeships of an ordinary description. We have then an express decision of the Exchequer confirming the absence on the plaintiff's side of any claim, either in justice or at law, for the return of this premium. The master and the apprentice must each do all he undertakes, and should be stopped only by the act of God, as, for instance, the death of either of them. We have been pressed with the case of Hirst v. Tolson (19 L. J. 441, Ch.). There the Vice-Chancellor had referred to the master to inquire what proportion of the premium ought to be returned by the executors of a solicitor to a clerk who had been articled to him for a term of five years. The solicitor died about two years after the clerk was articled. Lord Cottenham upon appeal affirmed the decree, but he did so upon the notion that there existed a debt at law due to the clerk upon the partial failure of the consideration for the premium. As the ground of his decision he relied upon the case of Stokes v. Twitchen (8 Taunt. 892); that case, however, decides no such point, nor can it be so inferred from it. The plaintiff there sought to recover the whole premium on the grounds of the indenture being void, and the failure of the whole consideration. The plaintiff was nonsuited, because she did not come into court with clean hands, and there is no allusion in the judgment of Gibbs, C. J. to the plaintiff's right to recover part of the premium if the consideration should partially fail. Lord Cottenham's judgment therefore, as far as it is based on that case, was a mistake. Independently of that case, he referred to two other cases as to the jurisdiction of courts of equity in a matter of that kind. I find on reference to the first of these cases, Soam v. Bowden (Finch's Reps. 396), that the executors there expressed a willingness to pay back part of the premium after the satisfaction of the specialty debts, or to carry out their testator's covenant, as the court should direct. And in the other case, Newton v. Rowse (1 Vern. 460), the grounds of apportionment, which Lord Cottenham thought were difficult to discover, are probably explained in the note to Raithby's 3rd edit. of Vernon, as mentioned in 1 Story's Equity Jurisprudence, s. 472. According to the pleadings, the case seemed to have been decided on the ground of mutual mistake or misrepresentation. It seems, therefore, that the cases on which the Lord Chancellor relied in Hirst v. Tolson, failed to support the proposition which he laid down. That decision is, therefore, very unsatisfactory, and the case in the Exchequer is an authority directly the other way. Upon principle, too, it seems to me that there are no grounds for the decision of the present case arrived at in the court below. The rule will be made absolute.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The court cannot assume a jurisdiction to overrule the contract between the parties. The contract in this case is clear, that in consideration of the premium the master entered into a bargain between himself and the apprentice; he was to instruct the apprentice, and the apprentice was to serve him for six years, provided that they should both so long live. I put out of consideration the obligation to clothe and feed the apprentice, sometimes added to that of teaching, which, according to 2 Williams on Executors, 6th edit. 1631, might survive against the executors. It would be extraordinary if, upon the contract as it is, the master should have to pay back the premium, or part of it, because one of the parties should die. It is a well known rule of law that the introduction into a contract of terms which the law assumes to be part of the contract, has no effect upon the contract. If the apprentice died, could the master be called upon to return the premium? Certainly not; but there is no greater reason for the return by executors upon the master's death, unless it be by the custom of the place. By the passage I have alluded to in Williams on Executors, there seems to have been a custom in London binding executors to get an apprentice of their testator into another place of the same trade; and probably this might to some extent explain the decision of the case in Finch. With regard to the case of Hirst v. Tolson, besides concurring in the observations of the Lord Chief Justice, I think the case very unsatisfactory, although I desire to speak of it with great reserve as an equitable decision. I prefer the course of common law, which is clear. Except by authority of the paternal, or, I should rather say masterful, jurisdiction of the Superior Courts over attorneys, there is no case of interference at common law under circumstances of this kind. I observe at 312 n.(a) of 1st Wms. Saunders the case of Cuff v. Brown, cited from 5 Price, 297. There the Court of Exchequer held that where the apprentice ran away after a short time, and enlisted as a soldier, and the master on his return refused to take him back, the court could not compel any return of the premium. The note goes on to say, "However, in the case of an attorney's clerk the Court of King's Bench decided otherwise, considering that they had a more extensive authority over their own officers: (Ex parte Prankerd, 3 B. & Ald. 257.) I think that the nonsuit should here be entered not merely as a matter of law, but also because as a matter of business a watchmaker would probably be at a loss, amounting to the whole of this premium, in the first year of an apprentice's service.

SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. Independently of the rule of law that an action for money had and received can, with very few exceptions, only be brought upon a total failure of consideration, the defendant is not here liable upon the written contract between the parties; the intention was that there should be no return of the premium. The master was to teach for six years upon the condition necessarily implied that both the master and apprentice should so long live. I cannot imply from the terms of the contract that in case of death any part of the premium should be returned. If that had been the intention, it might have been easily provided for in the written covenants. The parties must have known the possibility of the death of either within the term of service. If the boy had died before the expiration of the six years it might be a loss to the master greater than the amount of the premium, yet it is not suggested that he could have a remedy. It has been held that he could not recover if the boy were disabled by permanent illness: (Boast v. Firth, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 264; L. Rep. 4 C. P. 1.) It also seems to me that this action cannot lie where the contract has been partly performed on both sides, for the further reason that in order to arrive at an equitable return of the proportion of the premium lost by the apprentice it would be necessary to consider the comparative usefulness of the apprentice to the master at the various periods of the service, the degree of improvement acquired by the apprentice at the master's death, and various other circumstances. The measure of injury incurred cannot be obtained merely from the proportion of time. The only way in which such a claim as this could be made would be by a special action upon an implied contract, which cannot here be found. Neither can the plaintiff obtain any assistance from the authorities. It is certainly a strong circumstance against his claim that no case of an action for return of a premium is to be found in the books. The only attempts to obtain any return have been made under the special jurisdiction of the courts in respect of attorneys; and in one of them the court refused to interfere, on the ground that the matter was full of difficulties. The only common law authority which at first sight appeared to be in the plaintiff's favour is that mentioned in Hirst v. Tolson. My Lord has shown that Lord Cottenham entertained a mistaken view of the case upon which he relied, and has thereby disposed of the argument founded upon that authority.

BRETT, J.—This seems to me to be a clear case. The sum of money paid to the master as premium was in respect of a continuing consideration, that is to say, a duty to be performed by the master throughout six years if both lived for that time. The master's duty was to instruct the apprentice personally, and death was no breach of the contract on his part. It is said that without any breach of his duty, which was the consideration for the money he received, his executors are to return the premium or part of it. There was no total failure of the consideration, nor was there any rescission of the contract. The case, therefore, comes within the rule that there can be no recovery of any part of a specific sum paid for a specific consideration of which there has been a merely partial failure. The cases cited from Chancery do not affect this point, and the common law authorities in favour of the plaintiff's claim are based upon the special jurisdiction of the courts over their officers.

REG. v. DUNNING.

Perjury—Indictment.

An indictment for perjury committed at quarter sessions alleged "that at," &c., "a certain indictment for misdemeanor, in which A. was prosecutor and B. and C. defendants, came on to be tried in due form of law, and was then and there tried by a jury, &c., upon which said trial the now defendant appeared as a witness, and was then duly sworn before the justices," &c.

Held, upon an objection that the court before which the perjury was committed had no jurisdiction, because the indictment did not show the misdemeanor to be one triable at quarter sessions, that the indictment sufficiently alleged the substance of the offence charged against the now defendant, and that the court had competent authority to administer the oath.

CASE reserved for the opinion of this Court by Pigott, B.

The prisoner Henry Dunning was tried and convicted before me at Shrewsbury, at the last summer assizes, upon an indictment for perjury, which alleged in substance as follows, viz.:

Shropshire. The jurors for our Lady the Queen, upon their oath, present, that heretofore—to wit, at the general quarter sessions of the peace of our Sovereign Lady the Queen, holden for the county of Salop, on the 28th June 1870, at the Shire Hall, in Shrewsbury, in the said county, before Sir Baldwin Leighton, Bart., Sir William Curtis, Bart., and others, their associates, her Majesty's justices of the peace, assigned to keep the peace in the county aforesaid, and also to hear and determine divers felonies, trespasses, and other misdemeanors in the same county done and committed, a certain indictment for misdemeanor, in which John Davies, of the Bull's Head, Lawley Bank, in the said county, was the prosecutor, and Isaac Rowlands and John Davies were the defendants, came on to be tried in due form of law, and was then and there tried by a jury of the country, in that behalf duly sworn, between the parties aforesaid, upon which said trial Henry Dunning appeared as a witness for and on behalf of the said Isaac Rowlands and John Davies, the defendants in the indictment aforesaid, and was then duly sworn and took his corporal oath upon the Holy Gospel of God, before the said Sir Baldwin Leighton, Bart., Sir William Curtis, Bart., and others, their associates, so being such justices as aforesaid, that the evidence which he, the said Henry Dunning, should give to the court there, and the said jury so sworn as aforesaid, touching the matter then in question between the prosecutor in the said indictment and the defendants therein, should be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

Then, after averments of materiality, it is further presented, that the said Henry Dunning falsely, &c., deposed and swore, &c.

Whereas, &c. (here follow the negatives and the formal conclusion that Henry Dunning so committed perjury.)

It was proved that the indictment was for an offence against the person under sect. 20 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100.

At the conclusion of the case for the prosecution it was objected by counsel for the prisoner that the indictment was bad, in not stating what the misdemeanor was, or that it was one triable at Quarter Sessions.

I reserved this for the consideration of this Court, and accepted bail for the prisoner.

G. PIGOTT.

The Hon. Evelyn Ashley for the prisoner.—The conviction cannot be sustained. The indictment is bad for not showing the jurisdiction of the court in which the perjury is alleged to have been committed. The indictment only states that a certain indictment for misdemeanor, to which the defendant was a party, came on to be tried before the court of quarter sessions; it sets out no particulars, and does not show that it was a misdemeanor that the court of quarter sessions had power to try. [KEATING, J.—It alleges that it came on to be tried in due form of law.] That averment would be satisfied by showing that the court had all the usual formalities, such as a judge and proper officers, but it is not a sufficient averment of jurisdiction. The indictment should have set out the ingredients of the offence, so that it would appear that the quarter sessions had jurisdiction to try it. [CHANNELL, B., referred to the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 20, which enacts, "in every indictment for perjury, &c., it shall be sufficient to set forth the substance of the offence charged upon the defendant, and by what court, or before whom, the oath, &c., was taken, &c., without setting forth the indictment, &c., and without setting forth the commission or authority of the court before which such offence was committed.] That provision still requires the substance of the indictment to be set out, and Rex v. Callanan (6 B. & C. 102) is a decision to the same effect. In Reg. v. Overton (4 Q. B. 83), where an indictment for perjury alleged that a certain appeal came on to be tried in due form of law before commissioners of assessed taxes, it was held that the indictment did not sufficiently show that it was a judicial proceeding, and that it did not sufficiently state the substance of the offence, according to the 23 Geo. 2, c. 11, s. 1. In Reg. v. Harvey (8 Cox C. C. 99), it was held that the materiality of the false evidence assigned must be apparent on the face of an indictment for perjury, and that the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 20, does not cure the want of it. [CLEASBY, B., referred to Lavey v. The Queen (5 Cox C. C. 259; 17 Q. B. 496), where an indictment for perjury committed in a County Court only alleged that a certain action came on to be tried before the judge of the said court, and was in due form of law tried, upon which trial Lavey was duly sworn as a witness before the said judge, "then and there having sufficient and competent authority to administer the said oath;" and it was held that, although there was no express averment that the oath was administered in a judicial proceeding over which the court had jurisdiction, the averment was by necessary intendment involved in the allegation that the judge had sufficient authority to administer the said oath.] By the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 38, the court of quarter sessions is restrained from trying a large number of offences, and therefore it was essential to show that the offence, upon the trial of which the perjury was alleged to have been committed, was one within the jurisdiction of the court of quarter sessions; and although it need not be expressly averred that the court had jurisdiction to try the offence, yet it should appear upon the face of the indictment that the offence was one triable at sessions. In Rex v. Dowlin (5 T. R. 314) it appeared on the face of the indictment that the crime was murder, upon the trial of which the perjury was there committed. The following cases were also referred to:

Reg. v. Philpot, 1 Car. & Ker. 112;
Reg. v. Fellowes, 1 Car. & Kir. 115;
Stedman's case, Cro. Eliz. 137.

No counsel appeared for the prosecution.

Cur. adv. vult.

CHANNELL, B., delivered the judgment of the Court as follows:—In this case the prisoner was tried and convicted at the last summer assizes held at Shrewsbury before Pigott, B., for perjury committed on the trial at the general quarter sessions of the peace for the county of Salop, of an indictment for misdemeanor against Isaac Rowlands and John Davies for an offence against the person of John Davies under sect. 20 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100. The case at the trial was fully proved in every necessary particular; but it was objected on behalf of the prisoner, and has been argued before us, that the indictment was bad in form, and that the judgment should therefore be arrested and the conviction quashed. The objection taken at the trial was that the indictment did not state what the misdemeanor was, which was alleged to have been tried at the quarter sessions, or aver that it was one triable at quarter sessions, i.e., in other words, did not aver that the court of quarter sessions had jurisdiction to try the misdemeanor. This objection, when developed in argument before us, seemed to fall into two objections, first, that the indictment did not set forth the substance of the offence charged upon the defendant; and, secondly, that it did not either expressly aver or show by necessary inference that the court before which the false oath was taken was a competent authority to administer the same. As to the first objection, the indictment alleges that at the general quarter sessions "a certain indictment for misdemeanor came on to be tried in due form of law," in which one Davies was prosecutor, and Rowlands and Davies were defendants, and was then and there tried by a jury, &c., and that the prisoner appeared as a witness upon the said trial, and was then duly sworn, &c. The indictment then sets out the matter sworn to by the prisoner, avers its materiality, and negatives its truth and truthfulness. The objection taken is, that it does not state the subject-matter of the indictment for misdemeanor which was tried at the sessions. But that seems rather to point out an alleged defect in not stating the substance of the offence charged against the defendants who were tried at the sessions than a defect in not stating the substance of the offence charged against the defendant tried at the assizes. The substance of the offence charged against him is, that in a judicial proceeding he swore to the truth of certain facts which are set forth, which at the time of so swearing he knew to be false. "All that it is necessary to state," says Buller, J., in Rex v. Dowlin (5 T. R., 311), "is that there was a certain cause, &c., and that it came on to be tried in due form of law, &c." It is true, as pointed out by the counsel for the defendant, that in that case it was alleged that one Kimber was tried upon a certain indictment for murder, &c.; but it seems to us that neither Lord Kenyon nor Buller, J., rely upon the presence of the words, "for murder" in stating the proposition of law, but they mention them only in their relation of the actual facts of that case. In the case of Rex v. Callanan (6 B. & C. 102), all that was stated was the substance of what the defendant swore that he did, &c., upon affidavit before a commissioner. The indictment did not state the cause for or in respect of which the affidavit was made. Yet Abbott, C. J., says that it set forth "the substance of the matter sworn," using that expression as equivalent to "the substance of the offence charged upon the defendant, and holding the case to be consequently within the statute 23 Geo. 2, c. 11. In Lavey v. The Queen (17 Q. B. 496) the objection taken was, that it was not shown that the County Court had jurisdiction over the suit in which the alleged false oath was taken, because the nature of the suit was not sufficiently described. "It was argued," says Parke, B., in the judgment, that in setting forth "the substance of the offence," it was not sufficient to state "the substance of the matter sworn to," and aver that it was false, and to allege the authority of the judge to administer the oath; but the indictment was nevertheless held to be sufficient on the ground that it appeared that there was a judicial proceeding, and that the defendant was sworn and stated certain matter which was false, and that the judge had power to administer the oath. The ground of decision is, that the substance of the offence charged upon the defendant sufficiently appeared, and that the court had competent authority to administer the oath. These cases seem to us to be authority for the correctness of the suggestion we have made as to the meaning and construction of the statute, and for holding that in the present case the substance of the offence charged against the defendant sufficiently appears. As to the second point, if the case had depended upon the statute 23 Geo. 2, c. 11, we should have probably thought that the indictment was insufficient. That statute was passed in order to obviate difficulties in the form of indictments for perjury. It states what it shall be sufficient to set forth, viz., the substance of the offence charged upon the defendant, and by what court and before whom the oath was taken, "averring," it says, "such court or person or persons to have a competent authority to administer the same," with the proper averment or averments to falsify the matter charged, &c., without setting forth, &c. After that statute, the question treated by the courts in every case was, whether an indictment contained the averments mentioned in that statute or their equivalents. If it did, it was good without more. But then, by stat. 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, passed to relax still further technical forms of indictments, it is enacted in sect 20 that [reads it]. It is almost identical in terms with sect. 1 of the 23 Geo. 2, c. 11, except that it omits the words "averring such court or person or persons to have a competent authority to administer the same." This omission seems to us conclusively to show the intention of the Legislature, that this allegation, or its equivalent in the indictment, is a technical strictness which may well be dispensed with, the matter of it being left for proof at the trial. Having then determined that the substance of the offence alleged against the defendant in the present indictment is sufficiently stated, we are of opinion that the indictment contains everything required by sect. 20 of 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, and is therefore by the express terms of the section sufficient, although it does not contain any express or equivalent averment that the court had competent authority to administer the oath. We are therefore of opinion that the indictment was sufficient, and that the conviction in this case was right, and must be affirmed.

Reg v. Harris and Cocks.

Lewdness—Exposure in a public place—Urinal.

The prisoners committed a gross act of lewdness in an inclosed urinal, divided into compartments, adjoining to a public footway in a public park. The public had access to the urinal.

Held*, that the urinal was a public place, and that the commission of the indecency therein was indictable as a nuisance.

Case reserved for the opinion of this Court by the Assistant-Judge at the Middlesex Sessions on the 23rd Nov. 1870.

Samuel Harris and Henry Cocks were tried before me upon the following indictment:

Middlesex. The jurors for our Lady the Queen upon their oath present that Samuel Harris and Henry Cocks on the 10th Oct. in the year of our Lord 1870, in a certain urinal frequented and resorted to by many of the liege subjects of our Lady the Queen for a necessary purpose and in a certain open and public place, called Hyde-park, situate in the parish of Saint George, Hanover-square, in the county of Middlesex, and near and adjacent to a certain highway and footpath there situate and in the sight and view of many of the liege subjects of our said Lady the Queen then and there being, and then and there passing and repassing, did meet together for the purpose of committing with each other divers lewd and unnatural practices, and did then and there commit and perpetrate with each other divers such practices as aforesaid, and that he the said Samuel Harris did then and there in such open and public place as aforesaid, and within the sight and view of such persons as aforesaid, unlawfully and wickedly expose. [Then followed a specific averment of the lewd practices.] To the great damage and common nuisance of all the liege subjects of our said Lady the Queen then and there being and then and there passing and repassing, against the peace of our said Lady the Queen, her crown, and dignity.

Complaints having been made to the police of practices at the urinal in question, two police constables in plain clothes were directed to watch the place, and, on the 10th Oct., between three and four o'clock in the afternoon, they found the two prisoners in the urinal. They were standing facing each other, but on seeing the officers, each prisoner retired into one of the compartments in the urinal.

The police officers then went to the further end of the urinal where there were openings enabling them to see into the urinal; they then saw Harris leave the compartment which he had previously entered and go to the compartment in which Cocks then was; Cocks turned round to Harris, and the acts of indecency specified in the indictment were committed.

The officers then ran round to the principal entrance, and took both prisoners into custody in the urinal.

The urinal is open to the public, and is situate in Hyde-park, near to a lodge, the window of which on a first floor commands a view of the urinal, the distance between the lodge and the urinal being 14ft. 6in.

The urinal is approached by a gate opening from the public footpath, and there is also access to it by another gate communicating with a small garden belonging to the lodge.

Harris pleaded guilty to the whole charge, and I told the jury that, for the purpose of the trial, they might, if they believed the evidence, find Cocks guilty upon the first count, but they must be satisfied that the prisoners had the intention imputed to them by the second count, before they could justifiably return a verdict of guilty on that count.

The jury found Cocks guilty on the first count, and not guilty on the second count.

Sentence was postponed that the opinion of this Honourable Court might be obtained, and in the mean time both prisoners were discharged on bail.

The question I have to submit to this Honourable Court is, whether, in point of law, the conviction of Cocks can be sustained?

If this question is determined in the affirmative, the conviction is to be affirmed, and the court of sessions may proceed to pass sentence upon both prisoners; but if otherwise, the conviction of both prisoners, notwithstanding Harris's plea of guilty, is to be quashed.

William H. Bodkin, Assistant Judge.

Giffard, Q. C. (Moody with him) for the prisoner Cocks. — No doubt the prisoner committed a gross act of indecency in the urinal, but the question was whether the urinal was such a public place as makes the act an indictable nuisance at common law. This was not a place open to public view, it is divided into compartments and was intended to screen persons from the public gaze. Reg. v. Orchard (3 Cox, C. C. 248), is in point. There the indecent act was done in an urinal in Farringdon-market, it was an enclosure formed of Portland stone, with divisions or boxes like urinals at railway stations. It was open to the public for certain public purposes, but otherwise enclosed. To render an urinal a public place it must be so open to the gaze of the public as to be a public nuisance. [Willes, J.—Or, in other words, it must be so publicly done as to affect two or more of Her Majesty's subjects.] It is no offence that persons use it for a lawful purpose, and in some sense in every such case that is an indecent act. [Bovill, C. J.—Here I understand from the case that the act was done not in a compartment but in the open part of the urinal. Does a public place cease to be a public place by reason of part of it being partitioned off for a convenient purpose so far as regards the part so partitioned off?] Reg. v. Orchard is an authority that it does. No doubt this point was reserved to give an opportunity of questioning the soundness of the decision in Reg v. Orchard.

Harris, for the prosecution, was not called upon.

Bovill, C. J. — If all the facts had been clearly stated in Reg v. Orchard, and there had been a clear opinion expressed by the Judges, it might have been some authority against a conviction in this case; but the facts are so indefinitely stated, that I cannot understand the case. Whatever construction is to be put on that case, I am of opinion that it has no application to the present. The prisoners are charged and convicted of having committed an offence in an urinal frequented by many of the Queen's subjects, and in a certain open and public place called Hyde Park, and near to a certain highway and footpath, and in the sight and view of many of the Queen's subjects. The only question reserved is whether there was any evidence on which they could be properly convicted. If the learned Assistant-Judge was bound to have told the jury that the urinal was not a public place, the conviction was wrong; but inasmuch as he was not bound to tell them that, the conviction must stand. Upon the case it appears that this was a public urinal adjoining a public footway, from which there was access to the urinal, and there were what are termed divisions or compartments in it. Such of the public as desire to do so may have recourse to it; and it was, therefore, as much a public place as a thoroughfare. Whether it was a place of larger or smaller extent, as, e.g., in a public square or in a court, cannot affect the question whether it was a place of public resort. There is no other point reserved but whether an urinal can be a public place in which an indecent act of this kind can be committed; and we think it is just the class of place to which the law on this subject applies.

The rest of the Court concurred.

Conviction affirmed.

Held, that the prisoner was guilty of larceny of the 2*s.* 4*d.*

CASE reserved for the opinion of the Court by the Chairman of the Worcestershire Quarter Sessions.

At the Worcestershire Quarter Sessions, held on the 2nd Jan. 1871, the above-named prisoner, Edwin Cooke, was tried before me for stealing certain moneys belonging to his master, one George Hands.

The said George Hands was a currier, at Kidderminster, and in the habit of employing several workmen in his said business.

The prisoner was in and before the month of November last, and continued until the early part of the following month, to be a servant of the said George Hands, being employed at a weekly salary, as a confidential foreman over the workman.

It was part of the duty of the prisoner to engage and dismiss the workmen, as occasion required; and he generally, but not invariably, consulted his master as to such engagement and dismissal, and as to the amount of wages at which such workmen were to be engaged.

The workmen were engaged at so much a week for ordinary time, and they were to be paid after the same proportionate rate for any overtime.

A wages book was kept at the master's counting-house, and was given out to the prisoner on the morning of every Saturday (which was the pay day for the workmen), in order that he might enter on a pay-sheet in the said book the names of the several workmen who had been employed during the week, and to set opposite to each person's name the amount due to him for wages. When this was done, the prisoner, according to the usual practice, brought back the book to the counting-house and gave it to the master's cashier, who generally showed it to the master. The several sums entered in the pay-sheet were then added up and the total amount paid by the cashier to the prisoner, whose duty it would be to pay thereout to the several workmen their respective wages.

Among the workmen so employed under the prisoner in the month of November last was a man named Williams, who had been engaged by the prisoner at 24*s.* a week for ordinary time (overtime, if any, to be paid for in addition at the same proportionate rate). During the week ending the 12th Nov. last, Williams had worked overtime, and the wages due to him for that week, calculated at the rate of 24*s.* a week, amounted to the sum of 1*l.* 8*s.* and no more. The prisoner, however, had before this time fraudulently represented to his master that Williams had been engaged at the rate of 26*s.* a week, and in the aforesaid pay-sheet for the week ending the 12th Nov. last he fraudulently set opposite the name of Williams, instead of the said sum of 1*l.* 8*s.* the correct amount due to him, the sum of 1*l.* 10*s.* 4*d.*, being in fact the amount that Williams would have been entitled to if he had been engaged at the rate of 26*s.* instead of 24*s.* a week.

The total amount of the wages in the said pay-sheet for that week, including the said sum of 1*l.* 10*s.* 4*d.*, so represented to be due to Williams was the sum of 21*l.* 18*s.*, and the said cashier, in ignorance of the fraud practised by the prisoner, and believing that the said pay-sheet was correct, on the same 12th Nov. paid to the prisoner out of his master's moneys the said sum of 21*l.* 18*s.*, in order that he might by means thereof pay the several workmen mentioned in the pay-sheet the wages due to them respectively, and the prisoner was not authorised, either by his master or by the cashier, to apply any part of such moneys for any other purpose.

After obtaining the said sum of 21*l.* 18*s.* from the cashier in manner aforesaid, and on the same day, the prisoner paid thereout to Williams the sum of 1*l.* 8*s.*, being the correct amount of the wages due to him, and fraudulently appropriated thereout to his own use the sum of 2*s.* 4*d.*, being the excess of the sum represented in the said pay-sheet to be due to Williams, over the sum actually due, and the prisoner intended, at the time when he obtained the said money from the cashier, to appropriate the said excess to his own use, and to defraud his master of the same.

The appropriation of this excess of 2*s.* 4*d.* was the subject of the first count of the indictment, on which the prisoner was tried. There were two other counts charging the prisoner with stealing moneys belonging to his master, but the facts, except as to the names, dates, and amounts, being exactly similar to those proved under the first count, are not necessary to be stated for the purposes of this case.

It was objected by the counsel for the prisoner that, even if the above facts were proved, the offence of the prisoner was not a felony, but that of obtaining money by false pretences.

I declined to withdraw the case from the jury on that objection; but a verdict of guilty having been returned, I reserved the point for the consideration of this Court, and judgment was in the meantime postponed, and the prisoner, not having, as I believe, been able to obtain the required bail, is now detained in the Worcester prison.

The question on which I respectfully desire the opinion of the Court is, whether the prisoner, on the foregoing state of facts, was properly found guilty of felony.

(Signed) R. PAUL AMPHLETT,
Chairman of the above Court of Quarter Sessions.

F. T. Streeten (Self with him) for the prisoner.—The conviction for larceny was wrong; for the offence (if any) committed by the prisoner amounts only to obtaining money by false pretences. The cashier had authority from his master to pay the 21*l.* 18*s.* to the prisoner, and he did so intending to part with the money absolutely to the prisoner. The property being parted with by the cashier, the offence was not larceny. In White v. Garden (10 C. B. 927), Talford, J., said: "There is a very obvious distinction between the cases of goods obtained by felony and fraud, or false pretences. In the one case the owner of the goods has no intention to part with the property; in the other he has." Lord Wensleydale expressed the same view in Powell v. Hoyland (6 Ex. 70). The same distinction between larceny and false pretences is laid down in—

2 Russell on Crimes, 200, 4th edit.;
Arch. Crim. Plead. 312, 16th edit.; and 2 East P. C. 816,

and the distinction is a substantial and material one, and was upheld in Reg v. Prince (38 L. J. 8 M. C.; 11 Cox C. C 193). [Bovill, C. J,—Assume that it was not larceny when he obtained the gross sum from the cashier, but when he had paid away all that he ought to have paid away there remained a balance in his hands, whose money was that? Was it not his master's, and if so, does not the case fall within the late Act as one of a fraudulent conversion of the balance to the prisoner's own use, which offence the Act defines to be larceny?] This was not a bailment of the money to the prisoner; there was no specific coin of which the prisoner was a bailee, and bound to restore. The test is, whether at the time the cashier parted with the money to the prisoner, he intended to part with the ownership in it, and it is submitted upon the facts stated that he did. The offence was complete at the time the prisoner obtained the money by the false pretences. In Reg v. Thompson (32 L. J. 57, M. C.; L. & C. 233; 9 Cox C. C. 222), a merchant's clerk having fraudulently represented to the cashier that a larger sum than 1*l.* 3*s.* was due for dock dues, and obtained it, and appropriated the difference to his own use, was held not to have been guilty of larceny. There Williams, and Wightman, JJ., both pointed out the difficulty there was as to any particular coin having been stolen by the prisoner, as the money was paid over to the prisoner in a lump, and he was justly entitled to a part of what was so paid to him. And Pollock, C. B., said, "No doubt the prisoner obtained the money by false pretences, but it was not larceny." That case proceeded on the same principle decided in Reg v. Leonard (1 Den. C. C. 304; 3 Cox C. C. 284), where the prisoner was a foreman, and the money was obtained by cheque. The following cases were then cited to show that this was not a case of fraud by a bailee:

Reg. v. Prince (supra)
Reg. v. Hassell, 30 L. J. 175, M. C.;
Reg. v. George Thompson, 9 Cox C. C. 222.

Here the money was parted with in the first instance, once for all, and to put it as money stolen after the correct amount for wages was paid is not consistent with the facts. [Bovill, C.J. referred to Reg. v. Goode (Car. & M. 582), where the master gave the prisoner 3*l.* to pay canal dues, and he paid a part only, and appropriated the rest to his own use, and the prisoner was convicted of larceny.] That case is commented on in a note in Reg. v. Thompson (L. & C. 233), where, after reviewing all the cases, it is said, "The true distinction to be drawn from these cases appears to be, that if the master delivers money to the servant for a speci ed purpose, with the understanding that the identical coins delivered are to be applied to that purpose, and the servant converts them to his own use with a felonious intent, he is guilty of felony; but if the master delivers to the servant a gross sum of money, to make certain payments out of that sum, not intending that the identical coins delivered shall be applied to any particular payment, but leaves the servant at liberty to make any use he pleases of the specific coin delivered, provided he applies a similar amount of money to the purposes indicated, the master must be taken to have parted with the money, and the servant cannot be convicted of larceny if he convert the money to his own use, although, if he had obtained it by means of a false pretence, he may be convicted of the latter offence." This view of the law is consistent with that adopted in the case of larceny by bailees, with regard to whom it has been held that they cannot be convicted of larceny for converting to their own use money deposited with them in cases where they are only under an obligation to return the amount, and not the identical coin deposited."—[Willes, J. That note is very good law with one qualification, that where, as was said by Lord Wensleydale, money is handed to a servant, the servant must primâ facie be taken to hold it as the master's, and for the purpose intended by the master. Bovill, C. J., referred to Reg. v. Watts, 2 Den. C. C. 14.] If this is larceny it is difficult to see when the offence was complete. Reg. v. Barnes (2 Den. C. C. 59; 5 Cox C. C. 112) was also cited.

J. O. Griffits (Montagu Williams with him), for the prosecution, was stopped by the court.

Bovill, C.J.—The real point submitted to us in this case is whether there was any evidence to go to the jury of a larceny having been committed. The objection raised by the prisoner's counsel was that, even if the facts stated in the case were proved, the offence of the prisoner was not a felony, but that of obtaining money by false pretences. The point is substantially whether on the facts stated there was any evidence of a larceny that ought to have been submitted to the jury, or whether the case ought to have been withdrawn from them. The facts are that the cashier of the prosecutor, in ignorance of the fraud practised upon him by the prisoner, paid to the prisoner 21*l.* 18*s.* of the moneys of his master, in order that he might by means thereof pay the several workmen mentioned in the pay-sheet the wages due to them respectively, and the prisoner was not authorised either by his master or by the cashier to apply any part of such moneys for any other purpose. After obtaining the said sum of 21*l.* 18*s.*, and on the same day, the prisoner paid thereout to Williams the sum of 1*l.* 8*s.*, being the correct amount of the wages due to him, and fraudulently appropriated thereout to his own use the sum of 2*s.* 4*d.*, being the excess of the sum represented in the pay sheet to be due to Williams over the sum actually due, and the prisoner intended at the time when he obtained the money from the cashier to appropriate the said excess to his own use and to defraud his master of the same. The whole foundation, therefore, of the argument of the prisoner's counsel fails, viz., that the jury could not find the identical money misappropriated, because the case states the receipt of the particular sum of the master's money, and that the prisoner paid thereout 1*l.* 8*s.* to Williams, and fraudulently appropriated thereout to his own use 2*s.* 4*d.*, being the excess of the sum represented in the pay-sheet. On that footing this case steers clear of the difficulty which has arisen in many of the cases, for upon this evidence there was a misappropriation of the very moneys he received from his master. It is now contended that the money was obtained by false pretences in the first instance, but that was a question for the jury. Independently of that, a second point was taken as to the condition of the money at the time of the misappropriation. Was it the property of the master? The money handed over to the prisoner through the hands of the cashier remained the property of the master, and though in the actual possession of a servant, was in the constructive possession of the master. Under these circumstances a servant stands in a different position to a bailee at common law. A bailee is possessed of certain rights over property entrusted to him, but a servant's possession is the constructive possession of his master, and at common law he is guilty of larceny if he fraudulently appropriates his master's property to his own use. In some cases, where a servant received money from third persons on account of his master, it was formerly said there was no constructive possession in the master, and the statutes relating to embezzlement were passed to meet those cases Reg. v. Watts (2 D. & P. 14) was an instance of that. There the prisoner, being a servant, and the money received being his masters', and constructively in their possession at the time the prisoner appropriated it, the prisoner was guilty of larceny. In this case the money remained in the possession of the prisoner, and then whose money was it? Why, the master's. At the time when the prisoner took possession of the 2*s.* 4*d.* and appropriated that money, whose money was it? I answer, the master's; and therefore it seems to me that the prisoner was guilty of larceny, and that there was abundant evidence in support of this. As to the case of Reg. v. Thompson, that proceeded altogether on the ground whether there was larceny in the first instance, but that does not touch the second point here. No point was made there as to the effect of the Bailee Act, or that the possession of the prisoner was that of a servant. The moment it is established that it is a misappropriation of money entrusted to a servant, the case falls within Reg. v. Goode and similar cases. The case of Reg. v. Prince was not a case of master and servant, and is therefore distinguishable. I therefore think the conviction was right.

Willes, J.—I merely wish to refer, in confirmation of the Lord Chief Justice's judgment, to a passage very much in point in Russell on Crimes, p. 388, where the case of Reg. v. Murray is stated thus: "So, if money has been in the possession of the master by the hands of one of his clerks, and another of his clerks receives it from such clerk and embezzles it, it is larceny. The prisoner was a clerk in the employ of A., and received 3*l.* of A.'s money from another clerk, that he might pay for inserting an advertisement. He paid 10*s.*, and charged A. 20*s.*, fraudulently keeping back the difference. And upon a case reserved it was held that this was not embezzlement, because H. had had possession of the money by the hands of the other clerk, and Mr. Greaves, in a note, adds, "ergo, it was larceny."

The other judges concurred.

Neglect to provide child with proper food—Ability of parent to provide—Evidence—Indictment.

An indictment alleged in the first count that the prisoner unlawfully and wilfully neglected and refused to provide sufficient food for her infant child, she being able and having the means to do so. The second count charged that the prisoner unlawfully and wilfully neglected and refused to provide her infant child with necessary food, but there was no allegation that she had the ability or means to do so.

The jury returned a verdict of guilty on the ground that if the prisoner had applied (to the guardians) for relief she would have had it:

Held, that neither count was proved, as it was not enough that the prisoner could have obtained the food on application to the guardians.

Quære, whether the second count is good in law.

Case reserved for the opinion of this court by the Recorder of the borough of Plymouth.

At the General Quarter Sessions of the Peace for the Borough of Plymouth, held on Friday, 30th Dec. 1870, a bill of indictment was preferred against Florence Rugg in the following form:—

Borough of Plymouth.—The jurors for our Lady the Queen upon their oath present, that Florence Rugg, single woman, of the borough of Plymouth aforesaid, on the 20th Nov. 1870, was the mother of one Mary Jane Rugg, an infant of tender years, to wit, of the age of five years; and that the said Mary Jane Rugg was then and there under the care, dominion, and control of the said Florence Rugg, and wholly unable to provide for herself; and that on the day and year aforesaid, and on divers other days and times, as well before as after that day, it was the duty of the said Florence Rugg to protect shelter and nourish the said Mary Jane Rugg, she, the said Florence Rugg, being able and having the means to perform and fulfil her said duty; and the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, further present that the said Florence Rugg, well knowing the premises and not regarding her duty in that behalf, on the said 20th Nov. 1870, and on divers other days and times, as well before as after that day, in the borough aforesaid, did unlawfully and wilfully neglect and refuse to find the said Mary Jane Rugg with sufficient meat, drink, wearing apparel, bedding, and other necessaries proper and requisite for the sustenance, support, clothing, covering, and resting the body of the said Mary Jane Rugg, by means whereof the said Mary Jane Rugg became weak, sick, and ill, and greatly emaciated in her body, against the peace of our said Lady the Queen, her crown and dignity.

Second count:

And the jurors aforesaid upon their oath present, that the said Florence Rugg on the 20th Nov. 1870, and on divers other days and times, as well before as after that day, in the borough aforesaid, being the mother of one Mary Jane Rugg, an infant of tender years, to wit, of the age of five years, under the care, dominion, and control of the said Florence Rugg, and wholly unable to provide for herself, unlawfully and wilfully did neglect and refuse to find and provide for the said Mary Jane Rugg sufficient meat, drink, wearing apparel, bedding, and other necessaries proper and requisite for the sustenance, support, clothing, covering and resting the body of the said Mary Jane Rugg, by means whereof the said Mary Jane Rugg became weak, sick, and ill, and greatly emaciated in her body, against the peace of our said Lady the Queen, her crown and dignity.

Third count:

And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, do further present, that the said Florence Rugg, on the 20th Nov. 1870, in and upon one Mary Jane Rugg, did make an assault, and her the said Mary Jane Rugg did then beat, wound, and illtreat, and other wrongs to the said Mary Jane Rugg, then did to the great damage of the said Mary Jane Rugg, against the peace of our said Lady the Queen, her crown and dignity.

The grand jury, on delivering the bill to the clerk of the peace, declared that they returned a true bill, but their indorsement on the bill was in the following words:

We find a true bill against Florence Rugg, for not providing food for her child.

John Plimsaul, Foreman.

Inadvertently the special indorsement had not been called to the attention of the court till after the grand jury had been discharged and had dispersed and left the court.

The defendant was arraigned on the whole indictment and pleaded not guilty, and was tried and found guilty on the first two counts, but the jury added in giving their verdict,

We do so on the ground that if she had applied (to the guardians) for relief she would have had it.

There was no evidence of an assault.

Clarke prosecuted for the guardians of the poor.

The prisoner was undefended.

Judgment was postponed, and the following questions reserved for the consideration and decision of this court, viz.:—First, whether the presentment of the grand jury was sufficient? (R. v. Cooke, 8 C. & P. 582.) Secondly, if it were, whether upon the verdict given on the ground alleged by the jury the Recorder ought not to have directed an acquittal? (R. v. Chandler, 1 Dears. C. C. R. 453.)

No counsel appeared on either side.

Bovill, C. J.—In this case the prisoner was indicted for not providing food for her infant child. In the first count it is alleged that the prisoner unlawfully and wilfully neglected and refused to find the infant with sufficient food, &c., she, the prisoner, being able, and having the means to perform and fulfil her said duty, to protect, shelter, and nourish the infant. The second count states that the prisoner unlawfully and wilfully neglected and refused to provide for her infant sufficient meat, &c., but did not contain any allegation of ability on the part of the prisoner to provide sufficient meat, &c. The grand jury returned a true bill against the prisoner "for not providing food for her child." Assuming that they intended to negative the charge of assault in the third count, the grand jury may be taken to have found a true bill on the first two counts. We have to consider the effect of the verdict of the petit jury on the first two counts. They found a verdict of guilty, but added, "we do so on the ground that if she had applied" (to the guardians) "for relief, she would have had it." The case of Reg. v. Chandler shows that that finding was not sufficient to maintain the first count of the indictment, which contains the allegation of ability and means on the part of the prisoner. On the second count of the indictment, assuming that count to be good, which we doubt, the allegation is, that the prisoner unlawfully and wilfully did neglect and refuse to find and provide her child with necessary food, &c., but there is no allegation that the prisoner had the means of procuring, or could have procured it, and wilfully abstained from doing so. That allegation in that count is not found by the jury. On these grounds we are of opinion that the conviction should be quashed.

The rest of the Court concurring,

Conviction quashed.

Reg. v. Ardley.

False pretences—What amount to—False statement of fact.

The prisoner induced the prosecutor to buy a chain by knowingly and falsely asserting (inter alia) "it is 15 carat fine gold, and you will see it stamped on every link." In point of fact, it was little more than 6 carat.

Held, that the above assertion was sufficient evidence of the false representation of a definite matter of fact to support a conviction for false pretences.

Case reserved for the opinion of this court by the chairman of the court of quarter sessions for the county palatine of Durham.

John Ardley was tried before me at the winter sessions held for the county of Durham on the 2nd Jan. 1871, for obtaining 5*l.* and an Albert chain of the value of 7*s.* 6*d.* by false pretences. The first count of the indictment was in these words:

The jurors for our Lady the Queen upon their oath present that John Ardley on the 31st day of October, A.D. 1870, unlawfully, knowingly, and designedly did falsely pretend to one Thomas Wakefield that a certain Albert chain which he the said John Ardley then asked the said Thomas Wakefield to buy from him the said John Ardley, was of 15-carat gold, and that he the said John Ardley was then a draper and that the said chain had been made expressly for him the said John Ardley, by means of which said false pretences the said John Ardley did then unlawfully obtain from the said Thomas Wakefield a certain sum of money, to wit, 5*l.*, and a certain other Albert chain of the value of 7*s.* 6*d.*, with intent to defraud, whereas in truth and in fact the said Albert chain which he the said John Ardley then asked the said Thomas Wakefield to buy from him the said John Ardley as aforesaid was not of 15-carat gold. And whereas in truth and in fact he the said John Ardley was not then a draper; and whereas in truth and in fact the said chain had not been made expressly for him the said John Ardley as he the said John Ardley well knew at the time when he did so falsely pretend as aforesaid, against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our lady the Queen, her crown and dignity.

The material facts were as follows.

The prisoner went into the shop of the prosecutor, who was a watchmaker and jeweller, and stated that he was a draper, and was 5*l.* short of the money required to make up a bill, and asked the prosecutor to buy an Albert chain, which he (the prisoner) was then wearing. The prisoner said, "It is 15-carat fine gold, and you will see it stamped on every link. It was made for me, and I paid nine guineas for it. The maker told me it was worth 5*l.* to sell as old gold."

The prosecutor bought the chain, relying, as he said, on prisoner's statement, but also examining the chain, and paid 5*l.* for it, and gave also to the prisoner, in part payment, a gold Albert chain, valued at 7*s.* 6*d.*

The prisoner's chain was marked "15-carat" on every link. And in a very short time afterwards he (the prisoner) was apprehended, and then wore another Albert chain, of a character similar to that sold to the prosecutor, this also being marked "15 carat" on every link.

It was proved that "15-carat" was a Hall mark used in certain towns of England, and placed on certain articles made of gold of that quality, and that chains, when assayed, are generally found to be 1 grain less than the mark, exceptionally 2 grains.

The chain bought by the prosecutor was assayed, and found to be of a quality a trifle better than 6 carat gold, and of the value in gold of 2*l.* 2*s.* 9*d.* It was proved that had it been 15 carat gold, it would have been worth 5*l.* 10*s.* Adding the charge for what is called "fashion" or "make," and the price of a locket attached, the chain bought by the prosecutor would be sold for 3*l.* 0*s.* 3*d.*, but had it been 15 carat, it would have been sold for 9*l.*

There were no drapery goods or anything connected with such trade found on the prisoner; but when arrested he had in his possession a licence to sell plate, two watches, two white metal watch guards, and the chain obtained from the prosecutor.

I was asked by counsel for the prisoner to stop the case on the authority of Reg. v. Bryant, (D. & B. 265). This I declined to do, and left the case to the jury, who found the prisoner guilty, and, in answer to me, said they found that the prisoner knew he was falsely representing the quality of the chain as 15 carat gold.

The question for the opinion of this honourable court is whether or not the prisoner was rightly convicted of obtaining money under false pretences.

JOHN R. DAVISON.

Jan. 21, 1871.

No counsel was instructed for the prisoner.

Edge for the prosecution.—The conviction was right. The case is within the principle of Reg. v. Dundas, 6 Cox C. C. 380, where the prisoner was convicted of falsely pretending that blacking labelled "Everett's Premier" sold by him to the prosecutor was "Everett's Premier" blacking. Erle, J. there told the jury, "That it was of little consequence whether the prisoner's name was Everitt, as he had stated, or not, for even if it were, and he went about the country and offered blacking for sale as Everett's Premier, representing it to be the well-known article of that name, knowing that it was not so, and intending to cheat the prosecutor by passing upon him a spurious article as the true one, his conduct was equally fraudulent." So here 15-carat gold was marked on each link, and the prisoner pretended not merely to sell a gold chain, but one of 15-carat gold. In Reg. v. Goss and Reg. v. Ragg (29 L. J. 86, M.C.), it was held that a false representation of an alleged matter of definite fact, knowingly made, whether in the course of a bargain or not, is a false pretence within the statute. In Reg v. Ragg the prisoner obtained money by falsely representing that he had delivered 15cwt. of coal when he knew that he had only delivered 8cwt. That is very like this case, for the representation was that the chain was 15-carat gold when it was only a little more than 6-carat gold. Reg. v. Bryant was decided on the ground that the false statement was not of a definite triable fact but matter of opinion, and the judges said that if the prisoner in that case had represented the spoons as Elkington's A, it would have been a different thing, but his statement was only that they were equal to Elkington's A. In Reg. v. Jessup (D. & B. 443; 7 Cox C. C. 399), a person who fraudulently offered a one pound note as a note for 5*l.*, and got it changed upon that representation, was convicted for obtaining money by false pretences, although the person to whom it was passed could read, and the note upon the face of it afforded the means of detecting the fraud. The following authorities were also cited:

Reg. v. Roebuck, D. & B. 24; 7 Cox C. C. 126;
Reg. v. Stevens, 1 Cox. C. C. 83;
Reg. v. Woolley, 1 Den. C. C. 563; 4 Cox C. C. 191.

Greenhow (amicus curiæ), having been counsel for the prisoner at the trial, referred to
Reg. v. Ridgway, 3 F. & F.

BOVILL, C.J.—At the conclusion of the case the learned chairman was asked to stop the case, on the authority of Reg. v. Bryant. The question for the court at that stage was, whether there was any evidence in support of the charge to go to the jury? The court declined to stop the case, on the ground that there was. The evidence was left to the jury, and the prisoner was found guilty. It seems to me that it was quite impossible to stop the case on the evidence as it stood, because there was a distinct statement of a fact, and evidence that it was false. The prisoner not only made a representation with respect to the quality, but he made the statement in order to induce the prosecutor to purchase the chain. He went into the prosecutor's shop and stated that he was a draper, and was 5*l.* short of the money required to make up a bill, and asked the prosecutor to buy a chain. He said it was "15-carat fine gold, and you will see it stamped on every link;" that it was made for him, and that he paid nine guineas for it, and that the maker had told him it was worth five guineas to sell as old gold. All these are statements in addition to that with respect to the quality. And there was clear evidence to negative them, and they were made for the purpose of inducing the prosecutor to purchase the chain, and so of defrauding him. The case seems to come distinctly within the statute if the jury are satisfied that the statements are false and fraudulent. But the case does not depend on that alone, for there was evidence that the prisoner was not a draper; but there was found in his possession a licence to sell plate, certain articles of jewellery, and he was wearing another Albert chain similar to that sold to the prosecutor, and marked 15-ct. on every link. There was, therefore, evidence to negative the whole statement he made as to matters of fact, and the jury expressly found that the prisoner knew he was falsely representing the quality of the chain as 15-carat gold. The authorities draw nice distinctions between what is a statement of fact and what is matter of opinion or exaggerated praise. It is difficult in many cases for the court to come to the conclusion as to what is a matter of opinion and exaggerated praise, or what is a matter of fact; but the judge must consider those matters, and tell the jury not to convict for mere matter of opinion and exaggerated praise, and that the false statements of matters of fact must be made with the intention to defraud. In the case of Reg. v. Bryant the prisoner represented that certain spoons were equal to Elkington's A, not that they were Elkington's A, but equal to Elkington's A. Primâ facie that seems the expression of a matter of opinion and not one of fact, but at all events it was open to that construction. Though it was there decided that the conviction could not be supported, yet many of the judges expressed the opinion that it might be the subject of false pretences, although a false statement was made with reference to the quality of the article, if the statement was false to the knowledge of the party and made with the intention to defraud. Cockburn, C.J. said in the course of his judgment: "If the person had represented these articles as being of Elkington's manufacture, when in point of fact they were not, and he knew it, that would be an entirely different thing; but the representation here made was only a vaunting and exaggerating of the value of the article in which he was dealing by representing it to be in quality equal to a particular manufacture." Pollock, C.B. said: "I think if a tradesman or a merchant were to concoct an article of merchandise expressly for the purpose of deceit and were to sell it as and for something very different, even in quality from what it was, the statute would apply." So that a statement as to the character of an article but which is in fact a misrepresentation of the quality, is not sufficient, but a misrepresentation as to the quality is sufficient if it is known that it is not the quality which it is pretended to be. Coleridge, J., said, "I agree with the Lord Chief Baron in the latter part of his observations, as it seems to me it would be a dangerous thing to say that there could be no fraudulent misrepresentation within the statute in the course of an ordinary transaction of buying and selling. . . . It seems to me to be a safe rule to say, where it applies simply to the quality, and is only in the nature of an exaggeration on the one hand or a depreciation on the other which too frequently takes place even in tolerably honest transactions between parties, this is not the subject of a criminal proceeding." Erle, J. treated the representation as a misrepresentation on a matter of opinion rather than of a definite matter of fact, and on that ground decided against the conviction. He said, "No doubt it is difficult to draw the line between the substance of the contract and the praise of an article in respect of a matter of opinion; still it must be done, and the present case appears to me not to support a conviction on the ground that there is no affirmation of a definite triable fact in saying the goods were equal to Elkington's A., but the affirmation is of what is mere matter of opinion and falls within the category of untrue praise in the course of a contract of sale, where the vendee has in substance the article contracted for, namely, plated spoons." His Lordship then referred to the judgment of Crompton, J. The opinion of my brother Willes, carefully and elaborately given in that case, goes to the effect that a misrepresentation of quality made with intent to defraud is within the statute. Bramwell, B., also was in favour of a conviction in that case. Applying those observations to the case before us, how does it stand? The statement made by the prisoner was not one of mere opinion or exaggerated praise, or an opinion as to its probable quality, but it was a distinct statement that the chain was 15-carat fine gold, untrue to the knowledge of the prisoner, and of which there was abundant evidence. How different it is to the case where a man manufactures a chain, knows it is of a different standard of gold, and yet goes and misrepresents the standard. This case is distinguishable from Reg v. Bryant, for here there was a distinct statement of a matter of fact false to the knowledge of the prisoner and made by him with intent to defraud. The conviction therefore was correct, and must be affirmed.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The majority of the judges in Reg. v. Bryant held that if the statement of the prisoner had been that the electro-plate was Elkington's A. it would have been sufficient within the statute.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. We are not infringing on the authority of Reg. v. Bryant, which was decided on the principle that simplex commendatio is not criminal.

CHANNELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. I decide that the conviction is good on the ground that the learned chairman was not bound to stop the case, and that there was evidence for the jury in support of the prosecution.

PIGOTT, B.—I am of the same opinion. It was not intended to bring within the criminal law any mere statement of matter of opinion, however strongly expressed; but in this case I think there was a false statement of a fact knowingly made for the purpose of defrauding the prosecutor.

Conviction affirmed.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

Reported by DOUGLAS KINGSFORD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Nov. 16, 18, and 25, 1870.

(Present: The Right Hon. the LORD CHANCELLOR, The Archbishop of YORK, and Lord CHELMSFORD.

MARTIN v. MACKONOCHIE.

Monition of the Privy Council—Motion to enforce obedience—Elevation of the cup and paten—Prostration—Literal compliance—Intention—Previous disobedience—Sentence.

By a monition of the Privy Council the respondent was commanded to abstain from the elevation of the cup and paten above his head during the administration of the Holy Communion, and from kneeling or prostrating himself before the consecrated elements during the Prayer of Consecration. On a motion to enforce obedience to the above monition, it appeared that the respondent, or his curates, had during the Prayer of Consecration elevated wafer bread, taken out of the paten, above the head, and had also elevated the cup so that its rim was some inches above the head. The respondent, however, while admitting that he had attempted only to obey the letter of the monition, stated that the elevation above the head was unintentional and unconscious. It further appeared that the respondent had, during the Prayer of Consecration, bowed down towards the table, remaining some seconds in that position, after replacing the wafer and the cup respectively on the table.

Held, that the respondent had been guilty of disobedience to the monition:—First, in respect to elevation, because, since he intended to render a mere literal obedience to the precise letter of the monition, he must be made accountable for an actual non-compliance with the terms of the monition, whatever his intention to obey it might have been; secondly, in respect to prostration, because, though a reverential bow would not be an act of prostration, yet the posture assumed and maintained for some seconds by the respondent was not a mere bow, but a humble prostration of the body in reverence and adoration.

The respondent, having been on a former occasion declared to have disobeyed this same monition, was now, on a repetition of the offence, suspended for three months from all clerical duties, and condemned in costs.

THIS was a motion to enforce obedience to a monition of the Privy Council, dated Jan. 19, 1869, by which the respondent, the Rev. A. H. Mackonochie, incumbent of St. Alban's, Holborn, was commanded to abstain (among other things) from the elevation of the cup and paten above his head, and from kneeling or prostrating himself before the consecrated elements during the Prayer of Consecration. Long affidavits in support of and in answer to the charge of disobedience to the monition in the above particulars were filed. The purport of these and of the statements of the respondent in cross-examination, is sufficiently given in the judgment post.

The monition referred to, and proceedings against the respondent on a similar motion in Dec. 1869, will be found in 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 512.

Dr. Stephens, Q.C., Archibald, Currie, and Shaw, were for the appellant in support of the motion.

Judgment was delivered by Lord CHELMSFORD.—This is an application against the Rev. Alexander Heriot Mackonochie, perpetual curate of the parish of St. Alban's, Holborn, for disobedience to a monition founded upon an Order in Council of the 19th Jan. 1869, by which he was commanded (amongst other things) to abstain for the future from the elevation of the cup and paten during the administration of the Holy Communion, and from kneeling or prostrating himself before the consecrated elements during the Prayer of Consecration. A previous application for disobedience to the monition in these particulars was made against Mr. Mackonochie, upon which their Lordships expressed an opinion that the monition had been disobeyed with reference to kneeling during the Prayer of Consecration, and condemned him in costs: (21 L, T. Rep. N. S. 512.) Upon that occasion their Lordships explained the way in which the article of charge with respect to the elevation of the cup and paten came to be worded as it was. The article, as it was originally framed, was objected to as vague and general, and was ordered to be reformed. The article, as reformed, charged Mr. Mackonochie with having elevated the paten and the cup above his head during the Prayer of Consecration. It was quite unnecessary to charge an elevation of the paten and the cup to the extent described in the reformed article, because the 28th of the Articles of Religion prohibits all elevation of the elements, declaring that "the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not by Christ's ordinance reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshipped." So the elevation of the paten and cup need not have been charged to have taken place during the Prayer of Consecration. It would have been sufficient to have stated it to have occurred during the administration of the Holy Communion. But the charge having been thus precisely framed (however unnecessarily), the specific offence to be proved against Mr. Mackonochie was not simply an elevation of the cup and paten, but an elevation of them above his head at the particular period of the administration when the Prayer of Consecration was being read. Upon the original hearing before the Dean of the Arches, he pronounced that Mr. Mackonochie had offended in the terms of this article, and monished him to abstain for the future from the elevation of the cup and paten during the administration of the Holy Communion as pleaded in the articles. There was no appeal from this part of the sentence. In the monition which followed the appeal to this committee from the rest of the sentence of the learned judge of the Arches Court, Mr. Macknochie is commanded to abstain from the elevation of the cup and paten during the administration of the Holy Communion; but upon the former application against Mr. Mackonochie for disobedience to this monition, their Lordships were of opinion that the words "as pleaded in the articles," must be understood as being in the monition, and, therefore, that the prohibited elevation was confined to the degree and the time charged in the article. The unnecessary particularity in the wording of this article of charge afforded Mr. Mackonochie the opportunity of which he availed himself, to obey the monition to the letter, and still to continue to elevate the cup and paten during the administration of the Holy Communion, but not above his head, nor during the Prayer of Consecration. Their Lordships were therefore compelled, upon the evidence produced upon the former application against Mr. Mackonochie, to come to the conclusion that he had not disobeyed the monition in this respect, but they took care "to have it distinctly understood that they gave no sanction whatever to a notion that any elevation of the elements, as distinguished from the mere act of removing them from the table and taking them into the hand of the minister, was sanctioned by law." Upon another charge of disobedience to the monition, Mr. Mackonochie was not so successful upon the former occasion in protecting himself by a supposed literal compliance with its terms. He was commanded not to kneel or prostrate himself before the consecrated elements during the Prayer of Consecration. He admitted that it was his practice "during the Prayer of Consecration reverently to bend one knee at certain parts of the prayer, and that occasionally in so doing his knee momentarily touched the ground, but that such touching of the ground was no part of the act of reverence intended by him. And he contended that this genuflection, unless the knee reached the ground, was not kneeling. Their Lordships, however, expressed a clear opinion that bowing the knee in the manner described by Mr. Mackonochie was kneeling, and that it was not necessary a person should touch the ground in order to perform such an act of reverence as will constitute kneeling." Their Lordships thought it right, upon this occasion, to express a hope that Mr. Mackonochie would learn "that mere literal compliance with the monition in a merely evasive manner would not suffice." And they observed that "literal compliance with regard to the actual limits of the order was of course all that he was held to by law, and for obedience to the spirit of the order they could only trust to his own feelings and his own conscience." Mr. Mackonochie is now again before their Lordships upon complaint of acts of disobedience to the monition similar to those with which he was charged upon the former occasion. The appellant prays their Lordships to declare that Mr. Mackonochie has not complied with the monition, inasmuch as: First, he knowingly and habitually sanctions the elevation of the paten and cup above the head of the officiating clergyman in the Prayer of Consecration;—Secondly, that he knowingly and habitually sanctions kneeling or prostration before the consecrated elements during the Prayer of Consecration. The affidavits filed on behalf of the appellant describe the acts done by the officiating clergyman during the administration of the Holy Communion upon seven different Sundays in the months of Dec. 1869, and Jan. and Feb. 1870. As the affidavits on the other side do not deny the general correctness of the account of what took place upon these occasions (nor did Mr. Mackonochie in his cross-examination), it may be assumed that they describe what is the ordinary course pursued in the administration of the Holy Communion in the Church of St. Alban's. It appears, then, that the practice is that, upon the officiating clergyman reaching the solemn words of institution in the Prayer of Consecration, he drops his voice so as to be nearly inaudible, and a bell begins to toll; that he then elevates (not the paten, but) a wafer, and replacing it upon the communion table bows his head down towards the table and remains for some seconds in this position; that he then elevates the cup and replacing it on the table bows down as before, after which the administration of the elements commences. The appellant alleges that on the days mentioned in the affidavits which he has filed, the paten and cup were elevated above the head of the officiating clergymen during the Prayer of Consecration; and that during the same prayer there was kneeling or prostration before the consecrated elements. To begin with his case as to the elevation of the cup and paten, the appellant has distinctly proved that, upon each of the seven Sundays mentioned in the affidavits, the officiating clergyman during the Prayer of Consecration elevated a large wafer bread above his head, and also during the same prayer elevated the cup, so that its rim was some inches above his head. These statements are opposed by the affidavits of the clergymen who officiated upon the several Sundays mentioned in the appellant's affidavits. Mr. Howes, who was the officiating clergyman on four of the Sundays, denies that, on either of those days, he raised or elevated the paten or chalice above his head during the Prayer of Consecration, and adds that he had not consciously nor to the best of his knowledge done so since the practice was discontinued by Mr. Mackonochie after the 30th Dec. 1866. Mr. Stanton, who officiated on Sunday, the 26th Dec. 1869, swears that he did not intentionally elevate the paten or cup above his head in the Prayer of Consecration; and Mr. Willington, who officiated on two of the Sundays, states, positively, that he did not elevate the paten or cup above his head in the Prayer of Consecration. It is to be observed that these affidavits might, according to a possible view entertained by the reverend gentleman, be regarded by them as literally true, because the paten was not elevated by them but a wafer bread, and the whole of the cup was not raised above the head, but only the upper part of it. It appears from the cross-examination of Mr. Mackonochie that, after the institution of proceedings against him, he introduced the practice of elevating the wafer and not the paten. As he has confessed that his object upon every occasion has been merely to comply literally with the law, it was not unfair to presume that the change from the paten to the wafer was made in order that he might not be accused of elevating the paten. But Mr. Mackonochie stated to their Lordships (and they accept his statement) that "he has in no way sheltered himself behind the difference between the wafer and the paten, but has treated the wafer as the paten, and considered the elevation of the wafer as equivalent to the elevation of the paten." It is sufficient, therefore, to say that, if any such distinction had been attempted, it could not have been successful, as the elevation which is unlawful is that of the consecrated bread itself, and not of the paten in which it is placed. Again, there can be no doubt that the elevation of any part of the cup above the head is an elevation to that extent of the cup itself. This Mr. Mackonochie very properly admitted in his cross-examination. He said, "The cup is the whole cup; to raise any part of the cup above the forehead is to raise the cup above the forehead." Now, the conclusion to be drawn from this state of facts is, that Mr. Mackonochie, having determined to yield the merest literal obedience to the precise letter of the monition, had resolved that neither he nor his curates should elevate the paten or the cup above their heads during the Prayer of Consecration; but, in consequence of the difficulty of keeping to the exact degree of elevation intended, the officiating clergyman unconsciously and unintentionally elevated the wafer and the cup to the extent mentioned in the affidavits. But if Mr. Mackonochie has been (as he admitted) "carefully scanning the monition and the Order in Council to see how he could keep exactly within them," and has been acting upon his understanding "that legal judgments should be interpreted according to their letter," he has no right to complain of the letter if the monition is applied against him, and he is made accountable for an actual non-compliance with its terms, whatever his intentions to obey it may have been. The act of elevation to the prohibited degree was witnessed; the secret intention could not be known. That the elevation charged took place during the Prayer of Consecration appears from the evidence of Mr. Mackonochie that the raising of the wafer and of the cup takes place after the words of institution in each kind; consequently, the wafer, at least, must be raised as the prayer is proceeding. The remaining charge to be considered against Mr. Mackonochie is, his sanctioning kneeling or prostration before the consecrated elements during the prayer of consecration. Their Lordships (as already mentioned) having upon the former occasion, when Mr. Mackonochie was charged with disobedience to the monition, decided that the genuflexion which he practised amounted to kneeling, Mr. Mackonochie, with the same object which he has always had in view, to pay only the closest literal obedience to the monition, gave notice to his curates that he intended thenceforth to bow without bending the knee at the part of the Prayer of Consecration where he had previously knelt. This intention he and his curates carried out, according to the description given in the affidavits, by bowing down towards the table after replacing the wafer upon it, and remaining some seconds in that position, and adopting the same course with respect to the cup. Mr. Mackonochie stated that upon some of these occasions his forehead may have touched the table, but that this was no part of the act of bowing, his object being merely a low bow. Their Lordships do not regard a reverential bow in the light of an act of prostration, as contended for by the learned counsel for the appellant; but the posture assumed and maintained for some seconds by Mr. Mackonochie is certainly not a mere bow, but a humble prostration of the body in reverence and adoration. Their Lordships consider that the charge against Mr. Mackonochie, of sanctioning prostration before the consecrated elements, is therefore fully proved. Their Lordships cannot refrain from expressing their great regret at the course which Mr. Mackonochie has thought himself justified in adopting in his proposed submission to the authority of the monition. He has (as he admitted in his cross-examination) "carefully scanned the monition and the Order in Council, to see" how nearly he could preserve the prohibited ceremonies, or, as he expressed it, "how far he could obey the law of the church" (or what he chooses to consider the law of the church) "without disobeying the law of the state." Mr. Mackonochie must be reminded that the right of the Church of England to ordain ceremonies is asserted by the 34th of the Articles of Religion, to which he has given his assent, and that none of the ceremonies which he practises are prescribed by the Church. In the attempt to satisfy his conscience, and to shelter himself under the narrowest literal obedience to lawful authority, Mr. Mackonochie has been a second time foiled. Upon the former occasion their Lordships, after expressing their opinion judicially that the monition had been disobeyed, did not think it necessary to do more to mark their disapprobation of Mr. Mackonochie's course of proceedings than by directing that he should pay the costs of the application. Upon this repetition of his offence, their Lordships think that they ought to proceed further. They therefore declare that Mr. Mackonochie has not complied with the monition in respect of the elevation of the paten or wafer, nor as abstaining from prostration before the consecrated elements. And they order that he be suspended for the space of three calendar months from the time of notice of the suspension, from all discharge of his clerical duties and offices, and the execution thereof: that is to say, from preaching the Word of God, and administering the Sacraments, and celebrating all other clerical duties and offices; and further, that he pay the costs of this application.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by M. W. MICKLEM, and H. H. HOCKLEY, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Jan. 23 and 24, 1871.

REG. v. CHAMPNEYS.

Rectory annexed to deanery—Severance—3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, s. 50—13 & 14 Vict. c. 94, s. 19.

By an Act of 4 & 5 Anne, intituled "An Act for augmenting the number of canons residentiary in the cathedral church of L., and for improving the deanery and prebends of the said cathedral," it was enacted that the rectory and church of T. should be united and annexed to the deanery of L. for ever, and that the Dean of L. then in being, upon application to the Bishop of L., should receive institution to the same without presentation, and continue possessed thereof in right of his deanery so long as he should remain dean, it being the object of the Act that the Dean of L. and his successors for ever should always be rectors of the church of T., on making allowances for a curate, &c.

By sect. 50 of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, it is provided that, "subject to the provisions herein contained all the estate and interest which the holder of any deanery or canonry . . . . and his successors have or would have in any lands, tithes, or other hereditaments or endowments whatsoever annexed or belonging to or usually held with such deanery or canonry (except any right of patronage), or whereof the rents and profits have been usually taken and enjoyed by the holder of such deanery or canonry as such holder separately, and in addition to his share of the corporate revenues of such chapter shall without any conveyance," &c., pass to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for the purposes of this Act:

Held, that this section did not disannex the rectory of T. from the deanery of L., and vest it in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, but that the Dean of L. was still entitled, under the above-mentioned statute of Anne, to receive institution to the rectory of T., without presentation:

Held also, that the Dean of L., on receiving such institution to the rectory of T., did not accept a benefice to take and hold with his deanery, within the meaning of 13 & 14 Vict. c. 94, s. 19.

THIS was an action commenced by a writ of summons issued in accordance with sect. 26 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1860, and indorsed with a notice as follows:—"The Attorney-General, on behalf of Her Majesty, intends to declare in quare impedit." Afterwards, by the consent of the parties and the order of a judge, the following case was stated, without pleadings, for the opinion of the court:

1. By a private Act, made and passed in the sessions of Parliament holden in the fourth and fifth years of the reign of her late Majesty Queen Anne, chapter 32, intituled "An Act for augmenting the number of Canons residentiary in the Cathedral Church of Lichfield, and for improving the Deanery and Prebends of the said Cathedral," reciting (inter alia) that Her Majesty, in consideration of the small income that arose to the dean out of the revenue of the said church, and the great charge he must necessarily undergo in the decent attendance upon his place and office, had been graciously pleased to permit that the rectory of Tatenhill, the perpetual advowson whereof Her Majesty was seised of in right of the Duchy of Lancaster, should be annexed to the said deanery, it is, by sect. 2, enacted as follows, that is to say:

Be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, that the said rectory and church of Tatenhill, whenever it shall by any lawful means first become void, shall be united and annexed to the said deanery of the church of Lichfield for ever, and the Dean of Lichfield then in being, upon application made to the bishop of the diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, shall receive institution to the same without presentation and continue possessed thereof in right of his deanery, so long as he shall remain Dean of Lichfield, and no longer, it being the intent of this Act that the Dean of Lichfield, and his successors for ever, should always be rectors and incumbents of that church on making such allowance to a curate or curates as the bishop for the time being shall appoint, the said dean for the time being, nevertheless, paying the first fruits at his instalment into the said deanery, and tenths yearly and all other dues after the same manner as all former incumbents or persons instituted into the said rectory have hitherto done.

2. By the statute 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, intituled, "An Act to carry into effect with certain Modifications the fourth Report of the Commissioners of Ecclesiastical Duties and Revenues," it is (by sect. 50) enacted as follows, that is to say:

Subject to the provisions herein contained, all the estate and interest which the holder of any deanery or canonry not suspended by or under the provisions of this Act, and his successors have and would have in any lands, tithes, and other hereditaments or endowments whatsoever annexed or belonging to, or usually held or enjoyed with such deanery or canonry (except any right of patronage), or whereof the rents and profits have been usually taken and enjoyed by the holder of such deanery or canonry as such holder separately, and in addition to his share of the corporate revenues of such chapter shall, without any conveyance or assurance in the law other than the provisions of this Act accrue to, and be vested absolutely in the ecclesiastical commissioners for England and their successors for the purposes of this Act.

3. By the statute 13 & 14 Vict. c. 94, intituled "An Act to amend the Acts relating to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners." It is (by the 19th section) enacted as follows, that is to say:

That no spiritual person appointed to the deanery of any cathedral or collegiate church after the 10th April 1850 shall accept to take and hold therewith any benefice not situate within the city or town of the cathedral or collegiate church in which he shall hold such deanery, and where any spiritual person so appointed after the said 10th day of April, holds at the time of his admission to such deanery any benefice not situate within such city or town, such benefice, unless sooner avoided, shall become void on the expiration of six calendar months from the time of his admission to such deanery. Provided always that the income of any benefice which may be holden with any such deanery shall in no case exceed the amount or sum of 500*l.* per annum.

4. On the 20th Nov. 1868 the defendant was by letters patent of that date, under the great seal, duly appointed by her Majesty dean of the said cathedral church of Lichfield.

5. The defendant accepted the said appointment and was afterwards, on the 15th Dec. 1868, duly installed and inducted into the said deanery with all its rights, members, and appurtenances.

6. The defendant upon his said installation, entered into the real, actual, and corporeal possession of the said rectory of Tatenhill, and claims to hold and retain the same in right of his said deanery, under the provisions of the said statute of Anne, and has, since his appointment to the said deanery, always been and is willing to make such allowance to a curate or curates of the said rectory as the bishop for the time being shall appoint, and to make all other payments and perform all such acts as are directed in and by the said statute.

7. The said rectory of Tatenhill is not situate within the city of the said cathedral church of Lichfield, in which the defendant holds the said deanery.

8. Since the Act of Queen Anne, referred to in the first paragraph of this case, the Dean of Lichfield for the time being has always held the rectory of Tatenhill, and received the tithes and emoluments of that benefice, but no institution of any dean to the rectory has ever in fact been made, and his title has been solely that derived from his appointment as dean, and his induction and installation as such.

The questions for the opinion of the court are—first, whether the said rectory of Tatenhill is united or annexed to the Deanery of Lichfield, so that the defendant, as Dean of Lichfield, can lawfully hold and retain the same. If the rectory cannot be so held, then, secondly, whether Her Majesty is entitled, in right of the Duchy of Lancaster, to present a new incumbent to the said rectory? or, thirdly, whether Her Majesty is entitled, in right of the Crown, to present a new incumbent to the said rectory?

Judgment is to be entered for the Crown or for the defendant in accordance with the answers to these questions, but without costs.

The Solicitor-General (Sir J. D. Coleridge) (Archibald with him), for the Crown.—The great object of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, was to make the emoluments attached to deaneries and canonries more uniform; and this object it was proposed to attain by depriving deans and canons of any separate estate which they held in addition to their shares of the corporate revenues of the dean and chapter, and by providing that, in certain cases where the income of the deans and canons amounted to more than a certain sum, such deans and canons should pay annually to the ecclesiastical commisioners as much as would leave to them the annual stipends fixed by the Act; and that, in other cases where the incomes of the deans and canons did not amount to a sum named, the commissioners should annually pay to them as much as would raise their stipends to that sum. The fund from which these payments were to come was to be made up of the proceeds of suppressed prebends, canonries and deaneries, and of the separate estates and emoluments attached to deaneries and canonries. The latter provision is found in the 50th section of the Act (supra). It is submitted that the words of that section include the present case of the rectory of Tatenhill. A rectory is an "hereditament" Savile v. Savile (Fortescue, 351), it is certainly an "endowment." It has been "usually held or enjoyed" with the deanery of Lichfield, and the "rents and profits have been taken and enjoyed" by the dean "separately and in addition to his share of the corporate revenues." Unless this construction of the Act be adopted, the general object of the Act which is to provide more uniform stipends for deans and canons, will not be attained in Lichfield. The word "rectory" includes the endowments belonging to it, the freehold of the chancel of the church and everything belonging to the rectory. [WILLES, J.—What becomes of the right of presentation?] It must revert to the Crown. [WILLES, J.—In that case would the presentee of the Crown take the bare rectory, or would he take the rectory with its emolument?] That would be a matter for future consideration. By the statute of Anne, not the advowson but the rectory was annexed to the deanery of Lichfield; the advowson has always remained with the Crown, but the right to use it has been suspended. The Act 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, was passed (as appears from the title and preamble) to carry into effect, with some alterations and modifications, the fourth report of the ecclesiastical commissioners; it is therefore useful to look at that report. (He here referred to some passages in the second and fourth reports of the commissioners, to show that they proposed to disannex the rectory of Tatenhill from the deanery of Lichfield). Moreover, the 19th sect. of 13 & 14 Vict. c. 94 disables the dean of Lichfield from holding this rectory, as it is not within the town of Lichfield and is worth more than 500*l.* a year.

Sir J. Karslake, Q. C. (Philbrick with him) for the defendant.—The stat. 4 & 5 Anne, c. 32, is not repealed by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, and the latter Act has no relation to the Dean of Lichfield in his capacity of rector of Tatenhill. The statute of Anne was passed for the purpose of augmenting the revenue of the Dean of Lichfield, and it did so by providing that the then dean and every succeeding dean should, without presentation, be rectors of Tatenhill. The question now is, whether the defendant, being Dean of Lichfield, is entitled under that statute to become, without presentation, rector of Tatenhill. The 50th section of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, does not deprive him of the right, for it speaks only of the "rents, tithes, hereditaments, or endowments . . . . whereof the rents and profits have been usually taken or enjoyed by the holder of such deanery or canonry, as such holder, separately," &c. In the present case, the defendant claims to take the profits annexed to the rectory, not as the holder of the deanery, but because he, being dean, becomes rector. He receives the emoluments of the rectory as appurtenant, not to the deanery, but to the rectory. With some exceptions, the Act 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, does not deal at all with rectories; the exception is the case of sinecure rectories, but there the Act is express as to what is to be done with any right of patronage concerning such rectories, and also as to the cure of souls, if any. In this case, nothing is said as to the patronage or as to the cure of souls, and the commissioners have no power to take the former or to make any provision for the latter. Again, the 50th section was to take effect at once, so that, if the contention of the Crown be correct, the Dean of Lichfield, at the time of the passing of the Act, ought to have been deprived of the rectory. Again, the sort of property that was to vest in the commissioners was property that could have been dealt with by them under the Act; but they could not have dealt with this rectory in that way. The case, then, according to the contention of the Crown, stands thus: the profits of the rectory are to go to the commissioners, the advowson is to go to the Crown, and if the Crown then present, the presentee is not to get any emolument except what the commissioners may choose to give him, they having no power to give him anything. What really was intended by the Act, especially by the 50th section, was this: there were many cases in which a dean or a canon held a particular part of the corporate estates of the dean and chapter, separately and in addition to his ordinary share of the corporate property, and it was the object of the 50th section to provide that where this was the case, such part so held should go to the commissioners. The language of the 67th section, where it speaks of the commissioners making "additional provision" for certain parishes, shows that it never was the intention of the Legislature to hand over a rich rectory to the commissioners, giving them power to take all the tithes, &c., of a particular place, and then re-grant a part. Moreover, not only do we find no express dealing with this case, but we do find that the Act makes express provision as to what is to be done in the two very similar cases of the rectory of Haseley, attached to the deanery of St. George, Windsor, and the prebend of Sawley, in the cathedral church of Lichfield, annexed to the rectory of St. Philip's, Birmingham. The case of Haseley is dealt with in the 43rd section, which makes express provision as to what is to be done with the rectory on its disannexation. The case of St. Philip's is dealt with in the 13th and 63rd sections. This circumstance goes far to show that the Legislature did not mean to include this case in the general language of the statute. As to the effect of 13 & 14 Vict. c. 94, s. 19, that has no application to the present case. It provides that "no spiritual person appointed to any deanery, &c., shall accept to take and hold therewith any benefice," &c. That applies to a case where a man, being dean, has the option of accepting or not any benefice that may be offered to him; it does not apply to this case, where the dean cannot be said to accept the rectory, but to become rector by virtue of an Act of Parliament. The statute 3 & 4 Anne, c. 32, is not repealed by either of the Acts of Victoria, and that being so, the defendant is entitled to this rectory.

The Solicitor-General in reply.

BOVILL, C.J.—By the statute 4 & 5 Anne, c. 32, which united several of the prebends of Lichfield and annexed one of the prebends to the bishopric, the rectory and parish church of Tatenhill, were united to the deanery of Lichfield for ever, and the then dean and every succeeding dean of Lichfield became, without presentation, rectors of Tatenhill and entitled, as such rectors and in right, as it seems to me, of the rectory, to the parish church with all rights, glebes, and other profits appurtenant to the rectory. If that Act is still in force and has not been affected by subsequent legislation, the present dean of Lichfield, having been duly appointed to the deanery, is now legally rector of Tatenhill, and as such rector entitled to the emoluments belonging to the rectory. But it is contended on behalf of the Crown, that the statute 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, and especially the 50th section of that Act, did in point of law repeal the statute of Anne, or at any rate interfered with its operation so far as the rectory of Tatenhill was concerned, and that the effect of this subsequent Act has been to vest something or another belonging to the rectory of Tatenhill (what, I will consider hereafter) in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and to revest the patronage of the rectory in the Crown. The Act of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, was no doubt passed to give effect, with certain modifications and exceptions, to the fourth report of the ecclesiastical commissioners, which is mentioned in the title and recited in the preamble of the Act, and has, therefore, been very properly brought to our attention. The report related principally to cathedral and collegiate churches and the officers connected therewith, and the cathedral church and the dean and chapter, and various officers of Lichfield are particularly referred to, both in the report and in the Act. The Act does not profess to carry out the whole of the scheme of the commissioners. Both the title and the preamble refer to certain modifications, so that it is impossible to say how far the Legislature intended to carry out the report. We must, therefore, be guided by the language of the Act, though some light is no doubt thrown upon the Act by the report which it recites. By the 13th section of the Act, two canonries of Lichfield were suspended, and in the same section it appears that one of these canonries was annexed to the rectory of the church of St. Philip in Birmingham. It has also been brought to our attention that the statute under which this rectory and the prebend of Lichfield were united was 7 Anne, c. 34, from which it appears that the prebend in question was the prebend of Sawley. By the 13th section of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, this prebend and the rectory of St. Philip's are detached from one another by express words. If the rectory had been detached simply, I should have expected to find some provision made for the cure of souls, not only as to the person to be appointed for that purpose, but also as to the fund destined for his remuneration. But in the present case, the emolument of the prebend ceases, because the prebend itself is suspended; so that the prebend being detatched and suspended, the rectory remained with all its incidents. Further provision for this case is made by the 63rd section, which has been referred to in the argument, which makes provision for the endowment of the rector of St. Philip's, Birmingham, out of the endowment of the suspended prebend. By the latter part of sect. 49, "the profits and emoluments arising from corporate revenues belonging to the canonries suspended in the cathedrals of Chester, Lichfield, and Ripon respectively, shall become, as the vacancies occur, part of the divisible corporate revenues of the said chapters respectively;" and by sect. 63 provision is made for the rector of St. Philip's, as before stated. By sect. 29, two rectories in Westminster are permanently annexed and united to two canonries there, and provision is made by which the holders of these canonries and their successors were to become ipso facto rectors of the respective parishes in question, to all intents and purposes. There is also an important provision in the Act, to which Sir John Karslake has called our attention, relating to the rectory of Haseley. That was annexed to the deanery of St. George's, Windsor, also by a statute of Anne. That part of this statute that relates to the rectory of Haseley is by the 43rd section expressly repealed, and it is there expressly declared, that the rectory of Haseley shall be absolutely detached and severed from the deanery of Windsor, and the patronage of the living is given to the dean and chapter of Windsor. We have, therefore, thus far two express enactments as to rectories to be severed from the cathedral dignities to which they were attached; and in each case we find a special provision for the purpose. Whilst I am upon the subject, I may refer to that part of the statute 13 & 14 Vict. c. 94, which relates to rectories attached to cathedral dignities, to show that where it is the intention of the Legislature to sever the one from the other, it is done by an express enactment. What was done in 1850 is not a certain guide as to the meaning of what was said in 1840; but the latter Act shows what the Legislature thought ought to be done when a rectory was severed from a dignity. Sect. 22 of 13 & 14 Vict. c. 94, applies to the case of certain benefits annexed to bishoprics. There, as in the case of Haseley and St. Philip's, Birmingham, there is an express enactment to effect the severance, and to provide what is to be done on the severance. There is also in 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113 a provision with respect to sinecure rectories. The 48th section provides that such rectories shall be suppressed, with a proviso to meet the cases of private patronage. These rectories being suppressed, there is a distinct enactment (sect. 54) as to what is to become of the "lands, tithes, or other hereditaments or endowments whatsoever" belonging to them, the same words being used as in sect. 50, in the interpretation of which some assistance may be derived from a consideration of this 54th section. The 50th section vests certain matters, which belonged to the deans and chapters, in the commissioners, but for the purposes of the Act, and subject to certain provisions. The general purposes of the Act appear from sects. 66 and 67 to be the provision of adequate stipends for deans and canons, and the making of additional provision for the cure of souls where such provision is most required. Then sect. 83 provides that the commissioners are to lay schemes before the Queen in council for carrying their recommendations into effect. By a subsequent Act (4 & 5 Vict. c. 39), a larger scope is given to the commissioners for carrying out the purposes of the Act. Now what is the true meaning of the 50th section? for it is on the interpretation to be put on the language of that section that our decision in the present case must depend. It must be remarked that one of the main purposes of the Act is to enable the commissioners to bring various descriptions of property into a common fund, and then form schemes for the application of it. The whole of this 50th section refers to property which may be convertible for the purposes of the Act. The words used, as I have before pointed out, are the same as those employed in connection with the suppressed rectories, and only refer to things in the nature of property, and, further, property held by persons in the character of deans or canons. The effect sought to be given to the section by the advisers of the Crown is, that it repeals the statute 4 & 5 Ann, c. 32, which annexed the rectory of Tatenhill to the deanery of Lichfield; that it transfers the emoluments of the rectory to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and entitles the Crown to resume the patronage of the living thus shorn of its emoluments. I am unable to concur in this view. First of all it appears to me that, if the Legislature had intended to repeal the statute of Anne, there would have been an express enactment for that purpose. I should have expected, moreover, that it would have made special provision as to the patronage of the rectory, especially as, wherever the Act does interfere with rights of patronage, it does make some express provision for the case. Again, some provision would have been made as to the cure of souls in the place, the person to be appointed to the rectory, and the curate. There is an utter absence of any such provision; while, on the other hand, we find that, where the Legislature has intended to deal with the parallel case of Haseley and the analagous case of St. Philip's, Birmingham, it has done so by special enactment, and has made express provision for all these matters. It is said that we do not know all the facts connected with the prebend of Sawley and St. Philip's, Birmingham, and that this is shown by comparing sect. 13, where the term canonry is used, with sect. 63, which speaks of a prebend. I cannot, however, concur in that. The prebend was united to the living by a statute of Anne, and the two have remained united ever since, and I think that the words canonry and prebend are used indifferently in the two sections, and that substantially the same thing is meant in each case. We find, then, that in these two cases the Legislature makes an express enactment, whereas none is made with reference to the present case. Again, when the Legislature has intended to vest the emoluments of rectories in the commissioners, as in the case of the sinecure rectories that are suppressed by the Act, there is an express enactment for the purpose (sect. 54). It is contended that the words used in sect. 50 are large enough to include "a rectory" in the widest signification of the word, not only the emoluments, but the whole thing—the church, church-yard, glebe, tithes, and all matters appurtenant. That is certainly a large construction to put upon the words. I do not know that the commissioners have vested in them any "rectory" in so wide a sense of the word. No similar instance is known. To have such property vested in them would be foreign to the office and position of the commissioners. Again, if "the rectory," in the widest sense of the word, passes under these words, then, as the whole thing passed by the statute of Anne to the deanery, one would expect the patronage to pass too. It is difficult to say if the rectory passes to the commissioners, that the Crown would be entitled to the patronage. It seems to me, moreover, that these words in the 50th section have a very different meaning. They refer to "lands, tithes, and other hereditaments or endowments" which belong to a deanery or canonry, and are held by the holder of a deanery or canonry as such holder, and the emoluments, which it is now contended pass to the commissioners, are emoluments which belong to the rectory of Tatenhill, and which are enjoyed by the dean of Lichfield, not as dean but as rector of Tatenhill. Again, if it had been intended to repeal the statute of Anne, by which this rectory is for ever annexed to the deanery, one would have expected to find some provision in the Act for the cure of souls in the parish; but not only is there no such provision, but the commissioners have no power to make any such provision. If it be said that, in the event of our deciding against the Crown, the case of the deanery of Lichfield will be unique, the answer is that in the event of our deciding in favour of the Crown, the case of the rectory of Tatenhill would be unique. For these reasons, I cannot think that the Legislature ever intended to repeal the statute of 4 & 5 Anne, c. 32, but am of opinion that the latter Act is still in force. The rule as to the construction of statutes couched in general terms is, that they do not repeal previous particular statutes, unless they use express words for the purpose, or show a clear intention to repeal them, or defeat them by necessary implication. We had occasion to consider this doctrine the other day in the case of Thorpe v. Adams (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 810), which is an authority to show that general words of doubtful import cannot have the effect of repealing the express provisions of a prior Act. I think, therefore, that this 50th section does not transfer the rectory of Tatenhill to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in the sense contended for by the Solicitor-General, nor does it transfer to them the emoluments of the rectory which are enjoyed by the dean of Lichfield as rector. The next point is that by 13 & 14 Vict. c. 94, s. 19, the Dean of Lichfield is disabled from holding the rectory. The words of the section are, that "no spiritual person, appointed to the deanery of any cathedral or collegiate church after," &c., "shall accept to take, and hold therewith any benefice not within" the cathedral town, and that the income of any benefice that may be holden with a deanery shall in no case exceed the amount or sum of 500*l.* per annum. It is contended that, in the present case, the defendant did "accept to take and hold" this rectory with his deanery. I think, however, that the enactment properly relates only to cases where a person, being dean, has the option of accepting or not. In the present case, the statute of 4 & 5 Anne, c. 32, not being repealed, the dean of Lichfield, on being appointed, unavoidably becomes rector—not because he accepts the rectory, but because by Act of Parliament the rectory is annexed to the deanery. Sect. 19 of 13 & 14 Vict. c. 94 applies only to a case where a dean voluntarily accepts a living. It was impossible, the statute of Anne not having been repealed, for the defendant to accept the deanery of Lichfield without thereby becoming rector of Tatenhill, the rectory being annexed to the deanery by Act of Parliament. On these grounds, I think that the case for the Crown fails on both points, and that our judgment must be for the defendant.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that the question in the present case turns altogether on the construction to be put upon sect. 50 of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, and that we must construe this section by the light afforded by the other provisions of the Act. Although the language of the section is no doubt wide enough to include such property as is claimed by the Crown in the present case, and in respect of which the present proceedings are founded, yet the language, though general, when construed according to the rule by which the general words in a conveyance are to be restricted to things of the character which the nature of the transaction or the rest of the instrument shows that it is the intention of the grantor should pass, must be restricted to such matters as the Legislature, throughout the rest of the Act, manifests an intention of vesting in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and being so restricted, will be found not to include the sort of property now in question. I am further of opinion that, assuming these words to be read in a sense so general as to include the rectory of Tatenhill, the effect of the section would be to vest that rectory with the right of presentation in the commissioners, and not to re-vest the patronage in the Crown. I might be content to let the matter rest there, and give judgment for the defendant accordingly; but that course would not be satisfactory to the parties, because, if it were shown that the rectory does not re-vest in the Crown, the question would then arise whether it does not vest in the commissioners. I therefore address myself to my first proposition, viz., that the general words of the 50th section, construed according to the true meaning of the Legislature as gathered from the rest of the Act, do not touch the right of the dean of Lichfield to this rectory. No rule is clearer, than that general words in any instrument cannot be made to include everything that they might embrace, simply because in some possible context they might bear so wide an interpretation. It is necessary to look at all parts of the instrument to see whether or not such general words are to have not only a general but a universal effect. Generality and universality are two very different things. I will give an illustration of my meaning in this respect, and then proceed to test the propriety of giving a universal effect to the words in sect. 50. Suppose a man makes a will, devising all his estates of a particular kind, say his estates in fee simple, to trustees, with the ordinary direction to pay debts and legacies. No words more general could be employed, for the words are general enough to include all the estates in fee simple which the testator had. Yet nothing is more obvious than this, that if the testator died possessed of estates in fee simple, some of which were his beneficially while others were held by him in trust, such a devise would include the former, but not the latter estates. If this proposition needed proof, I should cite the case of Reade v. Reade (8 T. R. 118). For the same reason, if the testator held a fee simple estate by way of mortgage, the words in the devise would be large enough to include it. Yet, for the reason that such an estate could not properly be applied by the trustees for the purposes of the trust, such an estate would not pass to them under the general words of the devise: (Roylance v. Lightfoot, 8 M. & W. 553). If that is so in the case of temporal property, by reason of the rule that a special application in the same instrument restricts the general words, à fortiori, the rule applies to church property, which is stamped not only with a trust of a temporal character, but has been consecrated to pious uses by a trust more sacred than the other, and which we are not at liberty to presume or fancy, or guess the Legislature to have intended to divest of that trust, although the Legislature has no doubt at various times passed special enactments altering the destination of property stamped with a trust of this sacred character. Moreover, in cases where the Legislature has dealt with property generally, and has not made special provision for the case of property held for religious uses, it has been held that the general words do not include such property, even though it be in part applicable for the purposes of the Act, lest the whole should be diverted from the objects of the trust, and turned to secular purposes: (Parry v. Jones, 1 C. B., N. S., 345.) Everybody knows that creditors may get at the property of a parson, being the proceeds of his benefice, under a judgment. But no writ can be issued to a sheriff to lay hands on church property; but it is necessary to address a writ of sequestration to the bishop, who then appoints an officer to collect the emoluments of the benefice, and devote them to the creditors, after deducting sufficient to make due provision for the support of the parson, and to defray certain necessary expenses, e.g., doing repairs, &c. Accordingly, when the statutes of bankruptcy or insolvency were first passed, it was found necessary to introduce a special provision to give the assignees power to apply to the bishop and obtain a sequestration. Therefore, I think it is only necessary to look at the Act, and see whether its special provisions, in respect of what it certainly intended should pass to the commissioners, or in respect of its subsequent directions to the commissioners as to the application of what is vested in them by the Act, are or are not consistent with the proposition that this rectory passes to them by sect. 50. I think that it will appear from a consideration of the Act (which seems to me to be arranged with the greatest possible care and learning, and to be most explicit in its provisions) that three things are clear: First, that it was not the intention of the Legislature to give the commissioners any ecclesiastical patronage; secondly, that it was not the intention of the Legislature to confer any benefit on the Crown at the expense of the Church, either in respect of patronage or otherwise; and, thirdly, that it was not the intention of the Legislature to interfere with any existing or active cure of souls. I think these propositions are established by a consideration of a great many sections of the Act; but it will be sufficient to refer to some which put them, to my mind, in a very clear light, and establish them very conclusively. I take it to be quite clear that the handing over of church property to other than spiritual persons is repugnant to the general principles of our law. No doubt, impropriations were made in very early times, but they were made by spiritual persons, and that being their origin, very many were converted into lay freeholds on the dissolution of the monasteries in the reign of Henry VIII. It is certain that before that time the Crown had the impropriation of such property as might be impropriated in favour of religious houses. The Crown was persona mixta, both lay and spiritual, and no one disputed its prerogative in this respect. It may be that by impropriations of that description the Crown, being in possession, might transfer its impropriations, just as it subsequently transferred the possessions of the dissolved monasteries. But it must be repugnant to anyone administering the law of the Church to suppose that where there is an existing cure of souls the property annexed to such cure should be transferred, as it is contended the property annexed to the rectory of Tatenhill is transferred by the 50th section, and that the patronage of such living should be vested in the hands of laymen, without any provision that they should use it for the benefit of the Church. With reference to the three propositions I have laid down, the first section of the Act to which I might refer is the 22nd, which deals with the case of certain non-residentiary officers, but does not affect the case of a dean. The next is the 28th, which deals in express terms with the case of any statute or custom for assigning to the dean or any canon any lands, &c., in addition to his share of the corporate revenues and proceeds to repeal and annul any such statute or custom. Thus, in this 28th section there is a special provision to abolish that which it was the intention of the Legislature to deal with, and what it abolishes is, not every statute by which property is appropriated to a dean or canon, but only the statutes made by the dean and chapter under customs, and the section exhausts itself with statutes relating to the corporate property. The 41st section is important. It takes away from deans and other individual members of chapters the separate patronage of all benefices with cure of souls, and vests it in the respective bishops of the dioceses in which the benefices respectively are situate. This, therefore, is a clear provision dealing with benefices with an active cure of souls; and it provides, not that the patronage of such benefices shall go back to whence it came, but that it shall vest in the bishop of the diocese. That is followed by a proviso that, where any benefice is possessed by a dean in right of any separate estate held by him as dean, every future dean of the same deanery, may, upon any vacancy of such benefice, present himself thereto. What is the meaning of this proviso? I will not stop curiously to investigate it; but it shows clearly that in the case of a dean who held a manor with an advowson belonging to it, in addition to his share of the corporate revenues, the manor would vest in the commissioners, but the advowson would not go either to the bishop or to the heirs of the original founder, but would remain with the dean with power for him to present himself to the benefice. I now come to the 43rd section, which deals with the rectory of Haseley, on which I will content myself with saying that I agree with the Lord Chief Justice. I now pass on to the 48th section, which appears to me taken together with the 54th section, conclusive as to my first proposition. It provides that sinecure rectories, to which no cure of souls belongs, shall be suppressed, and that the advowson of any such rectory shall be bought (if it belongs to a layman) by the commissioners, "and that upon the suppression of any such rectory as aforesaid, all ecclesiastical patronage belonging to the rector thereof, as such rector, shall be absolutely transferred to and vested in the original patron or patrons of such rectory." If ever there was an express provision in any Act, it is the 48th section of this Act read in connection with the 54th, because you have the section almost immediately preceding the 50th section dealing with rectories and advowsons, for the purpose of providing what shall be done with the latter on the former being suppressed. What is to happen on the suppression of a rectory without cure of souls? That is provided for by the 54th section, which provides that the endowments of suppressed rectories shall vest in the commissioners; the 48th section provides a special machinery for getting rid of the patrons and a special provision that, in certain cases, the patronage shall revert to the original patron. The 49th section deals with the profits of suspended canonries, vesting them in the commissioners. With this concentration of lights as to the intentions of the Legislature, I now come to the 50th section, which vests in the commissioners all the estate or interest which the holder of a deanery or canonry has in "any lands, tithes, or other hereditaments or endowments whatsoever annexed or belonging to or usually held or enjoyed with such deanery or canonry (except any right of patronage) or whereof the rents and profits have been usually taken and enjoyed by the holder of such deanery or canonry as such holder separately, and in addition to his share of the corporate revenues." The words of the section are conclusive as to my first proposition. Could the Legislature, when it thus excepted any right of patronage, intend to pass anything under this section of which patronage forms an essential part?—a part of anything, which in point of law is an entirety? There must be somebody to present to the living, unless it is still inseparably annexed to the deanery by the statute of Anne. But the right of presentation is inseparably annexed to the rectory, and some benefits are also inseparably annexed. They may be severed by violence or by Act of Parliament, but one would not expect the Legislature to effect the severance, unless some provision were made for the cure of souls, and some emoluments, probably also some land, provided for the rector. A rectory must be made up of two things—the beneficium and the officium. Can it be intended here to pluck the rectory, give the feathers to the Crown, and leave the substantial body to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners? Can any instance be given of such an effect being produced, except by the express provisions of sects. 48 and 54? I would not only rest my judgment on the absence of any special provision where one would most certainly expect to find it, but on the language of the section itself. I cannot throughout the Act see any trace of an intention to do that which would give patronage to the Crown, or confiscate property which was applicable and in use at the time for the cure of souls. No instance can be found of such a course being adopted in the whole series of Acts for the impropriation of church property. I do not purpose to go through the whole Act; but I will deal with the remaining sections with this general remark. If the emoluments of the rectory pass to the commissioners, I see no mode in which they are to deal with them, except that it is provided by the subsequent sections that they are to apply them as a sustentation fund for the cathedral clergy, which, having regard to the intention of the Legislature, as expressed in the other sections, would be a misappropriation of them. There is no instance, except in the case of a rectory without cure of souls, of property devoted to the cure of souls being taken away to augment the revenues of the cathedral clergy. I think I have said enough to illustrate the three propositions I laid down, from the first of which it clearly appears that the advowson of this rectory did not revert to the Crown. It would be a waste of words to show that it never was intended to give it to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. As to my second proposition, I have gone through the statute and heard the argument, and can find no evidence of an intention to confer any benefit on the Crown, though, in the 48th section, where it is intended to revest certain patronage in the original patrons, express words are used for the purpose; nor (and this relates to my third proposition) can I find any intention to take away the emoluments from an active cure of souls. All these propositions would be contradicted, unless we say that the general words of sect. 50 are so restricted as not to include the rectory in the present case. I am clearly of opinion that sect. 50 has not the effect of taking away the provision for the cure of souls, and that, in the case of a benefice like this of Tatenhill, we ought not to give such effect to sect. 50 as to deprive the rector of the emoluments that belong to the rectory. On the other point, as to the effect of 13 & 14 Vict. c. 94, sect. 19, I will say nothing, except that I entirely agree with what has fallen from the Lord Chief Justice.

M. SMITH, J.—I also think that our judgment should be for the defendant. The principal foundation for the argument of the Solicitor-General rests on the interpretation which he seeks to put upon the 50th section of the Act. The general words of that clause may no doubt be sufficiently large to include a rectory, but the general words must be restricted in signification, if the rest of the Act makes it necessary that they should be. The 50th section operates as a conveyance to the commissioners of certain property, and it is obvious that nothing is severed from the deanery which is not vested in the commissioners. It is also plain that the rectory of Tatenhill, which was annexed to the deanery of Lichfield by the statute of Anne, is the entire rectory, including the parish church, and cure of souls and all tithes and other emoluments belonging to the rectory. I do not find in 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, any intention to vest in the commissioners any property that is clothed with the duty of performing spiritual duties. If we were to hold that the whole rectory passed to the commissioners, we should be bound at the same time to determine that the freehold of the chancel of the church, and the churchyard was in them, and that the whole rectory had passed to them, whereas the Act makes no provision for the performance of the spiritual duties in such a case. Such a construction would be repugnant to the spirit of the whole of the rest of the Act. I will only mention the 54th section, which relates to the endowments of sinecure rectories, and the 55th section which enables the commissioners to vest certain lands, &c., the endowment of a suppressed rectory, in the vicar or perpetual curate of the place, if it shall appear expedient. It is obvious, therefore, that, in the case of sinecure rectories the Legislature, by the 55th section, made provision for the performance of spiritual duties by devoting an adequate endowment. If the Legislature is thus careful in the case of a sinecure rectory, can it be supposed to vest in the commissioners this rectory without making any provision at all for the cure of souls? I can only add that I fully concur with my Lord and my brother Willes, whose judgments have been so full, that I have nothing further to add. As for the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 94, it is hardly seriously contended by the Solicitor-General that the present defendant is within the direct operation of that Act. I do not think that the Act applies at all to this case, but only to a case where a dean voluntarily accepts a benefice, and has the option of accepting it or not. In the present case the dean, on accepting the deanery, ipso facto and without the exercise of his own will, becomes, if the statute of Anne is not repealed, rector of Tatenhill. Then it is said that it is inconsistent with the legislation referred to, that the rectory should remain annexed to the deanery; but the argument is not sufficiently strong to counteract the construction of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, as collected from its various provisions.

BRETT, J.—Unless the statute 4 & 5 Anne, c. 32, is repealed, the Dean of Lichfield is entitled to and possessed of the rectory of Tatenhill. The question is whether it is repealed by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, or 13 & 14 Vict. c. 94. The statute of Anne is a particular Act; those of the present reign are general. It is not expressly repealed by either, therefore it is still in force unless repealed by necessary implication. It is not repealed by implication, unless, upon a fair construction, the later enactments are inconsistent with it. To show that a particular Act is repealed by subsequent general Acts, it is not enough to show that the terms of the general Act are different in spirit to those of the particular Act; they must be shown to be directly inconsistent with it. That has not been shown here, so that I come to the conclusion that the statute of Anne has not been repealed. But I think that the terms of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, are not only not inconsistent with the statute of Anne, but that the case of the rectory of Tatenhill is not within it. Looking at the history of these Acts, following, as they did, the Acts relating to the bishops, I accept the view that the only property included in the terms of sect. 50 of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, is that which can be brought into a common fund under sect. 67, to be dealt with by the commissioners by a scheme to be laid by them before the Queen in council. If that be so, sects. 50 and 51 apply only to such property. The question, then, is whether a rectory is such property as could be thrown into the common fund. If so, the Crown might nominate a rector for the performance of the spiritual duties, but the commissioners would take the emoluments for the purposes of the Act. That view is, in my judgment, wholly inconsistent with the rest of the Act. I think that the cases cited by my brother Willes as to the application of the Bankruptcy Acts to church property, are very much in point to show that the Legislature must use express words, if it desires to reach property devoted to these religious purposes. Such express language is used in the Act now under consideration, in order to deal with the two analogous cases of Haseley and St. Philip's, Birmingham. I think, too, that the 28th section, dealing with the case of a dean or canon holding a separate estate in addition to his share of the corporate revenues, and the 48th and 54th sections, dealing with the case of the sinecure rectories suppressed by the Act, afford strong arguments to show that sect. 50 does not apply to the present case. As for the statute 13 & 14 Vict. c. 94, s. 19, I think, with my learned brothers, that that only applies to a case where a dean, being dean, might either accept or not, and that it does not apply to this case, where the dean becomes rector by force of an Act of Parliament.

CROWN CASES RESERVED.

Reported by JOHN THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Saturday, Jan. 28, 1871.

(Before BOVILL, C. J., CHANNELL, B., WILLES, J., BYLES, J., and PIGOTT, B.)

REG. v. LONDON.

Perjury—Indictment—Evidence.

An indictment for perjury charged that prisoner swore on a plaint in the County Court for the price of coals obtained on credit at different times, in which it was a material question whether or not the prisoner had received any coals on credit from P., either on account of himself or A., "that he had never received any coals on credit from P., either on account of himself or A.:"

Held, that the allegation in the indictment was not too general, although no specific instance was averred in which the prisoner had received coals on credit from P.

At the trial the prisoner was asked three or four times by the advocate and judge whether he did at any time, either on his own account or that of A., have any coals on credit from P., to which the prisoner always answered, "I did not."

Held, that the prisoner's attention was sufficiently called to the subject so as to found a charge of perjury upon the answer, although no distinct transactions on credit were suggested to him during his examination.

CASE reserved for the opinion of this Court by the Common Serjeant of the City of London.

At a session of the Central Criminal Court held on Monday the 9th Jan. 1871, William London was tried before me on an indictment for perjury, which alleged that an action against Hannah London, at the suit of Michael Pass, was tried in the Lambeth County Court on the 6th Dec. 1870, and that upon the trial of that action the said William London appeared as a witness and was duly sworn, &c., and that upon the said trial of the action it became and was a material question whether or not he the said William London had received any coals on credit from the said Michael Pass on account of the said H. London, and whether he the said William London had received any coals on credit from the said Michael Pass, either on account of himself or the said H. London, and that while it was so material he the said William London wilfully, falsely, and corruptly swore upon the trial of the said action, "that he had never received any coals on credit from the said Michael Pass, either on account of himself or his mother, the said H. London."

Collins, on behalf of the defendant, objected upon the authority of the case of Reg. v. Stolady (1 F. & F. 518), that a general allegation such as that made by the defendant, and averred in the indictment, was not sufficiently precise to found or support an indictment for perjury, and that the whole of the defendant's evidence should have been set out and proved.

I overruled the objections, and the defendant was found guilty. I deferred sentence and discharged the defendant on recognizance with sureties for his appearance to receive judgment, and in deference to the decision of the learned judge in Stolady's case, reserved for the consideration of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved the questions raised as above by the defendant's counsel.

The following is a copy of the evidence given before me on the trial for perjury.

THOMAS CHAMBERS.
Common Serjeant of London.

Henry Devereaux Pritchard, high bailiff, Lambeth County Court saith,

I produce certified copies of the proceedings in Pass v. London (put in). I have also the original summons and papers annexed. Judgment for defendant. No person would be examained without being sworn.

Cross-examined:

I don't remember anything about the case. Elworthy (attorney) appeared for plaintiff. Defendant's daughter appeared for her.

John Mason, usher, Lambeth County Court said,—

I know defendant by sight; I remember the adjourned hearing of Pass v. London. I saw defendant in the witness box, I believe he was sworn, but don't remember it. I heard him asked, "Did you ever have any coals either on your own account or your mother's on credit?" He answered in the negative. The question was repeated, and he denied it again.

Cross-examined:

The attorney said, "Will you swear you never had any coals," &c. The questions I have mentioned were not the only questions put. The question may have been, "Will you swear that neither you nor your mother had these coals on credit?"

Joseph Wilson, coal merchant, 13½, High-street, Vauxhall, foreman to Pass and Co., or manager:

Had the sole control of everything. I frequently saw the defendant on the premises ordering coals. He generally bought coals for cash, but he has ordered them on credit. Coals ordered are entered on a ticket, of which there is a duplicate, and upon which it appears whether or not the coals are paid for. I saw this ticket of 21st March handed to defendant. It was made out by the ticket boy. I see by it that the coals were not paid for. I was present at the transaction. I said to defendant, "How is it, as you generally pay cash, there are notwitstanding several instances of your not paying?" He said, "My mother is not always in the way; but I will call and settle them altogether." He had no credit after 21st March. The tickets were entered in the day-book in the usual course of business, and the entries therein tally with the tickets. The coals supplied on 21st March have never been paid for. I frequently spoke to defendant on the subject of the claim made against his mother. I said, "Your mother repudiates the debt, and says it is owing by you." He said "My mother gave me the money to pay, but I have spent it; and he has repeatedly promised to pay it or a portion of it, but has not kept his word. I was present at the court on 6th Dec., and heard defendant examined. I saw him sworn. I heard him asked, "Did you at any time, either on your own account or that of your mother, have any coals on credit." He said, "I did not;" a direct negative. The question was repeated, same words, and he denied again. The judge put the question first, and he denied it. When the answers were repeated the attorney said, "I can't carry the case any further."

Cross-examined:

"Will you swear that neither you nor your mother had these coals on credit" was not the question. There is a cash-book. Davis keeps the day-book. The judge did not say the books were badly kept. The books were not produced. He said our system of doing business was irregular. I don't think I mentioned about prisoner's saying he had had the money and spent it before to-day. I never told my attorney.

Re-examined by me:

The prisoner promised to pay fifty times over.

George Davis saith:

I was in the employ of Pass and Co. I often saw defendant on the premises ordering coals. I wrote out tickets, all these, and I handed them to defendant. If the coals are paid for, "paid" is put on the ticket; some of these (three) are marked "paid," the rest not, and they all tally with the counterfoils. Defendant had goods on credit and for cash on the same day sometimes. He generally paid cash, but on several occasions he had credit. I often heard Wilson ask defendant, and I have asked defendant himself for payment, and he made an excuse he would pay next week; once he said he was going to see an aunt and he would get some money, and he would pay when he came back. We gave credit to the mother. I delivered an account to her.

Cross-examined:

I took all the money. We had accounts with defendant and his mother. Wilson started in business on his own account in September. Pass took money for coals and handed it to me.

James Strickland saith:

I was foreman and weigher to Pass and Co. I have seen defendant purchasing coals many times; a ticket was brought to me for delivery of coals, and I entered the barge or wharf upon it. If "paid" was not on the ticket I used to say, "Well, Bill, credit again?" and he used to say, "Yes, you b——y fool," that happened several times. Defendant never paid me for any coals on the days named. If he paid me I always put "paid" on the ticket. At the County Court defendant was asked if he had ever had any credit for himself or his mother. He said "No," and was asked several times and made the same answer.

Cross-examined:

He may have had credit from fifty to one hundred times for himself or his mother during three years. The question was "any coals," not "these coals."

Thomas for the prisoner.—The objection taken at the trial was well founded. In Reg. v. Stolady it was held that it is not a sufficiently precise allegation upon which to found an indictment for perjury that the prisoner swore that a certain event did not happen within two fixed dates, his attention not having been called to the particular day upon which the transaction was alleged to have taken place. [BOVILL, C.J.—The word "allegation" in the marginal note in that case does not mean the allegation in the indictment, but what took place at the former trial.] So here the prisoner's attention should have been called to the occasion on which he was alleged to have bought coals on credit, and the mere general question and denial was not sufficient. So in Rex v. Hepper (1 Car. & P. 608), where an insolvent debtor had sworn that his schedule contained a full, true, and perfect account of all debts owing to him at the time of his petitioning for his discharge, it was held that an assignment of perjury on that oath stating that whereas in fact the said schedule did not contain a full, true, and perfect account, &c., is too general, and that it ought to have stated what debts he was charged with omitting; so in an indictment for false pretences a similar general form of allegation has been held bad: (Rex v. Perrott, 2 M. & S. 379.)

Thorne Cole, for the prosecution, was not called upon.

BOVILL, C.J.—We are all of opinion that this conviction was good. The first question is upon the form of the indictment, which is sufficient. Reg v. Stolady does not interfere with our decision. The second point is whether the attention of the prisoner was sufficiently called to the transactions he was being questioned about, and we are all of opinion that it was amply called to it, even if the second point has been reserved for us.

WILLES, J.—We do not intend to overrule what Pollock, C.B. said, that the attention of a witness ought to be called to the point upon which his answer is supposed to be erroneous before a charge for perjury can be founded upon it. Mr. Graves, in his last edition of Russell on Crimes, makes some observations on Reg. v. Stolady, which are in accordance with the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice.

The rest of the Court concurring,

Conviction affirmed.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

WATTS v. KELSON.

Easement — Necessary or continuous — Stream of water—Easement used only from time to time— Right of way—Conveyance—Implication of law— General words in conveyance.

There is a well recognised distinction between easements used from time to time, such as a right of way, and easements which are used as of necessity or are in their nature continuous. And upon a severance of tenements the latter will pass by implication of law without any words of grant; whereas the former pass only when the owner by appropriate language shows an intention that they should pass

But semble, that if there was a formed road over the servient tenement to and for the apparent use of the dominant tenement, a right of way over it would pass by a conveyance of the latter with ordinary general words.

In 1863 F., the owner of two adjoining properties, conveyed to the plaintiff one of them which consisted of a house, stalls for feeding cattle, and a yard and outbuildings, and he so conveyed it with "all waters, watercourses, rights, &c., to the same hereditaments, belonging, or with the same held, used, enjoyed, or reputed as appurtenant thereto." The defendant afterwards became the owner of the other property, from which there was a small natural watercourse flowing to the plaintiff's premises, and in this stream there was, at the time of the conveyance to the plaintiff, a tank, which was on the other property, which stopped the natural flow of the water, and an artificial culvert which conducted the water to another tank, also in the latter property, whence two pipes conducted it to the plaintiff's yard and cattle sheds, for the purpose of suppl., ng which the culvert had been expressly made. This was the state of things at all events from the year 1860. On bill filed by the plaintiff for an injunction to restrain the defendant from obstructing and diverting the watercourse, it was Held (reversing the decision of the Master of the Rolls), that, apart from the general words of the conveyance to the plaintiff, the right to the supply of the water, inasmuch as it was an easement of necessity and continuous, passed to him by implication of law by virtue of the conveyance of the property; that what passed to him was a right to have the water flow as theretofore through the defendant's premises to his own, to be applied to any purpose he liked, and that no change of the purpose to which it had been originally applied would deprive him of that right.

Held, also, that if there had been no such implication of law, the general words above quoted were amply sufficient to pass the easement.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiff against 'a decision of the Master of the Rolls dismissing the bill so far as it sought for an injunction to restrain the defendant from obstructing and diverting the flow of water from his premises to those of the plaintiff under circumstances which are fully stated by Mellish, L.J., in delivering their Lordships' judgment.

There was also a question as to a right of way, which the Master of the Rolls decided in the plaintiff's favour; but from this part of the decree there was no appeal.

Amphlett, Q. C. and Roberts supported the appeal, and contended that the easement claimed was of necessity and continuous, and not discon-,tinuous merely, and that upon this distinction which was clearly established, the decision rested:

Nicholas v. Chamberlain, 1 Cro. Jac. 121;
Polden v. Bastard, L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 156; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 441; Suffield v. Brown, 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 627;
Wardle v. Brocklehurst, 1 Ell. & Ell. 1058; 1 L. T. Rep. N. S. 519.

The Master of the Rolls had not been sufficiently impressed with the distinction, and chiefly relied on—

Thomson v. Waterlow, L. Rep. 6 Eq. 36; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 545; Langley v. Hammond, L. Rep. 3 Ex. 161; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 858; in both of which cases the easement in dispute was a right of way. Upon the general rights to easements, they referred to—

Ewart v. Cochrane, 4 Macq. 117; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 1;
Gale on Easements, 3rd edit., 20, 81, chap. 4, 262;

They contended also that it was of no importance, even if the original purpose of the culvert was to supply the plaintiff's cattle sheds, that those sheds had now been removed; the plaintiff was entitled to the water for any purpose for which he required it. But if the easement did not pass by implication of law, the general words of the conveyance were large enough to pass it:

Pyer v. Carter, 1 H. & N. 922;
Hinchcliff v. The Earl of Kinnoul, 5 Bing. N. C. 22.

Southgate, Q. C., and William Barber supported the decree.—This culvert was made for no other purpose than to supply the cattle sheds, and was not of necessity to the plaintiff for any other purpose; he himself had pulled those sheds down. Nor was it a continuous easement, for it had existed but a short time in its present shape, the previous supply having come from another part of the stream. The facts being so, no easement can pass except by express grant, and these general words did not amount to such a grant. They relied on

Thomson v. Waterlow (ubi sup.);
Langley v. Hammond (ubi sup.);
and referred to
Russell v. Harford, L. Rep. 5 Eq. 507; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 171; Plant v. James, 5 B. & Ad. 791;
Crossley v. Lightowler, L. Rep. 2 Ch. App. 478; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 438; Pearson v. Spencer, 1 B. & Sm. 571; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 769; Worthington v. Gimson, 29 L. J., 116 Q. B.; 2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 320.

Amphlett, Q. C., having replied, judgment was reserved until the 16th Jan. 1871, when Lord Justice MELLISH delivered the judgment of their Lordships, and said: — The plaintiff and the defendant are the owners and occupiers of two adjoining properties, which, up to Jan. 1863 belonged to a single owner; but on the 10th Jan. 1863 John Graham Foley, the then owner of the two properties, conveyed to the plaintiff the premises now belonging to him, which then consisted of a cottage residence and a large number of stalls for feeding cattle, with a yard and outbuildings belonging thereto, and a few acres of land. The premises were conveyed, together with (amongst other general words) all waters, watercourses, rights, privileges, advantages and appurtenances whatsoever to the same hereditaments and premises belonging or appertaining, or with the same, or any part thereof, held, used, enjoyed, or reputed as part thereof, or as appurtenant thereto. There is a small natural watercourse flowing from the defendant's premises to the plaintiff's, and in this stream at the time of the conveyance to the plaintiff there was, near to the house now belonging to the defendant and on his ground, a tank which stopped the natural flow of the water, and an artificial drain or culvert into which the water flowed from the tank through a considerable distance to another tank, also in what is now the defendant's property, and from that tank there were two pipes which conducted the water to the yard of the plaintiff's cattle sheds, where it could be used by the occupier of the plaintiff's premises for any purpose that he required. This artificial watercourse was originally made for the express purpose of supplying the cattle sheds with water. According to several of the witnesses it was not originally supplied with water from the upper tank, but from a lower part of the stream. It was admitted, however, that, as early as the year 1860, the connection was formed between the upper tank and the drain which conducts the water to the lower tank, and that from that time the lower tank was exclusively supplied with water from the upper tank.

It was also alleged by the defendant that the plaintiff having, after he purchased his own property, become in the year 1864 tenant of the property now belonging to the defendant, had altered the upper tank by making a hole in its lower side, and placing an iron hatch over the hole, and that the effect of this was to raise the water in the tank, and to increase the flow of the water through the artificial watercourse. After, however, considering the evidence on both sides on this part of the case, we are of opinion that, before the iron hatch was placed on the tank, there had been a wooden hatch, or some wooden contrivance, which practically served the purpose of raising the water in the tank so as to cause it to flow freely down the artificial watercourse to the lower tank, and we are of opinion that the plaintiff is not proved to have made any such alteration in the watercourse as can affect any right to the water he might otherwise have. The real question to be determined is, did the indenture of the 10th Jan. 1863, convey to the plaintiff any right to the benefit of the artificial watercourse above described.

The Master of the Rolls has held on the authority of Thomson v. Waterlow and Langley v. Hammond that, because the artificial watercourse was first made and begun by a person who was owner of both properties, and had no prior existence at a time when the properties were separately owned, the general words in the conveyance were not sufficient to pass the right. Thomson v. Waterlow and Langley v. Hammond were both cases of rights of way, and we cannot but think that in the decision of the Master of the Rolls the well-established distinction between easements like rights of way, which are only used from time to time, and what are called continuous easements, has been overlooked. In Polden v. Bastard (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 161), Erle, C. J., delivering the unanimous judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, says: "There is a distinction between easements such as a right of way or easements used from time to time, and easements of necessity or continuous easements. The cases recognise this distinction, and it is clear that upon a severance of tenements, easements which are used as of necessity, or are in their nature continuous, will pass by implication of law without any words of grant; but with regard to easements which are used from time to time only, they do not pass unless the owner by appropriate language shows an intention that they should pass.

We are clearly of opinion that the easement in the present case was in its nature continuous. There was an actual construction on the servient tenement extending to the dominant tenement, by which water was continuously brought through the servient tenement to the dominant tenement, for the use of the occupier of the dominant tenement. According to the rule as laid down by Erle, C.J., the right to such an easement as the one in question would pass by implication of law without any words of grant, and we think that this is the correct rule; but if words of grant are necessary, we also think that the general words in this case are amply sufficient to pass the easement. It was a watercourse with the premises at the time of the conveyance used and enjoyed. We may also observe, that in Langley v. Hammond, Bramwell, B. expressed an opinion, in which we concur, that, even in the case of a right of way, if there was a formed road made over the alleged servient tenement to and for the apparent use of the dominant tenement, a right of way over such road might pass by a conveyance of the dominant tenement with the ordinary general words. We do not think it necessary to go through the large number of cases cited in the argument, for it will be sufficient to refer to two or three of them. In the old case of Nicholas v. Chamberlain (Cro. Jac. 121), it was held by all the courts upon demurrer that, if one erects a house and builds a conduit thereto in another part of his land, and conveys water by pipes to the house, and afterwards sells the house with the appurtenants, excepting the land, or sells the land to another, reserving to himself the house, the conduit and pipes pass with the house because it is necessary and quasi appurtenant thereto. This case has always been cited with approval, and is identical, not only in principle but in its actual facts, with the case now before us. It was expressly approved of by Lord Westbury in Suffield v. Brown, where, though he objected to the decision in Pryer v. Carter, in which it it was held that a right to an existent continuous apparent easement was impliedly reserved in a conveyance by the owner of two houses of the alleged servient house, yet he seems to agree that a right to such an easement would pass by implied grant where the dominant tenement is conveyed first. Wardle v. Brocklehurst (1 E. & E. 1058) is also a direct authority that, by a grant of a farm with the usual general words, the benefit of a culvert, and a stream of water running through the lands of the vendor to the farm granted passed; and Lord Campbell says: "The land must be taken to be conveyed in the state in which it then was; that is, we must take it that the culvert so bringing down the water and all the watercourses, are granted, not only those which belong and appertain to the premises, but also those which were used and enjoyed therewith." This judgment was confirmed in the Exchequer Chamber, and it was held that the defendant was entitled to use the water not only for the farm which was sold to him, but for a manufactory which he possessed beyond.

It was objected before us on the part of the defendant, that on the severance of the two tenements, no easement will pass by an implied grant, except one which is necessary for the use of the tenement conveyed, and that the easement in question was not necessary. We think that the watercourse was necessary for the use of the tenement conveyed. It was, at the time of the conveyance, the existing mode by which the premises conveyed were supplied with water, and we think it is no answer to say that if this supply was cut off possibly some other supply might have been obtained. We think it is proved on the evidence that no other supply of water equally convenient or equally pure could have been obtained. We are also of opinion, having regard to the general words in the conveyance, that the language of the conveyance was sufficient to pass the right to the watercourse, even if it was not necessary but only convenient for the use of the premises. It was further objected that the fact of the plaintiff having pulled down the cattle sheds and erected cottages in their place deprived him of the right to the use of the water. We are of opinion, however, that what passed to the plaintiff was a right to have the water flow in the accustomed manner through the defendant's premises to his premises, and that when it arrived at his premises he could do what he liked with it, and that he would not lose his right to the water by any alteration he might make in his premises. On the whole we are of opinion that the judgment of the Master of the Rolls on the part of the case relating to the watercourse ought to be reversed, and that the defendant must be restrained by a perpetual injunction from obstructing and diverting the said stream and watercourse so as to prevent the same from flowing through the defendant's premises to the plaintiff's, in the course and manner in which it used to flow at the time of the execution of the conveyance to the plaintiff of the 10th Jan. 1863, or in any way preventing or hindering the plaintiff, and the tenants and occupiers of his said hereditaments and premises, from having the full use and enjoyment of the said stream, and the water thereof, in the manner in which the same was used and enjoyed before and at the time of the said conveyance. We are also of opinion that the plaintiff should have the general costs of suit in the court below, but that there should be no costs of this appeal.

Re THE CHURCH ESTATE CHARITY.

Charity for repairs of church—Sub-division of parish—Right of new church to an apportionment—8 & 9 Vict. c. 70, s. 22.

The object of the 22nd section of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 70, is to enable this court, in cases where a whole parish is entitled to participate in a charity, to apportion that charity between the several portions of the parish upon its being divided and separated into distinct parishes; but the Act does not confer any power to divert a charity from the purpose to which it was by its foundation devoted, to any other purpose.

The churchwardens and overseers of W. had from time immemorial been seised of certain lands for the use and repairs of the parish church. In 1820 a new church was built in the parish, and the two churches were maintained out of one church-rate, levied on the whole parish from that time until 1846, when the parish was divided and the new church was constituted the parish church of one of the divisions. From that time separate rates were levied, and the income of the charity was devoted to the original church. In the absence of all evidence as to the origin of the charity,

Held (affirming the decision of the Master of the Rolls), that the gift must be presumed to have been made specifically for the benefit of the original church, and, therefore, that the new parish had no right to an apportionment under the Church Building Acts Amendment Act.

THIS was an appeal by two parishioners of St. Anne's, Wandsworth, named Denny and Coventry, against an order of the Master of the Rolls dismissing a petition presented by them for an inquiry whether it was fit and proper that an apportionment of a certain charity called "The Church Estate Charity" should be made between the parishes of All Saints and St. Anne's, Wandsworth, and their several districts, or any of them; and if such an apportionment should be found fit and proper, then for the settlement of a scheme for the future administration of the charity.

The report of the original hearing is in 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 293, where the circumstances are fully stated. It is necessary only to add that there was no evidence how the estate from which the funds were derived originally came into the possession of the parish, which appeared to have been seised thereof from time immemorial.

The petition was presented, with the authorisation of the Charity Commissioners, under the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 70, the 22nd section of which Act is to the following effect: that, when the commissioners shall have formed, or shall thereafter form, any distinct and separate parish, &c., out of any parish, the court may, on a petition presented by any two residents, apportion between the remaining part of such parish, and the distinct and separate parish, any charitable devises, bequests, or gifts which shall have been made or given to or for the use of any such parish, or the produce thereof, and in any such case may direct that the proportions of such devises, bequests, or gifts, or the produce thereof as shall be so apportioned, shall be made and distributed by the incumbent or churchwardens of any such distinct and separate parish, either jointly or severally as the said court shall think expedient.

Upton (with whom was Joshua Williams, Q. C.), supported the appeal, and contended that this land, if not originally a gift for the benefit of the whole parish, had virtually operated as such by diminishing the amount of church-rate required for repair of the churches. He referred to

Re The West Ham Charities, 2 De G. & Sm. 213;
Ex parte The Incumbent of Brompton, 5 De G. & Sm. 626.

Lindley (with whom was Jessel, Q. C.) supported the order on behalf of the churchwardens of All Saints, contending that the manner in which the charity funds had been applied ever since the sub-division of the parish, showed to what purpose they were applicable, and this was confirmed by the fact that from that time each parish had made its own rate. The abolition of church-rates could not alter the right to the funds. The case was concluded by the authority of The Attorney-General v. Love (23 Beav. 499), decided by the Master of the Rolls, and never appealed.

Upton having replied,

Lord Justice JAMES said.—I am of opinion that the decision of the Master of the Rolls gives the correct interpretation of this statute. The question was very properly put in the argument of the appellant in this way: Was the charity a charity substantially for the benefit of the parishioners, qua parishioners, or not? It may have been a charity which enured incidentally for the benefit of the ratepayers, but that was only an incidental benefit which might result in various ways from various charities within the parish. The charity was a charity for the repair of this particular church, for the use and repair of the church, and it appears to me that it must be considered in exactly the same way as if that church had not been a parochial church, as if it had been a church situate in some extra-parochial district, as if it had been a church in partibus infidelium, established as a missionary church for the purpose of converting heathens or infidels to the Christian religion; that is to say, as if the charity had been a charity for the advancement of religion through the repairs, and other use of that particular church. That being so, it appears to me that it would have been a breach of trust to have applied its funds in any other manner whatever in case of the parishioners, because if those funds could have been applied in case of the parishioners, qua parishioners, then they might have been applied in relief of the poor rates or anything else to which the parishioners were liable.

The question is, is this a thing confined to that particular church? It appears to me that it is confined to that particular church, for I do not know what other limit you are to put upon it. If a dozen chapels of ease were built, each of them might have had as much right to a share of this as St. Anne's had at the time when St. Anne's was built; and if St. Anne's had not that right at the time it was built, I see nothing which gave it that right, because of the subsequent division of districts, or because of the alteration in the law of church rates afterwards. At the time when St. Anne's was built it was not repaired out of the church rates at all, and at that time it was no more entitled to this fund than any other ecclesiastical building in the parish. I am of opinion this is not a gift for the use of the parish within the meaning of the Act of Parliament. The Master of the Rolls decided in this case as he had decided in a former suit (The Attorney-General v. Love, ubi sup.), upon an information filed which raised the very question which seems to be involved in this case, and as fully as it is raised here, because if the contention on the part of the parishioners is right, then that contention involves this consequence, that there was a common right independently of the provisions of the particular statute which gives us a power to distribute, and it must have been because that church was entitled. In the case I have mentioned the title came into question before the Master of the Rolls upon an information, and his decision seems to have been acquiesced in by the Attorney-General, and in the present case the Master of the Rolls followed that decision. It appears to me he was right both in that decision and the present case. That decision is of great weight and importance, having regard to the fact that the Attorney-General, who is the guardian, so to speak, of these charities, has acquiesced in it, and, therefore, it may be said to have passed into law. But independently of that, upon the construction alone of the Act, I am of opinion that this court has no jurisdiction to make any apportionment of this fund.

Lord Justice MELLISH said:—I am of the same opinion. The simple question is whether, according to the true construction of the 22nd sect. of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 70, this particular charity is a charitable devise, bequest, or gift which shall have been made or given to or for the use of any such parish. Now I am clearly of opinion that this section does not enable the court to divert any charity from the purpose to which, by the foundation of the charity, it was to be devoted to some other purpose. The object of the section is simply this, that if the whole parish were entitled to the charity, if the part divided was as much entitled to it as the whole original part, then for convenience the court should be entitled under this section to apportion it. Therefore, the real question is whether, wholly independently of this section, this was a charity for the repair of this particular church, or was a charity for the repair of all churches that might happen to be built in the parish of Wandsworth, or, at any rate, all churches that might happen to be built and be repaired out of the church rates of the parish of Wandsworth. I am very clearly of opinion that this was a charity for the repair of the particular church and nothing else, and that we should be diverting the charitable funds from their proper object to another and improper object, if we were to make an order such as is prayed by this petition. I think a charity of this kind may, as Mr. Lindley has shown, be applied to objects which a church-rate could not be applied to at all, and I think it is only incidentally that it happens, from the incident that the repair of churches was provided for out of the church rates, that the parishioners got some benefit from this charity. It appears to me that the real object of the charity is to promote religious purposes by having this particular church kept in good repair. The appeal must be refused, but the churchwardens must have their costs out of the estate.

HARRISON v. GOOD.

Restrictive covenant—Nuisance—School.

Where land is sold in lots, and each purchaser enters into a restrictive covenant with the vendor which is required by the conditions of sale, a person claiming under one purchaser can enforce the covenant against a person who claims under another purchaser with notice of the covenant.

A national parochial school is not a nuisance in the legal sense of the word.

In 1824 land was sold in lots, and (as required by the conditions of sale) each purchaser covenanted for himself and his assigns with the vendor not to do or suffer to be done on the premises anything which might be or be deemed to be a nuisance to the vendor or any of his tenants, or the occupiers or proprietors for the time being of the adjoining property. G. having become possessed of two lots, with notice of the covenant which had been entered into by T., the original purchaser of those lots, offered them to a school committee as a site for a national parochial school. A bill having been filed by the owners of the adjoining lots to enforce the covenant:

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to the benefit of the covenant; but that the establishment of a national parochial school would not be an infringement of it.

THIS was a suit instituted to prevent the erection of national parochial schools on a plot of ground in Abbey-place, St. John's-wood, in the county of Middlesex, under the following circumstances:

In 1824 a part of an estate, known as the Eyre estate, which included the plot in question, was contracted to be sold to one Chandless. The conveyance to him, which was not executed until June 1824, contained a covenant on the part of Chandless, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, with Walpole Eyre, his heirs and assigns, that Chandless, his heirs or assigns, would not do, or suffer to be done, on any of the hereditaments thereby granted, anything which should be a nuisance to Henry Samuel Eyre, or any of his tenants, or the occupiers or owners of the adjoining property, or of the houses to be built thereon, and should not erect, or suffer to be erected, on any part of the said ground, within twenty-five feet of an intended road therein mentioned, any buildings except garden walls. And further, that no drainage should be made from the said ground in a south-eastern direction, but that all drainage should be carried in a north-western direction.

In May 1824, Chandless put up the land which he had contracted to purchase for sale by auction, in thirty-four lots. The fifth condition of sale was as follows:

The purchaser of each lot shall, so as to bind the owners for the time being, enter into a covenant with the vendor to make and form, previous to Lady Day next, in a good and proper manner, and afterwards keep in good repair, the road opposite such lot to the centre of such road, and in default thereof the vendor shall be at liberty to do so, and be paid the expense thereof immediately afterwards; and also a covenant not to erect any building, except garden walls, within 25ft. of the road, and not to do or suffer to be done on the ground anything which will be a nuisance to Henry Samuel Eyre, Esq., or any of his tenants, or the occupiers of the adjoining property, and that all drainage shall be in a north-western direction.

All the thirty-four lots were sold at the auction.

Of these lots, Nos. 5 and 6 and 7 lay on one side of part of the intended new road, and Nos. 26, 27, and 28 lay immediately opposite them on the other.

Lots 26, 27, 28 were purchased by one John Barry, and became ultimately vested in the plaintiffs, Charles Harrison and Abraham Dangerfield, as trustees for the plaintiff, John Dangerfield.

Lot 5 was purchased by one George Vipond, and became ultimately vested in the plaintiff Frederick Grey.

Lots 6 and 7 were purchased by one John Thurlow, and became ultimately vested in the defendant, Joseph Henry Good.

In pursuance of the 5th condition of sale, the conveyance to John Thurlow, which was dated the 24th July 1824, contained the following covenant:

The said John Thurlow doth hereby, for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, covenant with the said Henry Gore Chandless, his heirs and assigns, that he, the said John Thurlow, his heirs or assigns, will form one moiety of the road opposite the said piece of land before Lady-day next at his own expense, in a workmanlike manner, and that in case he shall refuse or neglect so to do, it shall be lawful for the said Henry Gore Chandless to make and form the same at the expense of the said John Thurlow, to be paid on demand. And also that he, the said John Thurlow, his heirs or assigns, shall not do, or suffer to be done on any of the premises hereby granted, appointed, &c., or any part thereof, anything which shall, will, or may be deemed a nuisance to Henry Samuel Eyre, or any of his tenants or the occupiers or proprietors for the time being of the adjoining property or the houses to be built thereon, and shall not erect, or cause or suffer to be erected, on any part of the hereditaments any buildings, except garden walls, within 25ft. from the said intended road, and that all drainage from the said ground shall be carried in a north-westerly direction.

The conveyances to the predecessors in title of the plaintiffs Dangerfield and Grey contained covenants substantially the same as that contained in the conveyance to John Thurlow. It was admitted that Good purchased lots 6 and 7, with notice of the covenant entered into by John Thurlow.

After the purchase of lots 26, 27, and 28 by the plaintiff John Dangerfield, he erected a valuable house thereon, and a house was also erected by the plaintiff Grey upon lot 5.

In 1869 lots 6 and 7 (which were then a vacant space) were offered by the defendant Good to the school committee of St. Mark's parish as a site for national parochial schools. The parish of St. Mark was a district which in 1847 had been separated from the parish of Marylebone, and from 1847 to 1869 the schools of the district were situate in Marlborough-place. In 1867 the erection of new schools was contemplated. The site at first proposed was a piece of ground immediately adjoining

St. Mark's Church, and plans for the erection of the new schools on that site were prepared by the defendant Good, who was an architect. This proposal was, however, abandoned after the offer of the site in Abbey-place had been made by Good. When the plaintiff John Dangerfield became acquainted with this offer, he addressed a written statement to the school committee, protesting against the scheme for erecting the schools upon the site in Abbey-place. He took the opinion of counsel as to the site adjoining the church, and was advised there was no legal difficulty to prevent the erection of the schools there. He further obtained the consent of the church trustees to that site being used for the purpose.

However, on the 28th Jan. 1870 a meeting of the school committee was held, at which Good's offer was accepted; and preparations were accordingly made for laying the foundations of the schools on the site in Abbey-place.

This bill was then filed by John Dangerfield and his trustees, and by Grey, against Good and the members of the school committee of the parish of St. Mark. It prayed that the defendants might be restrained from establishing any national or parochial schools on the piece of land belonging to the defendant Good in Abbey-place, and from doing or suffering to be done upon the said premises anything which should be or should be deemed to be a nuisance to the plaintiffs or any of the tenants or occupiers of the adjoining property.

Evidence was produced on the part of the plaintiffs to prove the annoyance which these schools had caused to the inhabitants of Marlborough-place, and the consequent depreciation in value which property had suffered in that locality. The defendants' evidence tended to show that in certain other localities schools of this nature had neither caused annoyance nor depreciated property.

The plaintiff, John Dangerfield, had offered to purchase the piece of ground in question from the defendant Good at the price which he had given for it; but this offer was refused by Good.

Eddis, Q.C. and Lindley for the plaintiffs.—Good is bound by Thurlow's covenant with Chandless, and the plaintiffs are entitled to the benefit of that covenant. Where property is sold in lots, and the several purchasers enter into restrictive covenants with the vendor, an injunction will be granted to one purchaser to restrain a breach of the covenants by another.

Western v. MacDermott, L. Rep. 1 Eq. 499; Ibid. 2 Ch. 72; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 641;
Mann v. Stephens, 15 Sim. 377.

This covenant must give the plaintiffs larger rights than they would possess without it; and the word "nuisance" in the covenant should not be interpreted strictly. But even if it be interpreted strictly, a parochial school is a nuisance in the legal sense, as something which will render the plaintiffs' lives and property substantially uncomfortable.

Cavey v. Ledbitter, 13 C. B., N. S., 477;
Bamford v. Turnley, 3 B. & S. 66; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 721;
Walter v. Selfe, 4 De G. & Sm. 315.

Our evidence is sufficient to bring the school within the definitions of nuisance given in Gale on Easements (p. 448, 4th edit.); 3 Blackstone 225. Schools have been considered a nuisance:

Doe v. Keeling, 1 M. & S. 95;
Kemp v. Sober, 1 Sim. N. S. 517.

Depreciation of property, which is proved to have taken place in Marlborough-place, is important, "as an indicium of the extent of the nuisance:"

Soltau v. De Held, 2 Sim. N. S. 133;
Gauntlett v. Whitworth, 2 Car. & Kir. 720.

Kay, Q.C., and Marten, for the defendants.—The plaintiffs are not entitled to the benefit of Thurlow's covenant. In Child v. Douglas (2 Jur. N. S. 950), Wood, V.C. expressed a doubt as to the rights of purchasers inter se, each of whom has covenanted with the vendor, but who have neither covenanted with each other, nor taken any reciprocal covenant from the vendor themselves. He said that matters would stand very curiously if one purchaser was to have a right to restrain another purchaser from a breach of the covenant, while the vendor was to have the power of releasing him from it. Again, in Keates v. Lyon (L. Rep. 4 Ch. 218; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 255), the vendor did not enter into any reciprocal covenants, and it was held that the purchaser of one part was not entitled to the benefit of covenants entered into by the purchaser of another part. But even if the plaintiffs are entitled to the benefit of the covenant, it does not give them a larger right, but a more formidable remedy. To sustain this bill the plaintiffs must show that a school is necessarily and inevitably a nuisance in the legal sense of the word. But a school is not such a nuisance as the court will restrain by injunction:

1 Com. Dig. 420. 5th edit.;
5 Bac. Abr. 787, 7th edit.;
Rex v. Moore, 3 B. & Ad. 184;
Inchbald v. Robinson, L. Rep. 4 Ch. 388; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 259; Biddulph v. The Vestry of St. George, Hanover-square, 33 L. J. 411, Ch.; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 44, 558.

Eddis, Q.C. in reply.—According to Child v. Douglas and Keates v. Lyon it is sufficient to prove notice of the covenant. Now here Good had express notice of Thurlow's covenant.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I have no doubt whatever that the plaintiff is entitled to the full benefit of the covenant, and entitled to it against the defendant the owner of the land, and the other defendants associated with him. It appears that Mr. Eyre sold his land to Mr. Chandless, and took a restrictive covenant from him. At a subsequent period Chandless sold the land which he had bought, and sold it under certain conditions of sale. The fifth of these conditions is in substance, and nearly in words the same as the covenant which was afterwards introduced into the conveyance to Thurlow. That covenant was as follows. [His Honour read the covenant.] The deed containing that covenant forms part of the title of the defendant Good, and in my opinion no question can be raised as to the title of the plaintiffs to sue upon it. It only remains to be considered whether that which the plaintiffs complain of is an infraction of the covenant. The covenant is in very limited terms. Probably the conveyancer thought that he had sufficiently guarded against the possibility of anything which could be even distasteful to the owners of the adjoining property. If that was his meaning, he has not expressed it; and it is not competent to me to enlarge the meaning of the words which he has employed, and which form the contract between the parties. The word "nuisance" is a word perfectly well known to the law, and in the law it only means one thing. In common parlance no doubt nuisance is applied to a great many things wholly different from, and to others not at all like the definition which the law gives; but if it does not bear that signification, and that signification only which the law has put upon it, I am at a loss to know what it does mean. I do not know how I could stop if I were to substitute the popular word "annoyance" for the legal word "nuisance." I do not know how I could stop if a person entitled to the benefit of this covenant alleged to me that something which was being done was disagreeable to him. It might, I think, be carried so far as to include mere matters of personal antipathy, which might be odious and almost intolerable to one man, but which another would not care the least about. I say therefore that I am confined entirely to the meaning of the word "nuisance" as I find it used in, and applied by the law. The cases which have been referred to still limit the word to that meaning. The cases about brickburning amount to this—a man who burns bricks to the nuisance of his neighbour is liable to be restrained by this court, and to an action on the case in a court of common law; but the present case does not approach that at all. It is said that this will be disagreeable to the plaintiff; no doubt it will. It is said also that it will depreciate his property. I think there is abundant evidence in support of that fact. But that is not enough. The common law case of Doe v. Keeling establishes nothing to show that the thing itself is a nuisance. That was a case of a covenant not to carry on a trade; and it was there pointed out to the jury who were to assess the damages that they were not to consider a trifling matter—not a mere infraction of the covenant—which might bring with it no substantial injury, but they were to consider that the carrying on the trade of a school in a place where a man had contracted to carry on no trade at all might be a great inconvenience to the persons interested, and might be doing the very thing which the covenant was intended to prevent. The case of Kemp v. Sober is open, in my opinion, to the same observation. We all know that although the Court of Chancery interferes where it thinks right by way of injunction to prevent the violation of a covenant; yet, if the violation is so slight, so formal, so unsubstantial, that the plaintiff could have no proper reason in conscience to complain of it, the court will grant no injunction. How can I say that this is a nuisance? The building of a house is no nuisance. The establishment of a school is no nuisance in itself. No doubt a number of boys may be collected coming out of school at the end of school hours, but they would be the Queen's subjects walking along the Queen's highway; and I do not see by what kind of reasoning this can be turned into a nuisance. I do not forget that there was a school in Marlborough-place, which the evidence, it is said, proves to have been what is called a nuisance; but the inconvenience complained of there was, that the boys, on coming out of school, misbehaved themselves. But that is not a necessary consequence of their being in school, or of their coming out of school. The common police regulations of the metropolis, if the inhabitants think fit to put the law in force, prevent the possibility of any such nuisance. Throughout the whole of this case I have been trying, and trying in vain, to discover where the legal nuisance is. Unless the nuisance complained of is one for which an indictment would lie or an action could be maintained, in my opinion it is no nuisance within the terms of this covenant. I would not have it supposed that I am not perfectly sensible of the great disadvantage it will be to Mr. Dangerfield, if the school is established in the place where it is proposed. I have no doubt that the value of his property will be depreciated. But the case of Soltau v. De Held does not prove that because a depreciation in value would take place, the owners of adjoining property suffering depreciation have therefore a right to call that a nuisance, which they fail to prove otherwise to be a nuisance. I am obliged, therefore, to come to the conclusion that there will be no nuisance committed. I will go further and say (though it is somewhat extra-judicial) that I do not believe that by any possibility anything can happen which can be called a nuisance in the legal definition or in fair ordinary speech. An inconvenience, a loss to Mr. Dangerfield, unquestionably it is. All the hopes that he formed when he spent 6000*l.* in building his house will be disappointed. His residence will be made much less agreeable than it was; but I cannot enlarge the terms of the covenant to give him a right which has not been stipulated for. I am obliged, therefore, to dismiss the bill, but I cannot order the plaintiff to pay costs, and for this reason. There is near the church a suitable site which might be had gratis for the establishment of these schools, and I am satisfied that the defendants knew this. If they had been actuated by the ordinary motives which may be imputed to neighbours, they might have accomplished that most useful object which they have in view, without committing any wrong to Mr. Dangerfield. I say nothing as to Mr. Dangerfield's offer to purchase the site in Abbey-place from Mr. Good, because it is an offer which I have no power to enforce. But Mr. Dangerfield did his best to facilitate the acquisition of the church-site for the purpose of the schools. And if Mr. Dangerfield's endeavours had been more readily accepted, if his remonstrances had been more fairly and patiently attended to, there would have been no litigation. Although, therefore, I dismiss this bill, I dismiss it without costs.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

(Present: the Right Hon. Sir JAMES W. COLVILE, Lord Justice JAMES, and Lord Justice MELLISH).

SMALLBONES (app.) v. EDNEY AND LUNN (resps.).

Rates under 5 Geo. 4, c. 36—Liability of owner of tithe rentcharge to assessment—Distinction between rates under the Act and church rates.

A sum of money was borrowed under the provisions of the stat. 5 Geo. 4, c. 36, s. 1, from the commissioners authorised to make advances for public works, for the purpose of repairing and enlarging a parish church. The churchwardens and overseers of the parish made a rate upon the inhabitants and parishioners in order to pay an annual instalment and interest on the sum so borrowed.

The appellant occupied a house in the parish, and was rated. To a suit to recover this rate, the defence was that M. P., the owner of a tithe rentcharge, arising out of lands in the parish, was not assessed to the rate in respect of such rentcharge, and therefore that the rate was bad:

Held (reversing the judgment of the Court of Arches), that M. P., as the owner of a tithe rentcharge in the parish was liable to be assessed to the rates made for the repayment of the money, borrowed under the provisions of the above statute; such owner being the occupier of property in the parish, in respect of which he was entitled to vote upon the question whether money should be borrowed under the Act, and receiving as much benefit from the money being borrowed as the owners of other property in the parish. There is a distinction between rates under the above Act and church rates, and though there are strong reasons for holding that every person liable to be assessed to a church rate is also liable to be assessed to a rate under the Act, yet it does not follow that every person, who is exempted from liability to a church rate, is also to be exempted from liability to pay a rate under the Act, unless the reason for his exemption is equally applicable.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of Sir Robert Phillimore, pronounced in the Court of Arches on 31st July 1869, in a suit for subtraction of church rates, promoted by the respondents, the churchwardens of the parish church of Whitchurch, near Southampton, against the appellant. The facts are stated in the judgment, post, and in the report of the case in the court below (21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 506.)

By the judgment appealed from the respondent was ordered to pay his assessment to the church rate, and was condemned in the costs of the suit.

Sir Travers Twiss, Q. C. (for the appellant.)—The important question in the case is on what principle the rate ought to be levied. The money borrowed from the commissioners might be expended in repairs of the chancel, for "church" includes "chancel:" (Rippin v. Bastin, 20 L. T. Rep N. S. 622; L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 386.) This rate is nowhere in the Act called a "church rate." It is the consent of the major part of the inhabitants and occupiers assessed to the poor rate that is required before application for the loan can be made to the commissioners. Assessment to the relief of the poor has no legal connection with church rates. [JAMES, L. J.—The church rate making body and the poor rate making body are quite distinct; the former existed centuries before the latter. MELLISH, L. J.—At the date of 5 Geo. 4, I think the liabilities of stock-in-trade to church rate and poor rate were on the same footing.] Miller v. Bloomfield (1 Adams 499) decided that stock-in-trade was liable to church rate. [MELLISH, L.J.—Are there any cases to show that tithes were exempted entirely from church rates, and not merely from church rates for the purposes of the body of the church?] Tithes were exempted entirely. Re Batkin (25 L. J., N. S., 126, M. C.), it was held that the jurisdiction of justices to enforce payment of a rate made for the repayment of money borrowed under 5 Geo. 4 c. 36, was the same as with respect to a church rate, was a decision in the express words words of sect. 2, prescribing the mode in which these rates are to be recovered, and throws no light on their nature or quality. Compare the wording of this Act with that of the 59 Geo. 3 c, 134, for building additional churches in populous parishes. There (sect. 14) the churchwardens, with the consent of the vestry and of the bishop and incumbent are empowered to borrow "upon the credit of the church rates," &c. Here the overseers of the poor are joined with the churchwardens, and there is no mention of church rates. [MELLISH, L. J.—We must either say that those liable to church rates are liable to this rate, or that those liable to poor rate are liable to this rate, or we must invent some new rate to satisfy the statute.] In the Act for the Abolition of Compulsory Church Rates (31 & 32 Vict. c. 109). sect. 3, which relates to money due in any parish on church rates, or rates in the nature of church rates, and to money "in the name of church rates," ordered to be raised by any Act of Parliament, contains the proviso "that the accounts of the churchwardens of such parish in reference to the receipt and expenditure of the moneys levied under such Acts shall be audited annually," &c. The case of overseers of the poor being joined with the churchwardens is not contemplated. [MELLISH, L. J.—The boundaries of poor law parishes and ecclesiastical parishes are often independent, but the statute cannot have intended to rate persons not within the church parish, and who would not have the benefit of the expenditure.]

A tithe-owner is by the words of the statute entitled to be present and vote in the vestry on the question whether the money should borrowed.

Cur. adv. vult.

Judgment was delivered by Sir JAMES W. COLVILE.—This is an appeal from the judgment of the Court of Arches in a suit brought by the churchwardens of the parish church of Whitchurch, for subtraction of an alleged rate made under the 5 Geo. 4, c. 36, s. 1, against James Smallbones, the appellant, by which the appellant was ordered to pay his assessment to the rate and the costs of suit. It appeared that, in 1867, the sum of 2000*l.* was borrowed from the commissioners authorised to make advances for public works, under the provisions of the Act for the purpose of repairing and enlarging the parish church of Whitchurch, and that on the 7th Feb. 1868 the churchwardens and overseers of the parish of Whitchurch made a rate of 6d. in the pound upon the inhabitants and parishioners of the parish of Whitchurch for the purpose of paying the annual instalment, and the interest of the said sum of 2000*l.*, which became due to the commissioners on the 18th March. The appellant occupied a house in the parish, and was rated at the sum of 5*s.* 6*d.* The defence to the suit was, that Melville Portal Esq., the owner of a tithe rentcharge of the rateable value of 1189*l.* arising out of lands in the parish, was not assessed to the rate in respect of such tithe rentcharge, and it was admitted that if he ought to have been so assessed the rate was bad, and that the appellant would be entitled to succeed. The question therefore is, whether according to the true construction of the 5 Geo. 4, c. 36, the owner of a tithe rentcharge in a parish is liable to be assessed to the rates made for the repayment of money borrowed under the provisions of the Act? The first and second sections of the Act are as follows: By the 5 Geo. 4, c. 36, s. 1, it is enacted that—

From and after the passing of this Act, it shall and may be lawful for the churchwardens or chapelwardens and overseers of the poor of any parish in England or Wales, with the consent of the major part of the inhabitants and occupiers assessed to the relief of the poor, in vestry assembled, and with the consent of the bishop of the diocese, and the incumbent of such parish, to make application to the commissioners authorised and empowered to make advances for public works under the provisions of the said recited Acts, for any loan or advance under the powers, authorities, provisions, and regulations of the said Acts, and this Act, for such sum or sums in Exchequer bills or money, as shall be necessary for defraying the expense, or any part of the expense, of rebuilding, repairing, enlarging, or otherwise extending the accommodation in any church or chapel of any such parish. And if such commissioners shall think fit to entertain such application, and shall be satisfied that such consent as required by this Act has been given and obtained, it shall and may be lawful for such commissioners, and they are hereby authorised and empowered to make and grant any such loan or advance for the purposes aforesaid, in such manner as such commissioners are empowered to make any loan or advance under the authority of the said recited Acts or any of them; and it shall be lawful for such churchwardens or chapelwardens, together with the overseers of the poor, of or for any such parish with respect to which such application shall be made and granted, to receive the sum or sums so advanced, and to apply the same for the purposes mentioned in such application; and from and after the grant of any such loan or advance, it shall be lawful for the churchwardens or chapelwardens, and overseers of the poor of the parish in respect of which such loan or loans shall be advanced as aforesaid, and their successors fro. time to time for the time being, and they are hereby authorised and required to make such annual or half-yearly rates for the repayment of the sums so advanced, in such proportions and at such times as shall be directed and appointed by the said commissioners on that behalf, and to assign the rates so to be made as aforesaid as a security for repayment of the sums so advanced, in such manner and form as the said commissioners shall direct and appoint, and so as to secure the repayment of all sums so advanced, with interest thereon, at and after the rate of 4*l.* per cent. per annum, by annual or half-yearly instalments, on the amount of the principal money advanced, within the period of twenty years at the farthest from the advancing of any such sums respectively.

And by sect. 2 of the said Act it is enacted:

That it shall be lawful for any churchwarden or chapelwarden, or overseer in any parish in which any rates shall be made under the provisions of this Act, to collect, demand, and receive, sue for, levy, and recover all such rates, by all such ways and means as any church rates may by law be collected, demanded, received, sued for, levied, and recovered, as fully and effectually as if all power, authorities, provisions, penalties, and forfeitures relating to the collecting, demanding, suing for, levying, receiving, and recovering of any church rates, or relating to any refusal to pay any like rates were specially repeated and enacted in this Act, any law, statute, usage, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding.

The learned judge in the court below has held that though the Act does not specify the property on which the rate is to be levied, yet it is to be implied, that it is only to be levied on those on whom a church rate is to be levied, and that as the owner of a tithe rentcharge was not liable to be rated to an ordinary church rate, he was not liable to be rated to a rate made under the Act. The Act, however, nowhere describes the rates as church rates. On the contrary, it expressly distinguishes between the rates made under the provisions of the Act and church rates, and, although their Lordships agree, there are strong reasons for holding that every person liable to be assessed to a church rate is also liable to be assessed to a rate under the Act, because every such person is benefited by money being borrowed for the repair or building of the church, yet it does not follow that every person who is exempted from liability to a church rate is also to be exempted from a liability to pay a rate under the Act, unless the reason for his exemption is equally applicable. Now a tithe owner is exempted from an ordinary church rate for the repair of the body of a church, because he is under a particular liability to repair the chancel. He is not less liable, but more liable than the owners of other property in the parish to repair the church, being under a personal liability to repair a particular part of it. He is therefore not less benefited, but more benefited than the owners of other property in the parish by money being borrowed under the Act for the repairing, rebuilding, or enlarging the whole church including the chancel, and in this very case it is admitted that the money borrowed was expended in rebuilding the chancel as well as the rest of the church. Moreover, the owner of a tithe rentcharge, being an occupier of property assessed to the relief of the poor, is by the express words of the statute entitled to be present and to vote in the vestry on the question whether the money should be borrowed; and it would be strange if a person who, in respect of particular property, is entitled to vote on the question whether the money should be borrowed, and being in fact one of the borrowers, should not also be liable to be rated in respect of the same property to the rates made for the repayment of the money. It is indeed true that, in the case of an ordinary church rate also, a tithe owner is entitled to be present and vote in the vestry which imposes the rate, and, nevertheless, is not assessed to it; but, then, the money raised by an ordinary church rate cannot be expended in the repair of the chancel, and the tithe owner by the ancient custom of the realm is to be considered as having compounded for his liability to contribute to the church rate by having taken upon himself the exclusive liability to repair the chancel. On the whole their Lordships are of opinion that the owner of a tithe rentcharge being the occupier of property in the parish in respect of which he is entitled to vote upon the question whether money should be borrowed under the Act, and receiving as much or more benefit from the money being borrowed as the owners of other property in the parish, ought to be held liable to be rated to the rates made under the Act; and they will accordingly advise Her Majesty that the judgment of the Court of Arches ought to be reversed, and that judgment should be entered for the present appellant with costs in the court below, and the costs of this appeal.

Judgment reversed.

REG. v. STANGER.

Criminal information—Evidence of publication of libel—Affidavits.

Where a libel appeared in a newspaper, and a rule nisi calling for a criminal information against J. S., for printing and publishing the libel, was obtained upon affidavits in which one deponent said only that copies of the newspaper had been purchased by him at the publishing office of the paper; and another, that by a foot note at the end of the said newspapers, J. S. was stated to be the printer and publisher of them; and that the deponent believed that the said J. S. was the printer and publisher of the papers:

Held, that there was not sufficient legal evidence to show that the defendant was the person who published the libel, and that therefore the rule must be discharged.

Quære, whether the prosecutor might supplement his defective affidavits by having recourse to those used on the part of the defendant.

RULE calling upon the defendant to show cause why an information should not be exhibited against him for a misdemeanor in printing and publishing a false and scandalous libel.

In the Newcastle Daily Chronicle of the 23rd May 1870 was an article censuring the conduct of the prosecutor as a justice of the peace, and a similar article also appeared in the same newspaper of the 30th May 1870. These articles contained the libel complained of.

The following were the affidavits used to connect the defendant with the libellous articles:

First. Affidavit of W. H. D. Longstaffe, saying,

1. That on the 30th May last past I attended at the publishing office of the newspaper called the Newcastle Daily Chronicle, situated in Westgate-street, in the borough and county of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and purchased and paid for a copy of Number 3839 of the said Newcastle Daily Chronicle, dated the 30th May 1870, which then and there I received from William Gray, a clerk or salesman in the said office, and which said newspaper is now produced and shown to me, and marked with the letter A.

2. That on the 31st May last past I attended at the publishing office of the said Newcastle Daily Chronicle, situate as aforesaid, and purchased and paid for a copy of number 3839 of the said newspaper, dated the 23rd May 1870, which I then and there received from the said William Gray, and which said last-mentioned newspaper is now produced and shown to me, and marked with the letter B.

Secondly, affidavit of W. Crossman, saying:

1. That I have referred to the newspapers mentioned in the affidavit of W. D. Longstaffe, and verified by him, and which said newspapers are respectively marked A. and B., and I say that by a foot-note printed at the end of the said respective newspapers, John Stanger is stated to be the printer and publisher of the said newspaper respectively, and I say that the said John Stanger is, as I believe, the printer and publisher of the said papers.

Digby Seymour, Q. C. and Udall showed cause, arguing that the affidavits were insufficient; that they should afford such legal evidence as would justify a grand jury in finding a true bill of indictment; that the affidavits must be complete in the first instance; that there should be proof of publication by the defendant distinctly given, which was wanting here; and that recourse could not be had to the defendant's affidavits in answer, to supply the defect. Reg. v. Woolmer, 12 Ad. & E. 422.

Sir J. Coleridge, Q.C. (Solicitor-General), (with him Beresford), in support of the rule, contended that the two affidavits were sufficient; that the cases cited contra were decided when a statutory means of proof was available which was now taken away by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 24; that then absolute proof was required by the courts from a party who did not choose to adopt the statutory means, but that now common law primâ facie proof of publication was all that was necessary, or even in many cases possible; and that there was no denial in the defendant's affidavits that the newspaper was printed and published by him.

BLACKBURN, J.—We are agreed that the rule must be discharged, on the ground that there is not evidence to show that the person against whom the rule for a criminal information was moved, viz., John Stanger, is the publisher of the statement said to be libellous. There is no further evidence than that at the bottom of the newspaper John Stanger is described as the printer and publisher. And one of the persons who makes affidavits in support of the rule, says he believes Stanger is the publisher. That amounts to information and belief only, and anyone could depose to that. Then comes the question, is that sufficient legal evidence to show that Stanger was the person who published the libel? I think it is not. Facts might have been easily proved, which would have shown that Stanger was cognisant of or present at the printing or issuing of the paper, and then his own statement that it was printed and published by him would be sufficient. That information and belief only is not enough, was decided in Rex v. Willett (6 T. R. 294), where it was held that an affidavit by A., stating that B. had brought him a challenge from C., and that B. had refused to make an affidavit that C. sent him with it, is not evidence on which this court will grant a rule nisi for a criminal information against C. for sending the challenge. The court, after pointing out that the affidavit was but mere hearsay evidence, explained that "if they were to grant a rule calling on the defendant to show cause why an information should not be filed against him, it would be calling on him either to give evidence, on the showing cause, against himself, or leaving the rule to be made absolute on this affidavit alone, which was not legal evidence." So that the ratio decidendi in that case, determined eighty years ago, was that the "information and belief" of a person was not sufficient to call on the other party to make an answer thereto: (Rex v. Willett) was acted on subsequently in the case Ex parte Williams (sup.) Then comes the second question. Although the material fact did not appear in the affidavits upon which the rule was obtained, yet as other affidavits have now been used, it is said by the Solicitor-General that we should look at those. It is not necessary to decide whether we should do so or not. In Rex v. Mein (sup.) Lord Kenyon, C. J. states that if the matter had rested on the relator's affidavit alone he should have been clearly of opinion that the information could not go; but that upon conference with the other judges, he found that it was not unusual to have recourse to the affidavits against the rule, in order to come, if possible, at the whole truth of the transaction. Mr. Cole, in his book upon Criminal Informations, remarks on that and says that the difference between Reg. v. Baldwin (sup.) and Rex v. Mein was that the former was a criminal matter and the latter a civil. I do not think that distinction is a sound one at all. Whether the application made to the court is for leave to file an information in the nature of a quo warranto, or for libel, seems to me the same. I think the rule in Rex v. Mein was sounder and more consistent with good sense. If it were necessary to consider which rule—that one, or the one in Reg. v. Baldwin—we should follow, I should require a good deal of consideration. But the affidavit of the defendant solely amounts to this—viz., that having made an affidavit, he does not therein answer so as to negative the belief that he was the publisher, and I think for the reasons in Rex v. Willett (sup.) he was not bound to answer, and on that ground the rule should be discharged.

RAWNSLEY v. HUTCHINSON AND OTHERS.

Quarter sessions—Adjournment of—Appeal dismissed with costs—Costs taxed and inserted in the order at the adjourned sessions.

An adjourned quarter sessions is a continuation of the original quarter sessions. Where, therefore, an appeal under the 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 27, which requires that "the court at such sessions shall hear and determine the matter of such appeal," was dismissed with costs, which costs were not taxed until the adjourned sessions, when they were ascertained and inserted in the order of sessions:

Held, that such adjourned sessions were a continuation of the original quarter sessions, and that the taxation was warranted, and the order good.

THIS was a rule to quash an order of quarter sessions dismissing an appeal, and ordering the appellant to pay the sum of 27*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.* for costs. It appeared that at the general licensing meeting at Halifax in August last, the appellant applied for a wine and beer licence; but, being opposed, it was refused. The justices having adjourned over three weeks, he again applied at the adjournment day, when the justices refused to hear such second application. He then appealed to the Michaelmas Quarter Sessions, held at Leeds, when the court dismissed his appeal with costs, and the quarter sessions were then adjourned, and at such adjourned sessions at Sheffield they were taxed (under protest from the appellant) at the sum of 27*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.*, and the amount was inserted in the order. Not having been paid, the order of sessions was removed into this court and made a rule of court, under the provisions of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 18, for the purpose of being enforced, whereupon the present rule was obtained. The present rule was moved upon the ground that it was not competent to the adjourned sessions to make the order in question.

By sect. 8 of the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 27 (the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869), all the provisions of the 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, as to appeals from any act of any justice shall, so far as may be, have effect with regard to grants of certificates under this Act; and by sect. 27 of the 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, a right of appeal is given to a party applying for a licence to the quarter sessions; "and in case of the dismissal of such appeal, or of the affirmance of the judgment on which such act was done, and which was appealed against, the said court shall adjudge and order the said judgment to be carried into execution and costs awarded to be paid, and shall, if necessary, issue process for enforcing such order."

Philbrick appeared in support of the order.—It is said on the other side that, although the quarter sessions could have taxed the costs, no taxation could take place at an adjourned sessions. But an adjournment of the sessions is only a continuation of the original sessions, and in principle it matters not whether the sessions are adjourned from day to day or over a week or a month, provided no subsequent quarter sessions should intervene. It is often impossible, from the pressure of business, that the clerk of the peace can tax at the original sessions. The other side will rely upon Reg. v. Belton (11 Q. B. 379), but that was not a question of the adjournment of the sessions, but of the adjournment of the appeal, which was held to be bad, inasmuch as the words of the 27th section of the 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, are that "the court at such sessions shall hear and determine the matter of such appeal." [LUSH, J.—That was not an adjournment of the sessions, but an adjournment of the case. It is really difficult to see what difference there is between an adjournment from one day to the next, and an adjournment for a week.]

Hannay, contra.—There is an important distinction between an original quarter sessions and an adjournment; the same justices may not be present at both and seldom are, and the granting of costs is a judicial act, which should be performed by the justices who decide the appeal; the order is incomplete until the amount of costs is filled in, and this should be the act of the sessions at which the costs are granted: (Selwood v. Mount, 1 Q. B. 726; Reg. v. Clark, 5 Q. B. 887.) [LUSH, J.—Suppose the court were to adjourn from the Thursday before Good Friday to the Saturday, will a taxation on the Saturday be good? and if so, why not equally so if the adjournment be for a week or a month?] Where the adjournment is merely temporary it may be otherwise, but here the regular business was at an end, and the sessions were only adjourned for certain specific business. The 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 27, ties the justices down to decide the whole matter at the original sessions, and Reg. v. Belton (11 Q. B. 379) is an authority. The appeal was either adjourned or not; if not adjourned then there was no order for costs; if adjourned, then it is within Reg. v. Belton, and this order cannot be sustained.

KEATING, J.—This is the case of an appeal which was heard at the Michaelmas quarter sessions, and was then dismissed with costs, but the costs were not then ascertained; the sessions, however, were afterwards held by adjournment, and the costs which had been directed at the former sessions were at these adjourned sessions taxed and allowed; and the question now is this—being an appeal under the provisions of the 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 27, can the costs be ascertained at an adjournment of the sessions? Now, although Mr. Hannay has endeavoured to throw much difficulty into the subject, it seems to me to be a very plain case, for it comes simply to this—whether an adjourned sessions is in law the same as an original sessions? If an adjourned sessions is another and a different sessions, then this order for costs is wrong. The 27th section of the 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, says that "the court at such sessions shall hear and determine the matter of such appeal," and therefore no other court can deal with the appeal, and in support of his argument Mr. Hannay relies upon Reg. v. Belton, which, however, seems to me not to further his argument, for in that case it was the appeal which was adjourned; whilst here it was not so. I am of opinion, therefore, that the proceeding was perfectly regular.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. An adjournment of the court is an adjournment of the same sessions. This was pending business, and at the adjournment day it came before the court again. I can see nothing in the 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 27, which requires the court to determine an appeal upon one day. What the statute requires is that the appeal shall be heard and determined at the then next quarter sessions; there is nothing, however, which prevents the court from adjourning these sessions if convenience requires, and if adjourned it is merely a continuance of the original sessions.

HANNEN, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Rule discharged.

THE GRAND JUNCTION CANAL COMPANY (apps.) v. THE CHURCHWARDENS AND OVERSEERS OF THE POOR OF HEMEL HEMPSTEAD AND KING'S LANGLEY (resps.).

Poor-rate — Canal—Grand Junction Canal Company—Land and buildings of company adjoining the canal—Principle of rating.

By the 19th section of the 34 Geo. 3 c. xxiv., the Grand Junction Canal Company were to be rated to all parliamentary and parochial taxes and assessments, for and in respect of the lands and grounds already purchased or taken, or to be purchased or taken, and all warehouses or other buildings to be erected by the company of proprietors in the same proportion as other lands, grounds, and buildings lying near the same are or shall be rated; and as the same lands, grounds, and buildings so purchased or taken, or to be purchased or taken, and erected, would be rateable, in case the same were the property of individuals, in their natural capacity. The company purchased land; and buildings thereon adjoining the canal, were erected by them, which became much enhanced in value, and, subsequently, they adopted the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 42, and became carriers upon the canal upon their own account.

Held, in assessing the canal to the poor-rate, that—first, the rateable value of the land occupied by the canal should not be estimated as being increased by the fact that the company had become carriers; secondly, that the buildings should be rated in the same proportion as other buildings near, and that the lands and other premises of the company should be rated in the same proportion as other lands and premises near.

THIS was a case stated by an arbitrator for the opinion of this court, pursuant to the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 45, upon an appeal by the appellants against two poor rates, as follows:

1. By a certain private Act of Parliament, passed in the 33 Geo. 3, c. lxxx., intituled "An Act for making and maintaining a navigable Canal from the Oxford Canal Navigation at Brainstone in the county of Northampton to join the River Thames at or near Brentford in the County of Middlesex, and also certain collateral Cuts from the said intended Canal," certain persons therein named were formed and incorporated into a joint-stock company for the purpose aforesaid by the name and style of "The Company of Proprietors of the Grand Junction Canal," and by that name to sue and be sued.

2. By a certain private Act of Parliament passed in the 34th year of King George 3, c. xxiv., entitled "An Act for making certain navigable Cuts from the Towns of Buckingham, Aylesbury, and Wendover, in the county of Buckingham, to communicate with the Grand Junction Navigation authorised to be made by an Act of the last Session of Parliament, and for amending the said Act," after reciting the said first hereinbefore-mentioned statute, the said company were empowered to make and maintain the said cuts in the title of the said amending statutes referred to.

3. By the 19th section of the said amending statute it was enacted as follows, that is to say: "That the said company of proprietors shall from time to time be rated to all parliamentary and parochial taxes and assessments for and in respect of the lands and grounds already purchased or taken, or to be purchased or taken, and all warehouses or other buildings to be erected by the said company of proprietors, in pursuance of the said recited Act and this Act, in the same proportion as other lands, grounds, and buildings lying near the same are or shall be rated, and as the same lands, grounds, and buildings so purchased or taken, or to be purchased or taken and erected, would be rateable, in case the same were the property of individuals in their natural capacity.

4. By the 7th section of a certain other private Act of Parliament, passed in the 36th year of King George 3, c. xxv., intituled, "An Act to enable the Company of Proprietors of the Grand Junction Canal to finish and complete the same, and the several cuts and other works authorised to be made and done by them by virtue of several Acts of Parliament," it was enacted by sect. 7: "All parochial rates and assessments which shall or may at any time be laid, assessed, or imposed upon the lands and personal estate of the said company of proprietors, shall be in each parish, township, hamlet, or place respectively, in proportion to the length of the said canal and cuts respectively, in such respective parish, township, hamlet, or place, and not otherwise."

5. By the aforesaid private Acts all necessary powers were given to the said company to take, hold and use lands, and erect buildings for the purposes of the said company, and to make and maintain the said canal and cuts, and which have been duly exercised by the said company.

6. The aforesaid canal has long since been made, and a portion thereof, and the towing-path and lock-houses attached thereto, cover and occupy nineteen acres and one rood of land, and is of the length of two miles four furlongs, in the parish of Hemel Hempstead, in the county of Hertford, and no more, and which said lands were purchased by the said company, under and by virtue of the aforesaid private Acts, and for the purposes of the company.

7. Another portion of the said canal and the locks and buildings attached thereto cover and occupy eighteen acres and two roods, and is of the length of two miles and two furlongs, in the parish of King's Langley, in the county of Hertford, and no more, and which said last-mentioned lands were also purchased by the said company, under and by virtue of the aforesaid private statutes, and for the purposes of the said company.

8. In or about the year 1848 the said company adopted the provisions of the statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 42, and commenced business as carriers on their own account on the said canal, and have from that time exercised all the powers given by the first section of that statute for the purpose of carrying on the trade or business of carriers, and for such trade or business the company have a tariff of freights and charges different from the tolls chargeable by their private Act.

9. Lock-houses and toll-houses have been erected on the lands of the said company, which are occupied by them for the purposes of their business.

10. In or about the year 1836 an Act was obtained for making a railway from London to Birmingham, which railway runs parallel with the said canal through the said parishes at various distances from the said canal, not exceeding 300 yards at the farthest point, at one place crossing the canal, which railway is assessed to the poor-rates at 2000*l.* per mile.

11. Buildings have been erected on much of the land lying near to the said canal, and other portions of such lands have been converted into gardens for watercresses, and otherwise greatly improved in value.

12. On the 8th Jan. 1867 an assessment for the relief of the poor of the said parish of Hemel Hempstead was made, allowed, and published according to law; and in and by the said assessment the said company were rated upon the annual sum of 200*l.* in respect of the said lands, tenements, and hereditaments in the said parish, as the net rateable value thereof.

13. On the 17th Feb. 1867 an assessment for the relief of the poor of the said parish of King's Langley was duly made, allowed, and published; and in and by the said assessment the said company were rated upon the annual sum of 196*l.* in respect of the said lands, tenements, and hereditaments in the said parish, as the net rateable value thereof.

14. The said company, on or about the 6th July 1867, duly objected before the assessment committee of the Hemel Hempstead Union, in which both of the said parishes are included, pursuant to previous written notices duly served upon them and upon the overseers of the poor of the said parishes respectively, to the said valuation lists respectively, upon the grounds of unfairness and incorrectness, and that in particular the said lands, tenements, and hereditaments of the said company, in the said respective parishes of Hemel Hempstead and King's Langley, were not valued and assessed in and by the said valuation lists respectively, according to the provisions of the said private statutes hereinbefore referred to in paragraphs 3 and 4, and that in respect of the said respective lands, tenements, and hereditaments of the said company in the said parishes respectively, the said company were over-assessed in the said valuation lists respectively, but the said company failed to obtain such relief in the matter as the said company deemed just.

The questions for the opinion of the court were, first, whether the company is liable to be assessed to the poor-rates at the value of the lands, buildings, and premises as improved by reason of the business of carriers carried on by the appellants? Secondly, what is the legal construction of "lying near" to the canal? Thirdly, whether, in estimating the value of the land over which the railway runs, the value of the site only is to be estimated, as being lands, grounds, and buildings, or is such site to be estimated at its improved value as a railway? Fourthly, are the lands lying near to the canal upon which buildings have been erected to be estimated at the value only of the sites of such buildings, or is the value of such buildings to be estimated? Fifthly, are the lands lying near to the canal, which have been improved by their conversion into gardens or otherwise, to be estimated at their improved value, or as agricultural land only? Sixthly, In estimating the value at which the premises of the appellants are to be assessed in proportion to the lands, grounds, and buildings lying near thereto, are all such lands, grounds, and buildings to be thrown into hotchpot, and the entire of the premises of the appellants to be assesed at the average rating value of the whole of such lands, grounds, and buildings, or is each portion of the appellants' premises to be assessed only in proportion to the rating value of so much of the lands, grounds, and buildings as is lying next to such portion of appellants' premises? Seventhly, whether, in estimating the value at which the premises of the appellants are to be assessed the proportion which by sect. 19 such assessment is to bear to the lands, grounds, and buildings lying near to the canal is to be distributive, that is, whether the land of the appellants is to be assessed in the same proportion as the land lying near, and the buildings of the appellants as the buildings lying near, or whether all the premises of the appellants are to be assessed as a whole in proportion to the aggregate rating value of all the lands, grounds, and buildings lying near?

Manisty, Q. C. (Bush Cooper with him) appeared for the appellants.—With reference to the first question, the rateable value ought not to be increased on account of the company becoming carriers; the only effect of the operation of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 42 is that they carry for themselves as well as for the public generally. The other points are all determined by the cases of R. v. The Grand Junction Canal (1 B. & A. 289) and R. v. Grand Junction Canal (7 W. R. 597), Reg. v. The Proprietors of the Glamorganshire Canal Company (3 E. & E. 186; 29 L. J. 238, M. C.).

Sir J. Karslake, Q.C. (Taylor with him), appeared for the respondents.—The 8 & 9 Vict. c. 42, has placed canal companies upon the footing of common carriers, and they can make use of their canals in any manner most beneficial to themselves. The case of Reg v. The Proprietors of the Glamor- ganshire Canal Company, 3 E. & E. 186, lays down the true principle of rating in this case.

The COURT intimated their opinion that by the adoption of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 42, there was no repeal of the rating clauses in the 34 Geo. 3 c. xxiv; and that the land occupied by the canal lying near to the railway, ought not to be rated in proportion to the improved value of land with a railway upon it.

Manisty, Q.C. was heard in reply.

MELLOR, J.—We have disposed of several of the points raised by this case in the course of the argument, and there is now really but one upon which it is necessary we should deliver our judgment. If this case had been governed by Reg. v. The Proprietors of the Glamorganshire Canal Company (3 E. & E. 186), so that we could not dismiss that case from our view, I should have felt myself compelled to follow the rule which is there laid down; but it appears to me that there is an essential distinction between that case and the present. As I understand that decision, it was confined to the meaning to be put upon the words "lands or grounds," the word "buildings" not being mentioned. It appears also that a considerable portion of the lands had become covered with buildings, and it would have been impossible to have laid down any rule as to the rateable value of the canal without going through the process which the court felt itself at liberty to go through. I confess that I think that the Lord Chief Justice in disapproving of the judgment in Reg. v. The Grand Junction Railway Company (7 W. R. 597) scarcely sufficiently considered what really was intended to be expressed by Lord Campbell, C. J. and Erle, J., as reported in the Weekly Reporter. If they really intended that the land of the company was to be rated simply as agricultural land, I should agree with the present Lord Chief Justice; but I rather incline to think that that was not the meaning intended to be conveyed by what fell from Lord Campbell, C. J. or Erle, J. In the present case, as was suggested by my brother Hannen, I think that the respondents are not to look at the agricultural value of the land lying near at the time the Act passed, but they are to look at the reflected value of the land as determined by the change of circumstances. If from various circumstances the land becomes of more value, as if by a new mode of cultivation being adopted, a different use, such as that of a market garden had been made of it, then the rateable value of the canal would be determined by what would be the rateable value of the lands lying near with that additional value arising from the change of circumstances. Now, in this case we find it stated in parapraph 3 that, by the 19th section of the amending statute it was enacted as follows, that is to say, "that the said company of proprietors shall from time to time be rated to all parliamentary and parochial taxes and assessments for and in respect of the lands and grounds already purchased or taken, or to be purchased or taken; and all warehouses or other buildings to be erected by the said company of proprietors in pursuance of the said recited Act and this Act in the same proportion as other lands, grounds, and buildings so purchased or taken and erected would be rateable in case the same were the property of individuals in their natural capacity." We therefore find that the word "buildings" appears expressly to regulate the rating of buildings, and "lands" the rating of lands; and I think that we cannot interpret the word "lands" to mean land covered with buildings. It appears to me that in assessing the rateable value of the canal lying near to this particular land, the respondents must not take into consideration the land appropriated to buildings, or building land in the proper sense of that term, because no tenant from year to year would give anything for building land qua building land, but it may be that persons would give a higher value for land because it was near to buildings. In that sense alone, as I think, can we interpret the words of the 19th section. What I say is this, that the reflected value of the land, varying from time to time according to circumstances, is to be the measure of the rating of the land and buildings of the appellants. That being so, I think that our judgment does not in any degree affect the decision of this court in Reg. v. The Proprietors of the Glamorganshire Navigation (3 E. & E. 186), in which the Lord Chief Justice delivered the judgment of the court. This case is entirely distinguishable on the ground that the word "buildings" is used.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The only question which remains for our opinion is whether the bed of the canal is to be rated as if it were land built over and covered with buildings, or whether it is to be rated as if it were open land? I think that it is only necessary to read the section to discover what it was that the Legislature meant. I think that the plain meaning of the language is, that, for the purpose of rating it is to be assumed always that the bed of the canal is open land, not land covered with buildings, but that whatever buildings are erected by the appellants on the land are to be rateable as buildings, and both are to be rated in proportion to the value of other lands and buildings in the neighbourhood or locality. The bed of the canal would no doubt be enhanced in value by reason of the growth of buildings in the neighbourhood, and the increased value is to be the value upon which the rate is to be made. It is not to be rated as land covered with buildings. I quite agree with my brother Mellor that the section which we have to interpret differs from the one upon which the court gave judgment in Reg. v. The Proprietors of the Glamorganshire Navigation. There the word "lands" was not used in conjunction with the word "buildings," but was evidently used to denote in its legal sense land of every description, whether covered with buildings or not. I also agree with what my brother Mellor has said as to the expression attributed to this court in Reg. v. The Grand Junction Canal Company, reported in the Weekly Reporter. If it was intended to lay down that the land which now comprises the bed of the canal was for all time to be treated as if it were purely agricultural land, I agree that that would not be the proper interpretation of the Act. But I do not think that the court intended to say so. I should dissent from the judgment of Lord Campbell and Erle, J., if they are to be read in the same way in which this court in Reg. v. The Proprietors of the Glamorganshire Navigation understood them. The land of the appellants is to be treated as land open and not covered with buildings, and which might be turned to uses more profitable than agricultural land.

REG. v. HESLOP.

REG. v. LITTLECHILD.

Game—Killing on a Sunday—Joint information against two—Joint trial—Several convictions— 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, s. 3.

Where two or more persons commit together an offence for which they are severally liable, they may, upon an information before justices, be tried together, and separately convicted; and in such a case it is a matter of discretion alone with the justices whether or not they will permit the defendants to be tried separately.

Whether an offence be single or several must depend upon the wording of the statute creating it, or its nature.

Where the offence is in its nature single, there the penalty can only be single; but where it is in its nature several, each offender is liable.

By the 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32 (Game Act), s. 3, it is enacted "that if any person shall kill, &c., any game on a Sunday, such person shall on conviction forfeit for any such offence not exceeding 5*l.*:

Held, that under this section two persons who were jointly concerned in killing game on a Sunday might be informed against and tried jointly, and severally convicted in the full penalty.

THESE were two cases stated by the quarter sessions for the county of Essex upon an appeal by each appellant against a separate conviction of each, for an offence under sect. 3 of the 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32 (Game Act), upon the hearing of which appeals the said convictions were affirmed, subject to a case reserved for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench, upon the second ground of appeal, namely, that if the said justices before whom the information was heard, did, in fact, convict the appellants of a joint offence, it was illegal to inflict such separate penalties upon each of them as they inflicted; and if the said justices did in fact convict each of them as of a separate offence, then it was illegal of them to do so upon a joint information, and a joint hearing after they had been requested and had refused to hear the charge against each separately.

On the hearing of the appeal it appeared that in respect to what was relied on by the appellants under the second ground of appeal the facts were as follows:—On the 13th Oct. 1869, one George Littlechild, and one William Heslop, were informed against by John Boram, by an information, of which the following is a copy:—

Essex to wit.—Be it remembered that within three calendar months after the commission of the offence hereinafter mentioned, to wit, on the 13th Oct. 1869, at High Ongar, in the county of Essex, John Boram, of Kelvedon Hatch, in the said county of Essex, gamekeeper, in his proper person, cometh before the undersigned, one of Her Majesty's justices of the peace, in and for the said county, and now here giveth me, the said justice, to understand and be informed that George Littlechild, of the parish of Kelvedon Hatch, in the county of Essex, farmer, and William Heslop, of Romford, in the said county, carpenter, did within three calendar months now last past, to wit, on Sunday, the 10th Oct. 1869, at the parish of Kelvedon Hatch, in the said county, unlawfully use a certain engine, to wit a gun, for the purpose of killing game, to wit two pheasants, contrary to the statute in such case made and provided, whereby and by force of the said statute they, the said George Littlechild and William Heslop, have severally forfeited a sum money not exceeding 5*l.*, to be applied as the statutes in that behalf made and provided direct. And thereupon the said John Boram prays that the said George Littlechild and William Heslop may be duly caused to appear before one or more of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said county, to answer to the said information, and to be further dealt with according to law.

In obedience to the summonses duly issued against them, the said George Littlechild and also the said William Heslop attended before the petty sessions for the division of Ongar, in the said county of Essex, holden at Chipping Ongar in the said county, on the 23rd Oct. 1869, and the said information then and there came on to be heard.

At the said petty sessions the said George Littlechild and the said William Heslop were defended by an attorney, who, on behalf of both, made application to the justices present that the cases might be heard separately, in order that on hearing the charge against the said George Littlechild, the said William Heslop might be called to give evidence, but the said justices refused to hear the said cases separately, and after hearing the evidence for the prosecution, convicted both the said defendants. 12. The two convictions returned to the quarter sessions were verbatim the same, except that the name of George Littlechild was used in the one, the name of William Heslop was used in the other.

On the hearing of the first-mentioned appeal it was contended for the said appellant that the said proceedings at the said petty sessions were irregular and invalid, and that by reason thereof the said conviction of the said appellant was invalid and ought to be quashed on appeal.

It was contended for the respondent that the said proceedings were not objectionable, and that the said conviction was valid.

The court of quarter sessions decided in favour of the respondent, and on their proceeding to hear the case of the appellant in the said first-mentioned appeal, the said William Heslop was called, and gave evidence for and on behalf of the appellant George Littlechild.

In the secondly above-mentioned appeal the appellant (William Heslop) was also convicted at the same time and place as the said George Littlechild, and all the facts above stated in reference to the appeal of the said George Littlechild as to the hearing before the petty sessions of the case against him apply equally and respectively to the said appeal by the said William Heslop or to the hearing before the petty sessions of the case against him, the said William Heslop.

The question for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench is—whether, by reason of the said proceedings at the petty sessions, the court of quarter sessions ought on the said appeals to have quashed the said convictions?

If the said question be answered in the affirmative, the said convictions are to be quashed. If it be answered in the negative, the said convictions are to stand confirmed.

By the 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32 (Game Act), s. 3, it is enacted "That if any person whatsoever shall kill or take any game, or use any dog, gun, net, or other engine or instrument for the purpose of killing or taking any game on a Sunday or Christmas Day, such person shall, on conviction thereof before two justices of the peace, forfeit and pay for every such offence any sum of money not exceeding 5*l.* as to the said justices shall seem meet, together with the costs of the conviction," &c.

H. T. Atkinson appeared for the appellants.—

The conviction was bad, inasmuch as it was separate for what was a joint offence. The information was a joint one, and the hearing was joint; therefore the conviction should have been joint. There is only one penalty imposed by the 3rd section of the 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, of not exceeding 5*l.*, and yet in consequence of there being separate convictions each appellant is ordered to pay the penalty of 3*l.* That it was a joint offence is clear from the fact that the two appellants, Littlechild and Heslop, used a gun, and killed two pheasants. The justices, therefore, could not have convicted each of using a gun and killing two pheasants. [MELLOR, J.—Each has committed an offence, although jointly. The question is, can the justices upon a joint offence convict separately?] The justices find that each has committed it. [MELLOR, J.—I find it stated in Paley on Convictions, p. 73: "Where the act is such that several may join in it, all the offenders may be included in the same information and conviction. But where separate convictions were drawn up upon a joint information the court refused to order the justices to alter the conviction by making it a joint one:" (Re Clee and Asbourne, 21 L. J. 112, M. C.) The section says, "If any person shall kill," &c., so that each will be liable to a penalty, though from their being together it may be a joint offence. LUSH, J.—Would it not be wrong under this section to impose a joint penalty? Each is liable to the entire penalty. The question asked is, whether by reason of the proceedings at the petty sessions the quarter sessions ought to have quashed the convictions?] It is clear that only one killed the two pheasants, and only one gun was used; the appellants, therefore, could not have been guilty: (Ex parte Sylvester, 9 B. & C. 61. per Bayley, J.) If it was a separate offence the justices at petty sessions ought to have allowed each defendant to have been tried separately.

Warton, for the respondents.—This was an offence committed by two, for which each is liable, and they were both properly tried together, just as two persons may be tried together upon an indictment for an offence committed together, for which each would be liable to the full penalty. It is merely a matter of discretion with the justices to allow a separate trial for each (Re Biggins, 5 L. T. Rep. 805). But, even supposing there was any error in this, the appeal was a fresh hearing, and then each case was tried separately, and each appellant was called for the other. The defendants had each committed an offence, though both joined in committing it, and therefore a separate penalty was properly imposed upon each. The distinction between what is a joint and what a separate offence, is well explained in Re Bleasdall and another, 4 T. R. 809, which was a conviction on the statute of 5 Anne c. 14, s. 4, for using a greyhound to destroy game without being qualified, for which the defendants were convicted in 5*l.* each, which conviction the court said could not be supported, for that it was only one offence, and that the magistrates should only have convicted them in one penalty; that this question depended on the 5 Anne c. 14, s. 4, which enacts, "that if any person or persons not qualified, &c., shall keep or use any greyhound, &c., to kill and destroy game, and shall be thereof convicted, &c., the person or persons so convicted shall forfeit the sum of 5*l.*" There, there was only one for the using of the dog, however many may have been the persons using it. The same doctrine is laid down in Re Clack (Cowp. 610; Reg v. Hube, 5 T. R. 542).

MELLOR, J.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the quarter sessions was right. We must look in such cases as these at the wording of the statutes to ascertain what is meant. The principle is very clearly stated by Lord Mansfield in Rex v. Clarke (Cowp. 612). He says, "Where the offence is, in its nature single, and cannot be severed, there the penalty shall be only single, because, though several persons may join in committing it, it still constitutes but one offence. But where the offence is in its nature several, and where every person concerned may be separately guilty of it, there each offender is separately liable to the penalty, because the crime of each is distinct from the offence of the others, and each is punishable for his own crime." In the present case, when the information was laid it was treated as a joint offence, and at the hearing the defendants applied to be separately tried. That, however, was a matter entirely for the discretion of the justices, and neither could we nor the quarter sessions interfere. It is said this is a joint offence, and there should have been a joint penalty; but the words of the 3rd section of the 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, point to each person as committing the offence. The offence is one certainly that may be committed by many, but each of them commits the offence, and if, therefore, a joint penalty had been imposed it would have been erroneous.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is obvious that two or more may assist in doing an act. That being so, the information was not objectionable for describing the act which many may commit as having been committed by the two defendants. Being jointly charged, each one claimed a right to be tried separately. But when several are jointly charged, can each one claim as a right to be separately tried? I think not, and there is no authority to the contrary. It is said, however, that a separate conviction of each is wrong. But if each has been guilty of an offence which each may commit, each may be convicted, and can it be said that a separate conviction is wrong? I can see no objection, no injustice or injury is done in each being separately convicted. I think, therefore, that the convictions were good, and the quarter sessions correct in their judgment.

HANNEN, J.—I am also of the same opinion. The first question which arises is, whether the defendants were entitled to be tried separately? Now that was an information for an offence of which two or more persons might be guilty. If so, they might be tried together, and it is only a matter of discretion with the justices to allow them to be separately tried. Then the second question is whether this was an offence for which the two defendants could be convicted separately? The rule upon the subject is clearly laid down in Paley on Convictions, p. 263. Now this is a case which falls within the first branch of this position. It was proper therefore to treat the offences as several. There is a case in 15 C. B., N. S., 550, of Mayhew (app.) v. Wardley (resp.), where two persons who were in a highway shot a partridge, and it was questioned whether the two offenders should have been convicted jointly; but it was held that they were rightly separately convicted, for it might well be inferred that the two were not out for the common purpose of killing game, and that the unlawful act was the act of each.

THE HAMMERSMITH BRIDGE COMPANY (apps.) v. THE CHURCHWARDENS AND OVERSEERS OF THE PARISH OF HAMMERSMITH (resps.)

Sewers rate—Metropolitan district—Bridge and approaches—Rateability of bridge—General benefit from sewerage of district—The Metropolitan Sewers Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 112, s. 76)—The Metropolitan Local Management Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 126, s. 164).

The Overseers made a sewer rate for a metropolitan district, under 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, and assessed the company in respect of a "moiety of suspension bridge, appurtenances, and approaches," in one sum.

The Company built this bridge over the Thames, with roads and approaches, and opened the same to the public, on payment of tolls, in 1827. The bridge drains directly into the river. The approaches drain into a sewer made in 1854; but before that date the surface water was carried from them into the river by a barrel drain, which still exists, and could again be used as formerly.

The Company appealed against the above-mentioned assessment on the ground that the bridge was not rateable, as it derived no benefit from the sewers, and that, being therefore originally exempt, its exemption was preserved by the Metropolitan Sewers Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 112), s. 76, and the Metropolitan Management Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 164:

Held, per Blackburn and Hannen, JJ. (Cockburn, C. J., dissentiente), on the authority of Soady v. Wilson (3 Ad. & E. 248) that a property such as the bridge and roads, although not deriving any immediate benefit from the sewers, does derive the general benefit and advantage of being accessible from the proper sewerage of the district; consequently that it would not have been exempt from sewers rates antecedent to 1848, and is therefore rateable.

ON an appeal against a sewers rate made on the 16th March 1868, the following case was stated under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45:

1. The appellants were rated in the sum of 39*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.* in respect of a "moiety of suspension bridge, appurtenances, and approaches," at a gross estimated rental of 1106*l.* and on a rateable value of 956*l.*

2. The appellants are the Hammersmith Bridge Company, constituted and incorporated by an Act of Parliament made in the 5 Geo. 4 (c. 112), for the purpose of building a bridge over the Thames from Hammersmith, in the county of Middlesex, to Barnes in the county of Surrey, and for making convenient roads and avenues to communicate with such bridge. The said Act was altered and amended by another Act passed in the 9 Geo. 4 (c. 52).

3. The above Acts hereinafter referred to as The Company's Acts may, if necessary be referred to as part of this case.

4. The respondents who are the Churchwardens and Overseers of the Parish of Hammersmith, made the rate under an order of the Board of Works for the Fulham district, constituted and incorporated by the Metropolitan Local Management Act 1855 (amended by the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 112, and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), for the local management of the metropolis in respect of the sewerage and drainage, and the paving, and the cleansing, and improvements thereof.

5. The appellants, under the powers conferred upon them by the said Company's Acts, made and completed a bridge over the Thames, and the said bridge with the approaches thereto, were thrown open to the public for use upon payment of the prescribed tolls in the year 1827. The said bridge and approaches have from thence hitherto been continually maintained by the appellants for, and have been used by, the public.

6. The parish of Hammersmith is one of the two parishes that comprise the Fulham district. It extends on the south to the middle line of the river Thames. The said bridge so made by the appellants as aforesaid, and hereinafter called "the bridge," crosses the river from Hammersmith on the north side to Barnes on the south side, one half being in Hammersmith parish and the other half being in Barnes parish.

7. The bridge drains directly into the river, and no part of it drains into the sewers of the district board of works or into any sewer whatever. The approaches, "the roads," and other neighbouring public ways are drained partly by the Metropolitan Board of Works and partly by the district board of works.

8. The appellants under the powers of the above Acts also purchased land and formed roads on each side of the bridge as approaches thereto. These roads they are bound to keep, and have kept, in repair. These roads did not drain into any common sewer until 1854 (none having existed there previously), up to which time the surface water was carried off by a barrel drain into the river. This barrel drain was made and maintained by the appellants, and is still in existence, and might be used as before. In that year 1854 the then Commissioners of Sewers constructed a sewer, hereinafter called the New Sewer, under the appellants' land. This sewer goes from the high road at Hammersmith into the Thames, near Hammersmith-bridge, and the commissioners made gullies to conduct the surface water from the road to the new sewer. The appellants did not require this to be done, nor was it necessary for them that it should be done, inasmuch as up to the time of construction of the said new sewer the beforementioned barrel drain was amply sufficient to carry off the surface water from and efficiently drain the said roads.

9. The new sewer became vested in the Metropolitan Board of Works, by virtue of the Metropolitan Local Management Act 1855, s. 135, and schedule D, and since it was constructed always has been and still is in operation as above described.

10. The houses adjacent to the roads drain into the new sewer. The surface water diverted from the appellants' drain into the new sewer assists to carry down the soil in that sewer.

11. The owners and occupiers of the said adjacent houses pay the sewers rate in respect of them. No sewers rate was ever made upon, or paid in the parish till the year 1854, but in that year and from thence to 1861, rates were made upon and paid by the appellants.

12. In 1862, after the opinion pronounced by the Court of Queen's Bench on the Vauxhall Bridge case, the appellants objected to the charge of sewers rate, and the then overseers in conformity with that opinion, reduced the rate from 475*l.* to 40*l.* [Copy assessment set out, in which the description of property rated was "moiety of Suspension Bridge and appurtenances." Gross estimated rental "45*l.*," rateable value "40*l.*"] This rating was continued down to the making of the rate now appealed against.

13. The rate appealed against is made on the persons, including the appellants, and in respect of the property, including the bridge, by law rateable to the relief of the poor in the said parish, and is assessed upon the net annual value of such property ascertained by the rate for the time being for the relief of the poor.

14. The parties are to be at liberty to refer to the Act for the Local Management of the Metropolis.

15. The parties have agreed that no objection is to be taken to the form of the rate.

16. The appellants contend that they are not liable to be rated in respect of "the bridge," but only in respect of "the roads," in the rate called the "Approaches." The respondents contend that "the bridge" and the roads are one property, and, as such, both rateable according to the assessment for the relief of the poor.

17. The question for the opinion of the court was whether the bridge and the roads called in the rate "Approaches" are to be both rated to the sewers rate, or whether the bridge is exempt, and the roads only are rateable. If the former be decided, the rate is to stand, and judgment to be entered for the respondents with costs. If the latter judgment is to be entered for the appellants with costs, and the sewers rate is to be amended by confining the assessment to the approaches, and reducing the rate to 40*l.*

Jan. 18.—J. Brown, Q.C. (with him Raymond), for the appellants.—The bridge and the approaches are separate things. This bridge, apart from the approaches, is not rateable to the sewer rate, for it is drained directly into the river, and derives no benefit from the sewer. Although, by sect. 161 of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, the overseers are to levy the rate in the same manner as a poor-rate, yet by sect. 164 it is provided that where any property was, at the time of the issuing of the first commission under the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112, entitled to exemption from, or to any reduction or allowance in respect of, the sewers rate, such exemption, reduction, or allowance shall be allowed. An opinion, which is almost equivalent to an express decision on the point, has been pronounced by the Court of Queen's Bench in The Metropolitan Board of Works v. The Vauxhall Bridge Company (29 L. T. Rep. 211; 7 E. & B. 983; 26 L. J., N. S., 256, Q. B.) There the effect of s. 76 of 11 & 15 c. 112 (which closely resembled s. 164 of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), was considered, and the court thought that clause carefully preserved the ancient principle of rating for sewers, and that the benefit derived from the sewers by the property rated should still be regarded. This bridge would not have been rateable under the old law, because it derives no benefit from the sewerage. In Callis on Sewers, pp. 222-3, the author says: "The words in our statute be in effect, 'and all such which reap profit or sustain damage, shall be assessed,' which words seem not to admit of discharges, yet, in my opinion, out of the strict words of these commissions, there be some exemptions, though not expressed in words, yet supplied in reason, and are to be added in construction. First, for the grounds lying between the sea-banks and the sea, are in reason exempted from the charge of the banks and walls, because they can take no safety thereby; secondly, those grounds which be upon an ascent and not on the level, are also by the rule of reason, exempted from assesses to be imposed only by the power of these laws." That benefit is the test of liability is also shown by—

Masters v. Scroggs, 3 M. & S. 447;
Stafford v. Hamston, 2 B. & B. 691.

In Reg. v. Head and the Metropolitan Board of Works (7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 708; 32 L. J., N. S., 115, M. C.) it was indeed held that the amount of benefit must not be considered in assessing the rateable property, but the bridge here without the approaches derived no benefit at all. Then, being exempt under the old law, its exemption is expressly continued by the sections of the statutes above referred to.(a)

Pollock, Q. C. (with him Will), for the respondents.—By 5 Geo. 4, c. cxii, s. 63, the company was authorised to build a bridge "with convenient roads and approaches to the said bridge at each end thereof," and to do all things necessary "for building, maintaining, and repairing the said bridge, and making proper roads and approaches thereto." The bridge and approaches are one joint construction. Without its approaches the bridge would be useless, for it could not be reached. Sect. 139 enacts that after the tolls shall cease the company shall continue and be trustees, and shall do everything necessary "for maintaining, repairing, and supporting the said bridge and the said roads." It would be highly inconvenient if they were to be rated for one part of the same property and not for another, as the question of quantum would at once arise. Then as to severance, Soady v. Wilson (3 Ad. & E. 248), is conclusive. It was therein held that the eastern wing of Somerset House was liable to a sewer's rate, although it was entirely drained by the Board of Works, and had no communication with the common sewer running along the body of the building, and Denman, C. J., delivering the judgment of the court said that the doctrine laid down in the numerous cases is uniform and undisputed. "It rests upon the principle that everyone whose property derives benefit from the works of the commissioners may be assessed to the rates they impose. The benefit is not required to be immediate, nor do the cases, or the commission itself, or the statutes, say anything of the nature or amount of the benefit. Possibly the benefit may be extremely small. . . . But, on the other hand, the kind of benefit may be of high value, as if a house were inaccessible because surrounded by marshes, and the works of sewage had made them hard and passable." The present is a still stronger case, as but for the approaches the bridge would be perfectly inaccessible:

(a) 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112, s. 76, ". . . provided . . . that where in any separate sewerage district any property is by law, or by the practice of the existing commissions or commissioners of sewers, entitled to exemption, wholly or partially from or to any reduction or allowance in respect of the sewers' rate, the commissioners shall, in making the district sewers' rate, observe and allow such exemption, reduction, or allowance." 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 164, "Provided that where any property was at the time of the issuing of the first commission under the said Act, 11 & 12 Vict c. 112, entitled to exemption from, or to any reduction or allowance in respect of, the sewers' rate, such redemption, reduction, or allowance, shall be observed and allowed in levying any sewers' rate under this Act."

Dorling v. Epsom Board of Health, 5 E. & B. 471; Rex v. The Inhabitants of Barnes, 1 B. & Ad. 113.

[COCKBURN, C. J.—Those are both poor-rate cases, but the Act of Parliament does not put sewers rates on the same footing as poor rates.] In effect it does so. The poor rate cases depend on two questions, viz., the value of the premises and the quantum of benefit. Now, if property derives any benefit from the sewers, the court will not consider the quantum. In Reg. v. The Hammersmith Bridge Company (15 Q. B. 369; 18 L. J., N. S., 85, M. C.) this same bridge and its approaches were considered as one, and Lord Denman treats them as divisible only for the purpose of apportioning the rateable value of the whole between two parishes. Next, as to the general law of sewers. Callis on Sewers is cited contra to show that when lands were so high as to derive no benefit from the sewers, they were not liable to be rated. When Callis wrote, however, there were ancient districts of sewers, but no Act of Parliament creating a district and declaring that any person within it should be rated. In former times, if no part of the property was in a district then the person had not to pay a rate. The whole judgment reported in Masters v. Scroggs (sup.) is limited to three lines, which are these: "It ought to appear that the party receives or is likely to receive a benefit. That is negatived in one respect and is not shown in any other." [BLACKBURN, J.—And Scroggs' house being thus held exempt, the exemption was continued by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112, s. 76; and 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 164?] That must be admitted. Reverting to the facts of the present case, here is a bridge receiving tolls, and having roads without which it could not be approached, surely the drainage of those roads is some benefit to the bridge. Then Soady v. Wilson shows that the benefit need not be immediate; and Reg. v. Head and The Metropolitan Board of Works (sup.) distinctly decides that quantum of benefit must not be taken into consideration. First, we say, that the bridge and approaches must be taken as a whole; secondly, if not so taken, then that the bridge derives a benefit.

Raymond in reply.—Taking the last point first, no doubt the old law of sewers was applied to a totally different state of things, and what appeared to be just in the time of Callis may not be so now; but the Legislature intended that the old common law exemption should continue nevertheless. Reg. v. Head and the Metropolitan Board of Works (sup.) does not apply. Soady v. Wilson (sup.) was decided before the two recent statutes, and is distinguishable from the nature of the property. Somerset House was within a district, and was benefited, but the persons liable to the sewers rate in respect of it had attempted to get rid of the liability by adopting a separate system of drainage. In Dorling v. The Epsom Board (sup.) there was no exemption, and so the question could not arise. As to the second branch of the respondent's argument, it is said that the bridge and approaches are indivisible. That is a matter of fact. Then what has been the conduct of the respondents in that respect? As soon as the Vauxhall-bridge case was decided the parish ceased to rate this bridge, and assessed only the approaches. That was done under a mistake as to the actual decision in The Metropolitan Board of Works v. The Vauxhall-bridge Company (sup.) Therefore the respondents show by their act that they did not deem the bridge and its approaches all one. There is no authority for making a bridge alone liable to sewers rate. Because the accessories, viz., the approaches, may be rateable, the principal, or the bridge, must not therefore be rated also.

Feb. 22.—The udgment of Blackburn and Hannen, JJ., was delivered by HANNEN, J.—In this case the appellants have been rated to a sewer rate in respect of so much of their property as is in the parish of Hammersmith. The parish of Hammersmith forms part of the Fulham district, and the rate is imposed under the Act for the Local Management of the Metropolis (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120). The property of the appellants consists of a suspension bridge thrown over the Thames from the north bank, which is in the parish of Hammersmith, to the south bank, which is in the parish of Barnes. The boundary between the two parishes is the medium filum aquæ of the River Thames, so that one moiety of the property of the appellants lies in the parish of Hammersmith. This moiety consists of one half of the structure which extends from bank to bank, and hangs over the River Thames, and which, in the case, is called the "bridge," and of the whole of the land on the northern side occupied by the appellants, so as to afford facilities for getting access to the bridge, and which, in the case, are called "roads." Neither phrase is, perhaps, precisely accurate, but they are sufficient to convey the meaning of the parties. The "bridge" (if the meaning of the word is thus restricted to the structure suspended in the air over the bed of the Thames) derives no immediate or direct benefit from the drains or sewers of the Fulham district; the roads and approaches are, it appears from the eighth paragraph of the case, now, in fact, drained by a new sewer, though this was not required by the appellants, their old drainage being sufficient for them. By agreement in the case no objection is to be made to the form of the rate, the question for the court being, whether the "bridge" and the "roads" are to be rated to the sewer rate, or whether the "bridge" is exempt, and the "roads" only are rateable. The statute 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 164, provides that where any property was at the time of the first commission under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112, "entitled to exemption from or to any reduction or allowance in respect of the sewer rate, such exemption, reduction, or allowance shall be observed and allowed in levying any sewer rate under this Act." We are thus referred back to 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112, now expired. The 34th section required the commissioners from time to time to divide the metropolis into separate sewage districts, "having regard in such division or formation to the nature of the ground, to the main line of the sewers by which such separate districts are or shall be drained, or to the main line of sewers which it may appear to the commissioners expedient to form for the drainage of such sewerage district, and to the equal benefit, as far as may be, of all lands and buildings comprised in such districts." Sect. 76 enables the commissioners to levy a district sewer rate in each sewerage district on the persons, and in respect of the property within each district by law rateable to the relief of the poor; and then comes this proviso, "that where in any separate sewerage district any property is by law, or by the practice of the existing commissions or commissioners of sewers, entitled to exemption, wholly or partially from or to any reduction or allowance in respect of the sewer rate, the commissioners shall, in making the district sewer rate, observe and allow such exemption, reduction, or allowance." It is on those clauses that the present question depends. It seems clear from the mode of legislation adopted, that the proviso in s. 76 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112, is brought down into the present Act; and the appellants' contention is, that the "bridge" is property which in 1848, when 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112, received the royal assent, was by law "entitled to exemption" from a sewer rate. No question arises as to the practice of former commissions, as no sewer rate was levied in this district before 1848. Under the old law of sewers, the commissioners had no jurisdiction to impose a rate on any property which did not derive benefit from the works for the maintenance of which the rate was levied, and so long as the only object for which such works were made was to protect from the inroads of the sea, or to relieve from land floods and stagnant waters, the district benefited was the level, that is, that district which, to adopt the language in Rooke's Case (5 Rep. 996), was "subject to drowning" if the work was not maintained. And in Rex v. The Commissioners of the Tower Hamlets (9 B. & C. 517, 523) this court determined that the commissioners were bound to divide the district over which they had jurisdiction into levels of this sort, and could not join Hackney, which drained into the river Lea, in the same district as the rest of the Tower Hamlets which drained into the river Thames, and consequently required different sewers. Lord Tenterden, in delivering the judgment, says:—"A great deal of reliance was placed in the argument on the word 'level,' which is found in the report of Rooke's Case (sup.), and in which it is said that all who be within the level are to contribute. That is very true; but the question is, what is the meaning of the word 'level?' Now, that word does not occur in the Act of Parliament, neither does it appear in the commission. If we are to attribute to the word 'level' the sense sought to be attributed to it in this argument, that will make it an artificial division of the land; whereas the natural import of the word denotes not an artificial division of the land, but the particular character and situation of it. So understood, all those cases and all those expressions which say that the rate is to be made equally upon all the inhabitants of the level, will stand untouched by our decision." This is quite consistent with good sense as long as the object of the sewers was only to save the land from being drowned; but as soon as the sanitary objects become of importance, the level of the ground, though an important element in determining what district was benefited by the sewers, ceased to be the sole, or even the chief one; and accordingly in Dorling v. The Epsom Board (5 E. & B. 471, 483; 24 L. J. 152, 156, M. C.), this court in construing the Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), held, that "the occupier of premises within a district under the management of a local board of health may be assessed to a special district rate, where the premises, in respect of which he is so assessed, derive no direct and immediate benefit from the works to meet the expense of which the rate is imposed." The provisions of the Public Health Act 1848, though very analogous to those of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, are not precisely the same; and the Public Health Act 1848 contains nothing equivalent to the proviso in s. 76 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 112, which is, by reference, brought down into 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120. It is not easy to assign any reason why the Legislature should have intended to apply a different rule as to sewerage districts within the metropolitan district from that which applies to those outside of that district; but there seems no doubt that by this proviso they have to some extent done so. In The Metropolitan Board of Works v. The Vauxhall Bridge Company (sup.), the Vauxhall Bridge Company were assessed to a sewer rate on their property under circumstances not at all differing from those under which the now appellants are assessed in respect of theirs. The action was brought with the intention of raising the very question now before us. The decision of the court was, that the question could not be raised by action, being only matter of appeal; but Lord Campbell intimated for the guidance of the parties an extra-judicial opinion of the court (though, as he says, aware that it was not binding) that the Commissioners, in making the rate, "ought not to have considered merely the value of the property of the company, as in making a poor rate, but should have been guided by the benefit which they considered that the property derived from the sewers." He adds, "Having said so much respecting the construction of the Act of Parliament, we must refrain from giving any opinion as to whether benefit was derived from the sewers to any or what part of the property, which the commissioners must be fully competent to determine." The commissioners, acting on the advice, have from that time imposed no sewer rate on the Vauxhall-bridge, though they have rated the approaches; and a similar practice has been followed in respect of the Hammersmith-bridge until the present rate, on which the appeal is brought, in order to have a judicial determination on the question. There are expressions in the opinion given by Lord Campbell that seem to favour an idea that the amount of the assessment was to be proportionate to the amount of benefit derived by the particular property; but in Reg. v. Head (sup.) Crompton, J., who was a party to the Vauxhall-bridge case (sup.), explains that it was intended merely to express that if there was no benefit (by which we understand to be meant no direct and immediate benefit) there was to be no rate, but if there was any benefit the amount of the rate was to depend upon the poor-law assessment. We are not to be understood as affirming the principle laid down in the Vauxhall-bridge case (sup.), even thus qualified, or as determining that the principle of Dorling v. The Epsom Board is not applicable to a district within the metropolis; but we do not think it necessary in this case to decide the general question, for in Soady v. Wilson (sup.), where it was found as a fact that Somerset House did not derive any immediate benefit from the sewers, "except the general benefit and advantage of being accessible, and of its approaches and neighbouring public ways being properly drained and cleansed," this court held the rate valid, the court saying in their judgment that "the benefit is not required to be immediate, nor do the cases, or the commission itself, or the statutes, say anything of the nature or amount of the benefit. Possibly that benefit may be so extremely small that a jury would not have found the fact stated in the case. But, on the other hand, the kind of benefit may be of high value, as if a house were inaccessible because surrounded by marshes, and the works of sewage had made them hard and passable." It seems to us that a property such as the bridge and roads of the appellants does derive a benefit of this kind from the proper sewerage of this district, and consequently, on the authority of Soady v. Wilson (sup.), that it would not have been exempt from the jurisdiction of the Commissioners of Sewers antecedent to 1848. If this be so, the consequence follows that the judgment must be for the respondents.

The learned judge then read the judgment of COCKBURN, C. J.—I regret that I am unable to concur in the judgment of the majority of the court. I agree with the general reasoning of my learned brothers, and their exposition of the law; nor am I disposed to question the authority of the case of Soady v. Wilson (sup.); but that case appears to me to be inapplicable to the present, as I cannot see how the property of the appellants on Hammersmith-bridge can possibly derive benefit from the sewerage of the district, whether in a sanitary point of view or any other. The bridge is only of use to the public and of value to the appellants as a means of transit from one side of the River Thames to the other, and in this respect it differs from the ground occupied by the approaches, which are partly built upon, and which, serving for the purpose of habitation, derive benefit from the drainage of the neighbourhood. The bridge plainly derives no immediate benefit as regards sanitary purposes, neither does it as regards getting rid of its superfluous moisture, as the latter is carried immediately into the Thames by means wholly independent of the district drainage. It is, however, said, that the bridge, as well as the approaches to it, may derive a benefit from the proper sewerage of the district, and that the case comes, therefore, within the principle of the decision in Soady v. Wilson (sup.). It does not appear to me that this can be so in fact. The roads which lead to this bridge from the metropolis and elsewhere are public roads, and must be maintained in a proper state, independently of the district drainage. I cannot suppose that the general public desiring to cross the River Thames into Surrey will be materially influenced by the state of the sewerage or drainage of the Fulham district, and though it may be said that the traffic over the bridge may be increased by the neighbourhood on the northern side being populous and frequented, and that this state of things will be promoted by an efficient system of sewerage, the benefit to be derived to the bridge property from this source appears to me of too speculative, uncertain, and minute a character to justify the subjecting it to a rate for the sewerage of the district on the assumption of such a benefit. For these reasons, I think our judgment ought to be in favour of the appellants; but as my learned brothers hold otherwise, the judgment of the court must be for the respondents.

Judgment for the respondents.

REG. v. DAVIDSON, NANSON AND MORLEY.

Order of quarter sessions—Appeal—Order for costs, upon whom to be made—Quashing order as to part only.

An information was laid by E. T. Morley, who was the surveyor of the local board of health of Carlisle, but without reference to his official position, against John Hargreaves, for the violation of a bye-law of such local board; and upon the hearing, the said John Hargreaves was convicted and ordered to pay 7l. 10s. to the said local board for their costs. Mr. Hargreaves, thereupon, gave notice of appeal to the convicting justices and to Mr. Morley. Both the justices and Mr. Morley handed their notices over to the attorney for the said local board, and he conducted the defence on the behalf of such local board. The quarter sessions quashed the conviction with costs; and the clerk of the peace directing the costs to be paid by the respondents, the costs were taxed, and being unpaid, application was made to justices for a warrant against the goods of Mr. Morley for the amount. Upon the order of the quarter sessions being removed into this court:

Held, first, that it was bad in ordering the costs to be paid by the respondents, who were the convicting justices, and Mr. Morley, for that it should have been made upon the local board, who were the parties appealed against;

Secondly, that as the order was valid, except as to that part which related to costs, it should be quashed as to that part only.

THIS was a rule calling upon the prosecutor to show cause why an order of sessions made on the appeal of John Hargreaves against a conviction under the hands and seals of Alexander Davidson and Thomas Nanson, Esqrs., two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the county of Cumberland, whereby the said conviction was quashed, and the defendants were ordered to pay certain costs in the said order mentioned, should not be quashed for the insufficiency thereof.

The conviction was as follows:

City of Carlisle to wit.—Be it remembered, that on the 9th Aug. 1869, John Hargreaves, of Brunswick-street, in the city of Carlisle aforesaid, manufacturer, is convicted before us, Alexander Davidson and Thomas Nanson, Esqrs., two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said city of Carlisle, for that he, the said John Hargreaves, on the 12th July 1869, and on divers other days and times between the said 12th July and the 20th of the said month of July, at the parish of St. Mary Carlisle, in the city aforesaid, did, without the consent of the Carlisle Local Board of Health, build upon a certain open space belonging to a certain building used as a dwelling-house, situate in Brunswick-street, in the city aforesaid, contrary to the form of the statute in that case made and provided, and the bye-laws of the said local board of health, and we do adjudge that the said John Hargreaves hath forfeited for his said offence the sum of 40s., and that he do pay to the said Carlisle Local Board of Health the further sum of 7l. 10s., to and for their costs in his behalf. Given under our hands and seals the day and year first above written

ALEX. DAVIDSON, Mayor (L.S.)

The order of the quarter sessions upon the appeal was the following:

Cumberland to wit.—At the general quarter sessions of the peace of our sovereign Lady the Queen, holden at Carlisle in and for the county of Cumberland, on Tuesday, the 19th Oct., in the 31st year of the reign of our sovereign Lady the Queen Victoria, 1869, before certain justices of our said Lady the Queen, in the same county, and also to hear and determine divers felonies, trespasses, and other misdemeanors in the same county committed. Whereas at the general quarter sessions of the place above mentioned an appeal by John Hargreaves against a conviction of Alexander Davidson and Thomas Nanson, Esqrs., two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the borough of Carlisle in the same county, bearing date the 9th Aug. 1869, came on to be tried, wherein the said John Hargreaves was appellant, and the said Alexander Davidson and Thomas Nanson, Esqrs., and Edward Taylor Morley, gentleman, were respondents. After hearing of Mr. Fawcett and Mr. Hills, of counsel for the said respondents, and Mr. Dawson and Mr. Thurlow, of counsel for the said appellant, the said appeal was then heard, determined, and decided in favour of the said appellant. Now therefore this court doth order that the said conviction shall be quashed, and that the said respondents shall pay to the said appellant the sum of 58*l.* 13*s.* 2*d.* for his costs incurred by him in the said appeal, and which sum is hereby ordered to be paid to the clerk of the peace for the said county at his office in Carlisle in the said county, on or before the 27th Nov. 1869, to be by him paid over to the said appellant.

By the court (Signed) HODGSON.

The clerk of the peace having taxed the appellant's costs, he gave the following certificate:

I hereby certify that at a court of general quarter sessions of the peace holden at Carlisle on the 19th Oct. last past, an appeal by John Hargreaves against a conviction of Alexander Davidson and Thomas Nanson, Esqrs., two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the borough of Carlisle, in the said county, came on to be tried, and was then heard and determined, and the said court of general quarter sessions thereupon ordered that the said conviction should be quashed, and that the said respondent should pay to the said appellant the sum of 58*l.* 13*s.* 2*d.* for his costs incurred by him in the said appeal, and which sum was thereby ordered to be paid to the clerk of the peace for the said county, on or before the 27th Nov. last past, to be by him handed over to the said appellant. And I further certify that the said sum for costs has not, nor has any part thereof been paid in obedience to the said order.

The information was laid by Edward Taylor Morley, in his own name, not stating that it was laid by him at the instance of the local board of health of Carlisle, or that he was an officer of such local board. The notice of appeal given by the appellant was directed To Alexander Davidson and Thomas Nanson, both of the city of Carlisle, Esquires, two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the city of Carlisle, and to Edward Taylor Morley, of Wilfred-street, in the city aforesaid.

It appeared that there is a local board of health for the city of Carlisle, the town council being such board, and that Mr. Edward Taylor Morley is the surveyor of the board. A body of bye-laws having been framed, Mr. Hargreaves was supposed to have violated one of them, whereupon Mr. Morley laid the information in question against him at the instance and by the authority, as he alleged, of the local board. At the hearing, Mr. John Nanson, who was the town clerk and the clerk of the local board, attended and conducted, as he stated in his affidavit, on behalf of the said board. Upon notices of appeal being served upon the two justices and Mr. Morley, they respectively sent them to Mr. Nanson (such town clerk), who was instructed by the local board to defend the appeal and support the conviction, which he accordingly did, the said justices and Mr. Morley taking no part in it, except that the last-named gentleman was examined as a witness. That in the result the conviction was quashed, and upon the counsel for the appellant applying for costs, the chairman said the costs would follow the conviction. The sessions being then adjourned, the costs were afterwards taxed by the clerk of the peace, and a certificate given as before mentioned. These costs not being paid, the appellant applied to justices at petty sessions for a warrant of distress. This was resisted upon the ground that the order for costs was bad, inasmuch as it ought not to have been made either upon the convicting justices or Mr. Morley, but upon the local board of health, who were the real respondents. Upon this the appellant's attorney abandoned his application as against the justices, who he admitted were not liable, but pressed for a warrant against Mr. Morley; but upon its being urged that he also was not liable, and that an application to remove the order into the Court of Queen's Bench, in order to its being quashed, should at once be made, the justices adjourned the case, whereupon, the rule for the present certiorari was obtained, on the ground that the quarter sessions had no jurisdiction to make an order for costs upon either the convicting justices or Mr. Morley, who were neither of them the real parties to the appeal, although their names were inserted in it as respondents.

Quain, Q.C., showed cause.—It is not sought to make the convicting justices pay the costs, indeed the warrant was not applied for as against them; but Mr. Morley is clearly liable, for it was he who laid the information in his own name, and who was the respondent upon the appeal. The objection is a merely technical one—that the clerk of the peace, in drawing up the order, inserted Mr. Morley's name instead of the local board. The local board and Mr. Morley are, in effect, the same persons, and if Mr. Morley were to pay these costs, he would be repaid by the local board. It is not right that Mr. Hargreaves should lose his costs by the error of the clerk of the peace, if it be one. [COCKBURN, C.J.—Was it not your fault in making Mr. Morley the respondent in the appeal?] The information was by Mr. Morley in his own name, no mention being made that he was acting for the local board. [BLACKBURN, J.—But the conviction treats the local board as the real parties, for the costs are directed by it to be paid to them.] By the 135th section of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 69 (Public Health Act 1848), the appellant may appeal to the sessions, and he is to give notice to the local board of health, or justice or justices, by whose act he may think himself aggrieved, and the court may award such costs to the party appealing or appealed against, as they shall think proper. Here the notice was given both to the justices and to the party who represented the local board. [COCKBURN, C.J.—The notice was given to Mr. Morley, but there is nothing in the Public Health Act which authorises the surveyor to act in his own behalf.] But if Mr. Morley had objected to being made a respondent, he should have done so upon the hearing of the appeal. [BLACKBURN, J.—The notice to Mr. Morley was a nullity, unless as representing the local board.] The attorney for the local board defended the appeal. [BLACKBURN, J.—Suppose notice of appeal had only been given the justices, and they should not appear themselves but give the notice to the local board, could not the local board appear? and must the conviction be quashed because the justices themselves did not choose to defend the appeal? Do you say that the local board of health had no right to appear?] Yes, they had no right to appear. Mr. Morley never objected to being treated as the respondent.

[COCKBURN, C. J.—He could not have supposed that he would have been rendered responsible for costs, especially after what took place in the court below. The local board no doubt ought to pay these costs.]

Manisty, Q. C., and Gates, appeared for the justices at sessions, and contended that the order of the court as pronounced being merely quashed with costs, the costs would properly fall on the real parties intended, namely, the local board, who were the parties intended, and that such costs migh be awarded against them, although their names were not inserted as respondents: (R. v. Robinson, 17 Q. B. 466; Reg v. Justices of Hants, 1 B. & Ad. 659.) Also that this court has power to quash part of an order which may be bad, if the remainder of the order can stand independently of such bad part, which would be the case here, if only that part of the order relating to costs were to be quashed.

R. v. Sweet, 9 East. 25;
R. v. Maulden, 8 B. & C. 78.

The COURT called upon Pollock, Q. C., and T. P. E. Thompson, to argue the last point, but they declined to do so.

COCKBURN, C. J.—What we must do in this case is to quash so much of the order of quarter sessions as applies to costs. It is clear that no costs could be given as against the convicting justices. In Rex v. The Justices of Hants, it was clearly laid down that, although the justices may be the nominal respondents, yet they cannot be made subject to costs, but that it should be the party who is really interested. That decision is in point in the present case. The order, therefore, so far as the justices are concerned, is clearly bad. Then, as regards the other respondent, Mr. Morley, it is true he laid the information, but it is equally clear that it was laid by him as an officer of the local board, and the justices below so treated it, for they gave the costs, not to Mr. Morley, but to the local board. Then when we come to the appeal, although the notice was given to Mr. Morley, the local board appear to have taken it up and therefore we must see who were really the parties answering to the characters of respondents. These were undoubtedly the local board. The quarter sessions therefore went beyond their powers in making the order for costs upon Mr. Morley individually. The only other question is—can we quash an order as to part? Upon the authorities it would seem that we can do so, and therefore I think that in this case we ought to quash it so far as concerns the direction as to costs, leaving the order to stand as regards the remainder.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. If we look to the 133rd section of the Public Health Act 1848, we shall find that no proceedings can be taken to recover any penalty incurred under the Act except by the person aggrieved or the local board, or in certain cases by the parish officers, without the consent in writing of the Attorney-General, so that in the present case Mr. Morley could not have laid this information on his own account, but merely as an officer of the local board for, and at their instance; and that this was understood to have been so, is clear from the fact that the justices in convicting Mr. Hargreaves gave costs to the local board, the justices thinking that they were really the parties for whom the information was laid. Then we have the appeal clause, which is sect. 135, and which enacts that the party aggrieved may appeal to the court of general quarter sessions; "but the appellant shall not be heard in support of the appeal unless within fourteen days after the making and publication of the rate appealed against, or accrual of the cause of complaint, he give to the local board of health or justice or justices by whose act he may think himself aggrieved, notice in writing stating his intention to bring such appeal, together with a statement in writing of the grounds of appeal. And the said court upon hearing and finally determining the matter of the appeal shall and may according to its discretion award such costs to the party appealing or appealed against as they shall think proper." Now, then comes the question—when there is a provision that costs may be given to the party appealing or appealed against, who is the party appealed against in this case? Morley had no interest in the matter, he did not get the costs below. It is clear that the party really appealed against was the local board; and upon referring to Rex v. The Justices of Hants, we find it decided that the party appealed against is the party who is really interested. The justices at quarter sessions having therefore made an order in respect of part of which they had jurisdiction, and in another part not jurisdiction, we must quash that part of it over which they had not jurisdiction.

MELLOR, J.—I am also of the same opinion. The condition of the appeal is that notice shall be given to the local board of health or to the justices. Now here the notice was served upon the justices and Mr. Morley, who was the surveyor of the local board; but as the local board were undoubtedly the real parties in the litigation, if the sessions had made their order for costs upon them they would have been perfectly right. When the court made the order, everyone of course supposed that the local board would have paid the amount, and that they would not have taken this somewhat unworthy objection.

HANNEN, J., concurred.

Order quashed as to costs.

REG. v. LOVIBOND.

Indictment—When not the proper remedy—The Metropolis Management Amendment Act 1862—Violation of the provisions of sect. 75—Summary proceedings before a justice.

Where a statute creates a new offence by prohibiting and making unlawful anything which was lawful before, and appoints a specific remedy against such new offence by a particular method of proceeding, that particular method of proceeding must be pursued, and no other.

Where, therefore, the defendant had, as was alleged, violated the provisions of sect. 75 of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102 (The Metropolis Management Amendment Act 1862), by erecting a building without the consent of the Metropolitan Board of Works and beyond the line of building as provided for by the said section, and which said section points out the remedy for such violation by summary proceedings before a justice:

Held, that the remedy for such offence was by summary proceeding only, and that an indictment would not lie.

THIS was a proceeding by an indictment preferred by the Metropolitan Board of Works against the defendant for an alleged breach of the provisions of the 75th section of the Metropolis Management Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), in erecting a building beyond the general line of buildings in a street within their jurisdiction. It is enacted by the said section "that no building, structure, or erection shall, without the consent in writing of the Metropolitan Board of Works, be erected beyond the general line of buildings, in any street, place, or row of houses in which the same is situate in case the distance of such line of buildings of the highway does not exceed fifty feet, or within fifty feet of the highway when the distance of the line of buildings therefrom amounts to or exceeds fifty feet, notwithstanding there being gardens or vacant spaces between the line of buildings and the highway, such general line of buildings to be decided by the superintending architect to the Metropolitan Board of Works for the time being; and in case any building, structure, or erection be erected or be begun to be erected or raised without such consent, or contrary to the terms or conditions on which the same may have been granted, it shall be lawful for the vestry of the parish or the board of works for the district in which such building or erection is situate, to cause to be made complaint thereof before a justice of the peace, who shall thereupon issue a summons requiring the owner or occupier of the premises, or the builder or person engaged in any work contrary to this enactment, to appear at a time and place to be stated in the summons to answer such complaint, and if at the time and place appointed in such summons the said complaint shall be proved to the satisfaction of the justice before whom the same shall be heard, such justice shall make an order in writing on such owner or occupier, builder, or person directing the demolition of any such building or erection, or so much thereof as may be beyond the said general line so fixed as aforesaid, within such time as such justice shall consider reasonable, and shall also make an order for the payment of the costs incurred up to the time of hearing; and in default of the building or erection complained of being demolished within the time limited by the said order, the said vestry or board shall forthwith enter the premises to which the order relates, and demolish the building or erection complained of, and do whatever may be necessary to execute the said order, and may also remove the materials to a convenient place, and subsequently sell the same as they think fit; and all expenses incurred by the said vestry or board in carrying out the said order and in disposal of the said materials may be recovered by the said vestry or board from the owner or occupier of the said premises, or the builder or person engaged in the work, either by action at law or in a summary manner before a justice of the peace, at the option of the said vestry or board, in manner provided by the 227th section of the firstly-recited Act" (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120) "as to the recovery of penalties." The indictment having been removed by certiorari, was tried at the sittings after Trinity Term, in Middlesex, before Hannen, J., and a special jury, on the 14th June 1869, and it was agreed that a verdict should be entered for the Crown, with liberty to state the facts in the form of a special case, and that the court should direct on the facts so stated that the verdict so entered should stand, or that it should be set aside, and a verdict entered for the defendant.

The following are the facts of the case:

1. Lille-road (the alleged street in which the building complained of, was built by the defendant) is a road and public highway, leading from London to Fulham.

2. The defendant's premises, until the erection complained of, consisted of an old house (where the defendant resided) and premises standing at a considerable distance from the road, in grounds extending to the road in question, and bounded by a wall 9ft. in height and 400ft. in length. In the north-west corner, at about 10ft. from the road, stood within the grounds a lodge and stables, the grounds extended on the east to the line shown on the plan as dividing them from the ground on which Rosa-villa stands.

3. From time to time, within the last forty years, other houses and buildings have been built on each side of the road. The buildings shown on the plan and coloured black were in existence at the time of the proceedings of the Metropolitan Board of Works mentioned in this case, and when the erection of the building complained of was commenced, the buildings shown by a red colour, with the exception of the brewery, have been since built.

4. The houses called Rosa Villas and Hermitage Cottages are small semi-detached houses, having gardens in front, divided from the footway by a dwarf wall with iron railings on the top. The fronts of these houses vary in distance from the inner edge of the footpath from 33ft. to 33ft. 9in. The length of the frontage of Rosa Villas and Hermitage Cottages is 280ft. These are the oldest of the houses, except the defendant's residence, its lodge, and stabling.

5. Beyond Rosa Villas and Hermitage Cottages, on the east, at the time of the erection of the building complained of, and up to the trial of the indictment, there stood some other houses in carcase. They are called in the certificates of the said architects hereinafter mentioned, "houses still unfurnished." The fronts of the carcases coloured pink in the said plan B stood back from the said road in spaces intended for gardens, at varying distance, those in the middle being 30ft., the westernmost 21ft. 5in., and the easternmost 22ft. 2in. from the inner edge of the foothpath, the distances varying according to the curve of the road, the length of these frontages including the land in the aggregate is 330ft.

6. Lille-road, after passing Rosa-villas and the unfinished houses, runs to the east part, what was at the time of the certificate a piece of vacant ground, and beyond that is crossed by a street called Richmond-place, at a distance of 300 yards from the brewery. The end house of Richmond-place abutted on the footpath of Lille road, and windows of the houses look into Lille-road. Since then the shops along Lille-road coloured pink have been built. Lille-road then crosses the railway by a bridge, and continues on through Brompton towards London. The other houses and buildings were built, as appears by the plan A. These houses and buildings varied in their distances from the inner edge of the footpath, and in their architectural character and size, and stood generally in gardens. The western end of Lille-road is separated from Crown-road by North-end-road.

7. In the autumn of 1867 the defendant, who is a brewer, proceeded, with the sanction of the local board, to erect the building on the plan A, called the Brewery. In the first place he proceeded to erect the back part of the buildings farthest from the road, which was required for the machinery used in the business. Part of the building scheme involved the erection of a chimney at the back of the building; and the plans of the part of the building, so far only as was necessary to show the position of the chimney, were shown to the prosecutors, whose consent was asked and obtained to its erection. On the 15th Feb. 1868 the defendant had completed the back part of the building, and the machinery was being erected therein, and in pursuance of the original plans (which he had not shown to the prosecutors) he had prepared the foundations, and was putting in the footings of the rest of the building, which was to be used as a tun room, when, in consequence of a suggestion made to him, the defendant called on Mr. Vulliamy, the superintending architect of the Metropolitan Board of Works, and produced to him the plan marked C, with the proposed buildings marked in red ink, and Mr. Vulliamy promised to lay the matter before the board for their consent, at the same time cautioning the defendant against building without their permission. The board refused their consent to the buildings, because they would extend beyond the houses in the road, and gave notice to the defendant of such refusal. He, however, continued to build according to his proposed plan, and at the time of the indictment had nearly completed the buildings. The board, upon the defendant continuing to build, directed Mr. Vulliamy to decide the general line of buildings under sect. 75 above mentioned.

8. The defendant and his architect attended before Mr. Vulliamy, who, on or about the 29th April 1868, proceeded to the spot, and afterwards, on the 30th April in the same year, gave his decision and drew up a certificate, a copy whereof, marked D, accompanies and is part of this case. The document was partly in writing and partly in print. The printed part is shown in red ink in the said copy, and was filled in and altered in writing, as shown in black ink. The said plan marked B, was annexed hereto. The orginals of the said certificates and plan may be referred to on the argument of this case.

9. In consequence of a letter received from the defendant's attorneys, dated the 1st May Mr. Vulliamy altered the form of certificate.

10. At the time these certificates were given, and when Mr. Vulliamy first visited the spot for the purpose of deciding the general line of buildings, the building objected to was in carcase, and the roof all but completed. The wall of the building nearest the road was built within the wall of the grounds of the defendant's residence, the Hermitage. The frontage of this building to the road was built 5in. farther from the centre of the road than the face of the old boundary wall, which was pulled down along this frontage, but the building extends close to the edge of this road, and stood at the time of the indictment 33ft. nearer the road than Rosa Villas, and 27ft. nearer than the said general line so decided by the said superintending architect.

11. Previous to the said certificates of Mr. Vulliamy, the houses along Lille-road stood, as above-stated in this case, at various distances from the road, and the jury on the trial found that at the time when the defendant erected his building, and at the time when Mr. Vulliamy gave his certificate, there was no general line of building in Lille-road. This was the only question left to the jury, and upon which their verdict was given, subject to this special case,

12. There was no building standing with its frontage line at such a distance from the footpath as decided by Mr. Vulliamy to be the general line, viz., 27ft. He stated on the trial that he decided the general line as being the mean distance between 33ft. (the distance from the footpath to some of the houses in Rosa-villas) and 22ft. (the distance of some of the houses in carcase). There is a space of 20ft. between Rosa-villas and the defendant's building called the Brewery.

13. The district board within whose limits the building stands having refused to make a complaint, or to take proceedings under the 75th section, the Metropolitan Board of Works preferred this indictment.

14. The court is to have power to draw inferences of fact, but it is to be taken as a fact that, except in so far as Mr. Vulliamy had power to decide, and has decided what the general line of building is, there is no general line of buildings.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether upon the facts above stated the present indictment is sustainable? If the court should be of opinion in the affirmative, the verdict as entered is to stand; if in the negative, the verdict so entered is to be set aside and a verdict entered for the defendant.

Manisty, Q. C. (Metcalfe with him) appeared in support of the prosecution.—The building in this case was erected without the consent of the board, and not within the line laid down by the architect. [Mellor, J.—The question to be determined really is, can an indictment lie when there is another and an express remedy given?] This case comes within that class of cases in which, where there is a general prohibition, you may proceed by indictment for violating that prohibition. [Mellor, J.—But the 75th section directs the course of proceeding. The justices may make an order directing the demolition of the building, and may also direct the payment of costs.] The power to order the building to be taken down does not exclude the common law remedy by an indictment. [Mellor, J.—It would really seem that it was the intention of the Legislature that all such questions should be decided by the justices. An indictment gives but a very imperfect remedy.] The vestry or district board may not choose to take proceedings, and if so the only remedy is by indictment. There are, no doubt, cases which will be cited on the other side, of Rex v. Wright (1 Burr. 543) and Rex v. Robinson (2 Burr. 799). [Lush, J.—Those cases show that where a statute creates an offence and provides the remedy, that remedy only can be resorted to. What would be the punishment upon an indictment?] Fine and imprisonment. [Lush, J.—Notwithstanding that, the building might be pulled down.]

The Solicitor-General (F. M. White and Poland with him) were not called upon.

MELLOR, J. (a)—We are all agreed that it never was intended by the Act of Parliament to give power to initiate an indictment for disobeying an order of this description. If Mr. Manisty's argument is correct, it contains a very startling proposition, and we should certainly expect to find some very conclusive authority upon it. This case appears to come exactly within the rule laid down in Rex v. Robinson (2 Burr. 799), where Lord Mansfield, C. J. says, "The objection to this indictment is, that the offence is not indictable, because the Act of Parliament has pointed out a particular punishment and a specific method of recovering the penalty which it inflicts. The rule is certain—that where a statute creates a new offence by prohibiting and making unlawful anything which was lawful before, and appoints a specific remedy against such new offence (not antecedently unlawful) by a particular sanction and particular method of proceeding, that particular method of proceeding must be pursued and no other. But where the offence was antecedently punishable by a common law proceeding, and a statute prescribes a particular remedy by a summary proceeding, then either method may be pursued, and the prosecutor is at liberty to proceed either at common law or in the method prescribed by the statute, because there the sanction is cumulative and does not exclude the common law punishment." Now I quite agree that there may be Acts of Parliament which contain an absolute prohibition, but which say that a party may have a particular remedy, and in which cases the right to indict may still exist. The distinction, as it seems to me, is this: Does the statute appoint the remedy or a remedy? If the statute appoints the remedy, that is the one which must be adopted. In the present case the public interest is confided to the care of the district board of works, and it is for them to take proceedings in the manner pointed out by the statute. I am of opinion therefore that this case falls within the rule stated in Reg. v. Robinson, and that no indictment will lie.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The defendant has violated no common law right. The clause which creates the offence prescribes the remedy. That remedy only can be pursued.

HANNEN, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Re THE LIVERPOOL UNITED GAS COMPANY (appts.) v. THE OVERSEERS OF EVERTON (respts.); Ex parte THE OVERSEERS OF EVERTON.

Costs—Prohibition—Rule made absolute—Judgment —1 Will. 4, c. 21, s. 1.

When a rule is made absolute for a prohibition so that no proceedings in prohibition are taken, the party in whose favour the rule is made absolute has not a judgment in his favour so as to be entitled to the costs of the application under 1 Will. 4, c. 21, s. 1.

In this case the appellants had entered an appeal against a poor-rate at the Liverpool borough sessions, whereupon the respondents obtained a rule nisi for a prohibition to the sessions to entertain the appeal. This rule was subsequently made absolute, and no further proceedings in prohibition were taken. The respondents then made out a bill of costs in respect of costs attending the application, but the master, holding that the respondents were not entitled to costs, refused to tax it.

Douglas-Jones, Q. C. now moved, on behalf of the overseers, for a direction to the master to tax the respondents' bill of costs. Making the rule absolute was a judgment in favour of the overseers, so as to entitle them to the costs of their application under 1 Will. 4, c. 21, s. 1. In the case of applications for a prohibition, the court either discharges the rule, or else if it thinks the prohibition ought to issue, it either directs the parties to proceed in prohibition and enlarges the rule for that purpose, or else it makes the rule absolute. But the judgment is always on the rule. In this case the rule was made absolute, and that is a judgment in favour of the applicants. Before the statute 1 Will. 4, c. 21, s. 1, when the court made the rule absolute at once, no costs were allowed. That being the case, it was at one time contended that even when the rule was made absolute the applicant had a right to proceed and declare in prohibition in order to get costs, though the other party submitted. The courts, however, refused to allow this. That being the state of things, the Act of 1 Will. 4, c. 21, was passed, and under it the party in whose favour a rule is made absolute is entitled to his costs. [BOVILL, C. J.—The judgment spoken of in the statute is the judgment on the record when proceedings are taken.] It is submitted that that is too narrow an interpretation. In Gray on Costs, p. 446, it is said, "It may, it is true, be contended that the making the rule absolute is a judgment within the meaning of the Act; but if that had been in the contemplation of the Legislature at the time it was passed, it would probably have been provided for in less ambiguous terms." Rex v. Kealing (1 Dowl. 440) is no doubt directly against my contention; but that was only the decision of a single judge sitting in the Bail Court. No doubt, when the prohibition issues in consequence of a mistake on the part of the judge, it is not the practice to allow costs: (Jones v. Jones, 12 Jur. 399). But that is not the case here.

BOVILL, C. J.—I think that this application must be refused. Before 8 & 9 Will. 3 no costs were allowed in proceedings in prohibition, but by statute c. 11, s. 3 of that year, a plaintiff "obtaining judgment on any award of execution after plea pleaded or demurrer joined therein, shall likewise recover his costs of suit." In Pewtress v. Harvey (1 B. & Ad. 154), after the plaintiff had declared, the defendant, instead of pleading, obtained a judge's order for staying proceedings upon payment of costs incurred since the rule to declare, and the court held that the plaintiff was not entitled to any further costs. Subsequently 1 Will. 4, c. 21 was passed, and the question now before us is, whether the making a rule absolute is giving judgment in favour of one party within the meaning of that Act, so as to entitle that party to his costs. I quite concur with the decision of Patteson, J. in Rex v. Kealing that this section does not apply where there are no pleadings and no proceedings in prohibition. The Act leaves the court no discretion in the matter.

Application refused.

JEFFERY v. NEALE.

Covenant to pay rent without any deduction except in respect of level tax, property-tax, and land-tax —To pay all taxes and assessments—Tithe rentcharge.

A lessee covenanted with his lessor, first, to pay rent without any deduction or abatement on any account whatsoever except in respect of level-tax, land-tax, and property-tax, which were to be borne by the lessor; secondly, to bear, pay, and discharge all taxes and assessments whatsoever for or in respect of the demised premises or any part thereof which shall be taxed, charged, or assessed on the same or on the landlord in respect of the same. The lessor was the owner of the tithe rentcharge upon the demised premises. The lessee had paid the rent, but not the tithe rentcharge.

Held, that he had satisfied the first covenant, and that the tithe rentcharge was not a tax or assessment within the meaning of the second.

ACTION by lessor in respect of alleged breach of covenants contained in a lease.

The first covenant was that the lessee should pay the rent "without any deduction or abatement on any account whatsoever, save and except in respect of level tax, property tax, and land tax," which were to be borne by the lessor. Secondly, "to bear, pay, and discharge all taxes and assessments whatsoever for or in respect of the said demised premises, or any part thereof, which shall be taxed, charged, or assessed on the same demised premises, or on the landlord in respect thereof, save and except the aforesaid exceptions." The breach alleged was the nonpayment of the tithe rentcharge due in respect of the demised premises.

At the trial before Hannen, J., at the Sussex Spring assizes, it appeared that the defendant had held the lands demised for the last ten years, during which time he had always paid the rent due. The plaintiff was owner of the tithe rentcharge upon the property. The defendant had never paid the tithe rentcharge, nor had it ever till recently been demanded. On this state of facts, the learned judge directed a verdict for the defendant, with leave for the plaintiff to move to enter the verdict for himself for the amount of arrears of tithe rentcharge due, if the court should be of opinion that the defendant was bound by the covenants in the lease to pay the same.

Sir G. Honyman, Q.C. (Murphy with him), moved accordingly.—By not paying the tithe rentcharge in addition to the rent, the defendant virtually makes a deduction from the rent. In Parish v. Sleeman (1 L. T. Rep. N. S. 506; 29 L. J. 96, Ch.), Lord Campbell held, reversing the decision of Stuart, V.C., that an agreement to pay the rent "free of all outgoings," involved the obligation to pay the tithe rentcharge. The fact that the plaintiff is also owner of the tithe rentcharge is of no importance. Again, the defendant is bound to pay this as an assessment charged upon the land derived.

BOVILL, C. J.—The question here really is whether the defendant is bound to pay this tithe rentcharge by his covenant to pay all taxes and assessments, &c. Sir George Honyman has endeavoured to rely also upon the other covenant to pay the rent without deduction; but I think that the defendant, having paid the full rent, has satisfied that covenant. From the nature of the action the plaintiff must rely on the covenant to pay all taxes and assessments, with certain exceptions, the exceptions being those taxes which fall on the landlord. There is no mention in the lease of the tithe rentcharge, and I think we should be doing violence to the language of the covenant if we held that it included the tithe rentcharge. The tithe rentcharge is not commonly spoken of as a tax, but is generally the subject of a special stipulation. The case of Parish v. Sleeman has been cited, but the language of the covenant was not the same as it is here.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. As for the first covenant, I think the defendant has satisfied it, and with regard to the second I do not think the tithe rentcharge is within it.

M. SMITH, J. -In this case the plaintiff, the lessor, was also owner of the tithe rentcharge, and it appears that for ten years after the commencement of the term, no demand was made by him on the defendant to pay the tithe rentcharge. These circumstances are strong to show that it was not the intention of the parties that the tithe rentcharge should be paid in addition to the rent. All that we have to do now is to look at the lease to see whether, by the covenants contained in it, the defendant is bound to pay the tithe rentcharge. Unless the tithe rentcharge is within the scope of one of the covenants, the plaintiff must fail. It seems to me that it is not within the scope of either of the covenants relied on. It may be called an "outgoing," but not a "tax or assessment." If the plaintiff has a remedy at all, it must be by distress under the 81th sect. of The Tithe Commutation Act (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 71).

BRETT, J.—This is an action for breach of covenants, and the question for us to determine is what construction must be placed upon the covenants. Sir Geo. Honyman has made two points. First he says that the defendant is bound to pay the tithe rentcharge by the language of the reddendum; but on this point I think it is sufficient to say that I think the defendant has paid the rent without deduction, so as to satisfy the words of this covenant, and it is unnecessary to say whether or no the plaintiff, as owner of the tithe rentcharge, may distrain. But Sir George Honyman's principal reliance must be placed on the affirmative covenant to pay all taxes and assessments, and the question is thus raised, whether a tithe rentcharge is a tax or assessment within the meaning of this covenant. If it had been necessary to consider the effect of any cases decided on the point, I should have hesitated about refusing a rule; but no cases have been decided on the construction of these words, and as I cannot think that a tithe rentcharge is included in the words, I concur with the rest of the court in thinking that the rule must be refused.

Rule refused.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. BLACK.

Income tax—5 & 6 Vict. c. 35—Schedules A. and D.—Local coal dues levied by the Corporation of Brighton—Liability of to income tax—Rate or duty—Tolls—Tax.

Under the 13 Geo. 3. c. 34, commissioners appointed for improving the town of Brighton were (amongst other things) empowered to levy a duty of 6*d. on every chaldron of coal, culm, &c. landed at the beach, or brought into and consumed within the town, such duty to be applied by them in erecting and maintaining groyns, &c. against the incursions of the sea. By the* 50 Geo. 3, c. 38, the duty was increased in amount, and subsequently, by the Brighton Town Improvement Act (6 Geo. 4, c. clxxix), it was, together with market tolls, and other rates, and duties and assessments, which the said commissioners were by that Act empowered to levy, consolidated into a common fund for the general purposes of the Act, which purposes included, in addition to the erection and maintenance of the groyns, the paving, lighting, watching, cleansing, and otherwise improving the town. By the Brighton Commissioners Transfer Act 1855, the said commissioners ceased to act as such, and the corporation and their successors were appointed commissioners in their stead:

Held, by the Court of Exchequer (Kelly, C. B., and Martin and Channell, BB.), that the coal duty in question was a property in respect of which the corporation were liable and bound to pay income tax, whether as a "hereditament," under schedule A., or as "property or profits" under schedule D, of the Income Tax Act (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35.)

INFORMATION by the Attorney-General against the defendant, as town clerk of the corporation of Brighton, for penalties under the statutes relative to the revenue of the Income Tax; and by the consent of the parties, and by order of Martin, B., dated the 9th July 1869, under 22 & 23 Vict. c. 21, s. 10, there was stated for the opinion of the court, without any pleadings, the following

CASE:—

1. The defendant is town clerk of the corporation of the town of Brighton, which belongs to the port or harbour of Shoreham, in the county of Sussex, and is the proper person to make such returns as are required by 5 & 6 Vict c. 35, and the proceeding, although nominally for the recovery of penalties, is in fact brought for the purpose of obtaining the decision of the court on the question at issue between the Crown and the corporation, whether the corporation are liable to pay Income Tax, upon the amount of the rate or duty which they levy and receive in respect of coals, culm, coke, cinders, ashes, and charcoal landed on the beach or brought within the limits of the town of Brighton, by virtue of the powers conferred upon them by the Acts hereinafter mentioned, all of which are to be taken as part of this case.

2. By an Act, 13 Geo, 3 (A.D. 1773), intituled, "An Act for paving, lighting, and cleansing the streets, lanes, and places within the town of Brighthelmstone, in the county of Sussex, for removing nuisances and annoyances, and preventing the like for the future, for holding and regulating a market within the said town, for building and repairing groyns to render the coast safe and commodious for ships and vessels to unload and land sea coal, culm, and other coal for the use of the inhabitants of the said town, and for laying a duty thereon, and for other purposes," powers were given to the commissioners thereunder to pave, light, and cleanse the streets of the town, and for that purpose to assess and levy rates or assessments, not exceeding 3*s.* in the pound in one year, on the occupiers of all property in the town, and to purchase lands for, and to establish a market, the rents and profits whereof, after satisfying the moneys borrowed for purchasing the land and establishing the market, were directed to be paid and applied towards the paving, repairing, lighting, and cleansing the said streets, and in repairing the groyns thereafter mentioned, And, after reciting that the said town was situate by the seaside, and belonged to the port or harbour of Shoreham, and that great part of the said town having been destroyed by the breaking in of the sea, several groyns had been some years since erected, and the coast was now safe and commodious for ships and vessels to unload and land sea coal, culm, and other coal on the beach of the said town, for the use of the inhabitants thereof; and that the said groyns were become greatly out of repair, it was further enacted that the said commissioners should be, and they were thereby constituted and appointed trustees for repairing, improving, maintaining, and preserving the said groyns, and erecting and building any new groyns or such other works as to them should seem most proper. And that, for the better effecting and support of the said premises, there should from and after the 24th June 1773, be paid to them and their successors, the sum of 6*d. for every chaldron of sea coal, culm, and other coal, that should be landed on the beach of the coast, at the town of Brighthelmstone,* with power to the said trustees and their successors to demand, and take of and from the masters and owners, or other persons having the rule or command of every ship, bark, or other vessel, for every chaldron of sea coal, culm, or other coal, landed or discharged out of any ship or vessel on the said beach or coast of Brighthelmstone, or otherwise brought into the said town, within the parish of Brighthelmstone aforesaid, the said sum of 6*d.* And the said Act gave power to the commissioners to enforce the payment of the said duties through the collector or officer of customs of the port or harbour of Shoreham, and to detain and sell the vessel in case of nonpayment of the said rate or duty.

3. Under the above Act the old groyns were preserved and improved, and new ones erected. The rate or duty of 6*d.* in the said Act mentioned granted was duly demanded and paid, and the rents and profits of the market established under the said Act were duly collected and applied, as directed by the Act until the year 1810, in which year an Act, 50 Geo. 3, c. xxxviii., was passed, whereby, after reciting the passing of the former Act of 1773, and that its powers had been found inadequate to answer the purposes required, the former Act was repealed (sect. 1), and larger and more extensive powers were enacted for the government of the said town. By sect. 107, after reciting the appointment by the former Act of the commissioners, as trustees for maintaining and erecting groyns and other works, &c., and that the said rate or duty had been found inadequate to the charges and expenses of the necessary works, the said commissioners were authorised and required from time to time, as to them should seem necessary, to repair, improve, and maintain, add to, alter, or remove the groyns, walls, or other fences or works already erected and built, or to be made, erected, and built, or to cause to be made, erected, and built, any new groyns or other works whatsoever, which may appear to them necessary, for the safety of town, or any part thereof, or any part of the beach or shore within the said town, and it was thereby enacted that there should be paid to them any rate or duty which they should think fit to order and direct, not exceeding the sum of 3*s.* for every chaldron of seal coal, culm, or other coal which should be landed on the beach of the said town, or in any other manner, by land carriage, or otherwise, brought or delivered within the limits of the said town. Additional powers were also given to the said commissioners by sects. 108 to 114, for levying the said rate or duty of 3*s.*, and for borrowing 5000*l.* on the credit thereof; and for the return and payment of a drawback of the whole rate or duty paid for every chaldron of coals so landed or unloaded within the town, and which should have been forwarded to any other place for sale or consumption. By sect. 116, after the moneys borrowed upon the credit of the duties and of the expenses incurred in erecting and maintaining the groyns and other works should have been fully paid, the commissioners were empowered to apply any surplus arising from the said duty in aid of the rate for paving, watching, lighting, and cleansing the said town, as to them should seem reasonable and proper. The rate referred to, the commissioners were authorised by other sections of the said Act—viz., 82 to 97 inclusive, to assess and levy on the occupiers of property in the said town to an amount not exceeding 4*s.* in the pound in any one year. Fresh powers were also given by the said Act for enlarging and regulating the said market, and the surplus arising from the said market, or of the rents or tolls thereof, was directed (sect. 106) to be applied either in aid of the rate for paving, cleansing, lighting, and watching the said town, or of the duty by the said Act directed to be levied upon coal and culm, as to the said commissioners should seem reasonable and proper.

4. The said town continued to be governed and regulated by the last-mentioned Act, and the powers of that Act were put in force and acted upon until the passing of the Act next hereinafter mentioned.

5. The Brighton Town Improvement Act (6 Geo. 4, c. clxxix), passed in 1825, repealed (sect. 1) the hereinbefore mentioned Acts of 13 Geo. 3, and 50 Geo. 3, and all matters and things therein respectively contained.

6. By sect. 3 of the said Act (6 Geo. 4 c. clxxix) new commissioners were appointed to carry into effect the provisions thereof.

7 By sect. 117 of the same Act, it was enacted that all the rates, tolls, duties, assessments, and impositions which were by this Act authorised to be rated, levied, assessed, or imposed by the said commissioners (except the rate for watering as aforesaid), should, when received, be consolidated into and form one fund, and be applicable by the commissioners to be appointed by virtue of this Act for the general purposes thereof.

8. The general purposes referred to in sect. 117 aforesaid include repairing, lighting, watching, and cleansing the streets, &c. (see sects. 31, 33, 34, 37, 41, 50, 59, 60, 70); the providing of fire engines (sect. 61); the purchase of lands, &c., for widening and improving streets, or for providing a site for a town hall (sect. 97); the erection of a town hall, the extension and enlargement of the market established under the two former Acts, the erection of town pound, and providing a prison (sect. 139); the establishment of an additional market for the sale of provisions, if deemed expedient (sect. 148); the establishment of a cattle, corn, and hay market sect. 149. The rates, tolls, duties, assessments, and impositions mentioned in the said section include the rates or duties levied on coals, coke, culm, cinders, ashes, and charcoal, the tolls of the markets, and all other sums receivable by the commissioners as the governing body of the town, as well as all sums levied by way of rates assessed upon the occupiers of tenements within the limits of the town, except the water rate.

9. By sect. 133 the said commissioners were empowered to levy a rate or assessment not exceeding 4*s.* in the pound upon the tenants or occupiers of all tenements, or hereditaments whatsoever within the said town: Provided that nothing in the said Act contained should extend to charge any agricultural land or buildings.

10. By sects. 162 and 163 it was enacted as follows: Sect. 162, "That it shall and may be lawful to and for the said commissioners, and they are hereby authorised and required from time to time as to them shall seem necessary and expedient, to repair, improve, maintain, or remove the groyns, walls, and other fences and works already erected and built for the protection of the said town from the encroachments of the sea, and also from time to time, as to them the said commissioners shall seem necessary and expedient, to erect, set up, build, repair, and maintain such other groyns, walls, jetties, piers, and works, for the better protection of the said town, or any part of the same, or of the beach or shore thereof, from the encroachments of the sea, and for facilitating the approach to the sea, and the landing of coals and other merchandise on the beach or shore of the said town." And by sect. 163, it was enacted "That there should be paid to the commissioners, any rate or duty which they should order and direct, not exceeding 3*s.* for every chaldron of coal or culm; 1*s.* 6*d.* for every chaldron of coke; 1*s.* for every chaldron of cinders and ashes: and 1d. for every bushel of charcoal; and so in proportion for a less quantity of the said several and respective articles which should be landed on the beach of the said town, or in any other manner, by land carriage or otherwise, brought or delivered within the limits of the said town."

11. By sects. 164 and following sects, power was given for securing payment of the said rate or duty similar to the powers for the like purpose contained in the above mentioned repealed Act.

12. By sect. 171 it was provided, that in every case when any coals, culm, or coke should have been landed or unloaded within the limits of the act for the purpose of being forwarded to any other place or places, and not to be consumed within the said limits, then and in every such case the collector or treasurer to be appointed by virtue of this Act is hereby directed and required to return and pay on demand to the owner or owners, or other person or persons on his, her, or their behalf, a drawback of the whole rate or duty paid for every chaldron of coals, culm, or coke so landed or unloaded, and which shall have been forwarded to any other place for sale or consumption.

13. The said town was incorporated by a charter of incorporation, dated the 1st April 1854, under an Act, 1 Vict. c. 78, to amend the 6 Will. 4, c. 76, to provide for the regulation of municipal corporations in England and Wales.

14. By The Brighton Commissioners Transfer Act 1855," the Commissioners acting under the Brighton Town Act ceased to act as such commissioners, and the Brighton Corporation and their successors were appointed the commissioners for carrying the Brighton Town Act into execution.

15. The Local Government Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98) was adopted by the corporation in 1860, and the corporation became the local board, and by The Local Government Supplemental Act 1861, a certain provisional order under the Local Government Act 1858, relating to the district of Brighton, and repealing and altering parts of the Brighton Local Acts in force within the district of the Brighton local board, was confirmed and the Local Government Supplemental Act 1861, was incorporated with the Local Government Act, 1858.

16. By the provisional order in the preceding paragraph, the Public Health Act and Local Government Act were, after the passing of an Act of Parliament confirming that order to be incorporated with the unrepealed parts of the local Acts, and the purposes of the unrepealed parts were to be taken and deemed to be purposes of the said Public Health Act and Local Government Act.

17. Sects. 61, 97, and 133 of the Brighton Town Act were repealed by the Local Government Supplemental Act 1861. Sects. 117, 139, 148, 149, 162, 163, 164, and 171, hereinbefore mentioned, of the Brighton Town Act remain unrepealed. Since that time the corporation have levied under the authority of the Public Health Act and the Local Government Act general district rates.

18. Sect. 87 of the Public Health Act authorises the levying of a general district rate as follows: "And be it enacted, that the treasurer shall keep a separate account, to be called the 'District Fund Account,' and the moneys carried to such account under the directions of this Act shall be applied by the Local Board of Health in defraying such of the expenses incurred or to be incurred by the said local board in carrying this Act into execution, and not otherwise expressly provided for, as they may think proper. And the said local board shall from time to time, when and as often as occasion shall require, make and levy, in addition to any other rate, a rate or rates to be called 'General District Rates,' for defraying such expenses as are charged upon that rate by this Act, and such other expenses of executing this Act in any district as are not provided by any other rate, or defrayed out of the district fund account."

19. The following is a summary of the general district account for the borough of Brighton for the year ending 31st Aug. 1866, showing the income and expenditure for that year. Similar accounts exist for the years ending 31st Aug. 1867 and 1868.

(Here follows a debtor and creditor account of the income and expenditure, on the debtor side of which the various items of income are stated, commencing with "general district rate," and then afterwards, and amongst some other items, come the following:—"Coal duties, 10,358*l.* 16*s.* 6*d.*;" "market tolls, 1270*l.* 14*s.* 2*d.*;" "fish market tolls, 217*l.* 15*s.* 9*d.*;" "Town Hall Rooms, 219*l.* 12*s.*;" "White Lion yard and premises, 33*l.* 14*s.*")

20. The commissioners of the town of Brighton, under the powers of the before-mentioned Acts, borrowed meneys for public purposes, on the security of the rates levied under the said Acts, and since the Brighton Commissioners Transfer Act 1855, the corporation has paid off portions thereof, and has borrowed further sums, their actual debt now amounting to 204,722*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*

21. The corporation, under the powers vested in them, levy rates or duties on coals, culm, coke, cinders, ashes, and charcoal, amounting to between 9000*l.* and 10,000*l.* per annum beyond the costs of the collection, and these rates or duties, with certain market tolls, and rents of lands belonging to the corporation, in respect of which tolls and rents income tax has always been charged and paid by the corporation, are carried by the corporation to one fund, which is applied by them towards defraying the expenses under the Brighton Town Act and The Local Government Supplemental Act 1861, and the deficiency of such expenses is in each year defrayed by means of general district rates which are from time to time made by the corporation for that purpose.

22. The corporation deduct the income tax from the interest payable on their general debt. Income tax on the whole of the coal rates or duties was paid by the corporation under schedule A. for the years, ending 5th April, 1858 to 1865, inclusive.

23. For the year ending 5th April 1866, the assessment was made under schedule A.; the corporation appealed to the local commissioners of property and income tax, but the commissioners confirmed the assessment. The corporation did not pay the amount of the duty so assessed, but tendered to the collector the amount of the Income-tax in respect of the interest on their debt, which was refused by the collector.

24. For the years ending 5th April 1867 and 5th April 1868, assessments in default of returns were made on the corporation in respect of the coal rates or duties under schedule D (not schedule A as theretofore). This was in consequence of the Act 29 & 30 Vict. c. 36, s. 8, having passed in 1866.

25. These assessments were appealed from to the local commissioners, who confirmed the assessments, and the corporation did not pay the amounts so assessed, but made tenders to the collector of the Income-tax on the interest of the corporation debt, which was refused.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the rates or duties, levied by the Corporation of Brighton on coal, culm, coke, cinders, ashes, and charcoal, in manner above mentioned, are chargeable with the income-tax? If the court shall be of opinion in the affirmative, then judgment shall be entered up for the Crown for 500*l.* 7*s.* 10*d.* (being the amount of the assessments in respect of the coal rates or duties for the three years ended on the 5th April 1868), and costs of suit. If the court shall be of opinion in the negative, then judgment with costs of defence shall be entered up for the defendant, and the said corporation is to pay to the use of Her Majesty the several sums of money tendered by them for the said three years for the duty in respect of the interest of the moneys borrowed by them, amounting in the whole to 305*l.* 15*s.* 9*d.*

Points for argument for the Crown. 1. That the Brighton coal dues are property or profits chargeable with duty under the Income Tax Acts. 2. That none of the provisions contained in any of the Acts creating the coal dues and regulating their use and application, relieve or except the dues from being chargeable with duty under the Income-tax Acts.

Points for arguments for the defendant. 1. That the coal rates or duties are not profits from or arising out of any "lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages" within the meaning of schedule A of the Act 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35. 2. That the coal rates or duties are not profits or gains within the meaning of schedule D of that Act. 3. That the coal rates are rates or assessments not chargeable by that Act as profits within the meaning of the proviso in sect. 102 of that Act.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. P. Collier, Q. C.), (with him were the Solicitor-General, (Sir J. D. Coleridge, Q.C.), and C. Hutton), for the Crown.—The corporation having a statutory power to levy tolls, called "rates" or "duties," upon coals imported or brought into Brighton, the question is whether that is a "hereditament," taxable under the Income Tax Act (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35). By sect. 1 of that Act the several sums to be annually raised are specified in schedules from A. to E. Under schedule A. the duty is imposed "in respect of the property of all lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages," which are the widest possible words. Such a toll as this granted to a man and his heirs, or to a corporation and its successors, is a "hereditament," or a "heritage," an incorporeal hereditament, and liable to income tax. It falls under either schedule A. or schedule D. As to schedule A., sect. 60 provides rules for assessing the duties thereunder; and in sub-rule (3) of rule 3, "tolls" are expressly mentioned as subject to the tax. Then, as to schedule D., sect. 100 lays down rules for charging the duties extending to "every description of property or profits not contained in schedules A., B., C., and E., and not specially exempted;" and by the rule in the sixth case, there set out, duty is to be charged "in respect of any annual profits or sums not falling under any of the foregoing rules, and not charged by virtue of any of the other schedules in the Act." These dues or tolls are therefore taxable as a "hereditament" under schedule A, or as "a description of property or profits not otherwise charged" under schedule D. They differ in no respect in principle from rents or market tolls, which are admittedly taxable. Under the Act of Geo. 3 the commissioners were empowered to levy 6*d.* a chaldron on coals landed at the beach, to be applied to the maintenance of groyns. By 50 Geo. 3, c. 38, that rate was increased to 3*s.* on coals so landed or brought into the town for consumption, and a drawback was fixed on coals forwarded through the town elsewhere, and the surplus of such duty was to go in aid of the town paving and lighting rate. By 6 Geo. 4, c. clxxix, the coal due was raised to 4*s.*, and "all the rates, assessments, tolls, duties, and impositions," raised for those purposes under the Act were consolidated into one general fund. This coal duty is now therefore applicable to all public borough purposes; but whether applicable to one or several purposes is immaterial in principle. It is a different kind of tax from rates levied on housekeepers and inhabitants generally, which are a taxing of the community by themselves through their legal representatives. [MARTIN, B.—Does the corporation of London pay income tax on coals imported into the City? Manisty, Q. C., contra.—No. As long as they had power to raise and apply the coal duty at pleasure they paid tax; but since the duty was specifically applied to public purposes they appealed, and their appeal was allowed.] The whole question of the revenues of the corporation of London and their liability to income-tax are now, I am informed, the subject of a special case, and will eventually come before this court. The market tolls and rents mentioned in the case are equally applicable to public purposes, and yet income-tax is paid on them. None of these rates or dues can be turned to private uses. They are analogous to tolls levied by the lord of a manor under a Crown grant on all goods of a certain kind imported into the manor. They are as much real property, and so a taxable "hereditament," as the tolls received from ships passing a lighthouse, the profits from which have been held to be real estate, and not personalty: (Attorney-General v. Jones, 1 Mac. & G. 574; 1 Hall & Tw. 493; 19 L. J. 266, Ch.) [MARTIN, B.—Are not these dues a "tenement? See Co. Litt. sects. 14, 15, note 20 (a).]

Manisty, Q. C. (with Gainsford Bruce), for the defendant, contra, was called on by the court. This is not a toll, nor in the nature of one, but a power to impose a tax. It is as thoroughly a tax as if it were so much in the pound raised on the houses in Brighton for public purposes. Without admitting that under the old Acts which are referred to in the case, this coal rate would have been taxable, we need only consider the 6 Geo. 4, c. clxxix, the only Act (excepting the public Act) now applicable to the matter. Sect. 117 of that Act consolidated these coal due into one common fund with all other "rates and assessments," for the general purposes of the Act, as specified in paragraph 8 of the case, whereby it lost any peculiar or exceptional character as a "toll," even if it ever had any prior to such consolidation. [MARTIN, B.—Your argument would apply to all the tolls and various kinds of corporate property, which, under sect. 92 of the Municipal Corporations Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76), have been brought into the borough fund. What difference is there between these coal dues and the port and other dues and tolls at Liverpool, and many other large commercial places on which income tax has always been charged and paid?] These dues are similar to rates raised for ordinary borough purposes. Neither of them is in the nature of a "toll," but both form a common borough fund. They are as much a tax on the community for their general purposes as the tax on the houses, &c. which the commissioners have the power to levy; no distinction can be drawn between the two modes of raising money for the common fund. They are in no sense a "toll" or "hereditament," or "property," within the Income Tax Act, but in terms, in substance and in spirit, a power to tax or levy a rate, and if, as I contend, they are themselves a tax, it will be conceded that a tax is not the subject of taxation. The fallacy of the Crown is in calling that a property or "hereditament" which is purely and simply a rate, not arising like "tolls," which are chargeable to income-tax, out of property, e.g., "lands, tenements," &c. These dues come, therefore, neither within schedule A nor schedule D. Moreover, they are exempt under sect. 102 of the Income-tax Act, by which payment of the tax on interest on money lent on rates or assessments not chargeable by the Act is provided for, showing by implication that rates, such as these coal dues really are, are exempted from the tax.

The Attorney-General in reply.—It begs the question to refer to sect. 102. The proviso there shows that, though there may be a class of rates not chargeable as "profits," there may yet be others which are. There is a clear distinction between rates, &c., which are chargeable as "profits," and those which are not. A rate levied by the corporation on householders is the community taxing itself by its elected representatives, and such a rate is not taxable. But these coal dues are a rate or "toll," in the nature of a "customs duty," imposed on all persons, whether inhabitants, strangers, or foreigners. Anyone entering the harbour with a coal ship, and landing coals on the beach, is liable to it. [KELLY, C. B.—Mr. Manisty says, that indirectly it is a tax on the inhabitants consuming coal.] It would be profitless to enter here into a difficult question of political economy, whether the incidence of taxation is upon the importer or consumer. Nothing can be gathered from the use of the word "rate" as shewing that the Legislature meant to place this duty in the same category with ordinary rates; for, in several old statutes, notably in 12 Car. 2, c. 4, s. 6, the word "rate" is used for a customs duty. In the present instance it means not "rate" in the modern sense and use of that word, but simply pro ratâ, that is, a payment in proportion to the quantity of coal imported. It is admitted that if this had been a grant to the Duke of Norfolk and his heirs, the toll would have been "profits" liable to income tax. What difference can it make, that, instead of a fixed sum, the grantee has power to fix the amount up to a given maximum? To sum up the points contended for by the Crown: First, there is the clearest distinction between ordinary rates and these dues, which are a tax on all the Queen's subjects and foreigners resorting to Brighton, and resemble a toll on all ships coming to a certain port, or passing a lighthouse; secondly, it is conceded that if granted to a private person they would be taxable, and no valid distinction has been established on the score of their being applicable to public purposes.

KELLY, C.B.—I am of opinion that the Crown in this case is entitled to the judgment of the court. In this, as in all other cases, we should look to the substance of the matter before us, and consider, not the mere language of one or another section of an Act of Parliament, but the substantial effect of all the provisions of the Act taken together. Now, in the first place, this is undoubtedly a duty upon coals, amounting to 3*s.* a chaldron, granted by the Acts of Parliament, which have been referred to, to the corporation of Brighton, giving to them an annual income, as stated in the case, of some 10,000*l.* Primâ facie their income would, no doubt, be liable to income-tax just as much as if it were that of a private individual. The question, therefore, is whether, in the nature of the duty, the objects to be attained, the purposes to which the duty is to be applied, or —if I may use an expression which belongs, as has been correctly observed by the Attorney-General, rather to the science of political economy than to the law—the "incidence of taxation," there is anything to exempt it from liability to income tax. Whether we look to the one or the other of those considerations, treating them as tests of the liability of the corporation to income tax, I think that no solid argument has been adduced before us against their liability to it. First, it was said that this duty was applicable to purposes to which alone, in general, rates, properly so called, are applied—that is to say, rates imposed not upon all the inhabitants, but upon the householders and other rateable inhabitants of a borough, not only for what may be called borough purposes, but for strictly parochial purposes, as for lighting and watching, and so forth. It is true, and I will refer to that consideration hereafter, that the purposes to which this coal duty is to be applied are conjoined. in one of the sections of the Act, with what may be called almost parochial purposes, the coal duty itself being thereby amalgamated with the funds raised in general by ordinary rates upon the rateable inhabitants. But when we come to look at the provisions of the Act, we find that the purposes to which this fund, including in it the sum levied in respect of this duty is applicable, are, in the first place, "repairing, lighting, watching, and cleansing the streets, houses, and other public passages and places;" purposes, no doubt, usually provided for by the ordinary borough rates. But we find also that it is applicable to the much larger and more extensive purposes of "the purchase of lands for widening and improving streets, the providing a site for a town hall, the erection of a town hall, the extension and enlargement of the market (established under the two former Acts), the erection of a town pound, and providing a prison; the establishment of an additional market for the sale of provisions if deemed expedient; and the establishment of a cattle, corn, and hay market." Now, no one can deny that, if this had been a fund created simply and merely for those several last-mentioned purposes, it would have been liable to income-tax. The purposes themselves when looked at, show that the produce of this fund, when it had been applied to those purposes, would itself be rateable. I think, therefore, that coupling the purpose, with the nature of the duty itself, there is no doubt that this rate or duty is liable to income-tax. But then it is said that it is amalgamated with these other funds, for watching and lighting; but in the Municipal Corporation Act, to which my brother Martin referred, there is a similar amalgamation. It might therefore as well be said that landed property of any description, producing large rents to a corporation, shall not be liable to income-tax, because, under the provision of the Municipal Act (s. 92), the profits arising from such property are amalgamated with all the other dues and taxes and rates to which the corporation may be entitled, and are applicable therefore to all the ordinary purposes to which rates alone are usually applicable. With regard to the argument that has been urged upon the word "rate," it is answered, if any answer were necessary, by the reference made by the Attorney-General to the Act of Charles II., where it is quite clear that the term "rate" is applied in several sections, and particularly in the 6th section, to a duty upon commodities imported, which would have been clearly liable to income-tax, if income-tax had been in existence at that period. Taking, therefore, the whole case together as it is now before us, the only remaining question is, whether it can be contended that this is really and in substance a tax upon the inhabitants of Brighton; still more, whether it can be shown to be, as Mr. Manisty has insisted, that it is, a tax upon the rateable inhabitants of the place? It is really no such thing. If we look at the ultimate destination of every ton of coal which may be imported into or unloaded within the limits of the Act at Brighton, upon which this duty is levied, we shall find that the incidence of the tax is by no means confined to the rateable inhabitants of the town, nor even to the inhabitants of Brighton at large, but that it must fall upon the consumers, who may live at any imaginable distance from the town, or the limits of this Act. Suppose the, probably not unfrequent, case to occur, of a whole cargo of coals to be imported at Shoreham, consigned to a coal merchant in Brighton; they are conveyed from Shoreham to Brighton, and they pay the duty at the time of their being unloaded within the limits of the Act, whether they go by waggons or by barges, and so by sea, and whether loaded on the beach or unloaded from waggons at the coal merchant's store; there and then it is that the duty attaches and becomes payable. Upon whom, then, does that duty fall? In the first instance, no doubt, upon the coal merchant who has imported the coal; he pays the duty, and if the coal stopped there the duty would be upon him and him alone; but, when we trace it further, as it is necessary to do in order to follow up the argument to its legitimate end, we find that he may, and probably does, sell a portion of these coals to rated inhabitants of Brighton, and if that were necessarily the destination of the whole of the coal liable to this duty, there might be something in the argument which has been urged. But, on the other hand, these coals, thus imported into Brighton, and on which the coal merchant has paid the duty, are sold by him to and consumed by the poor as well as the rich people of the place, and consequently by a class, and probably the most numerous class, of inhabitants of Brighton who are not rateable at all, nor occupiers of houses, nor liable to any single rate made or imposed within the town. But it goes further, because the coal merchant may, and probably does, sell a considerable portion of such coals to persons resident in the neighbourhood of Brighton, but beyond the limits of the Act. If, therefore, this tax falls, as, indeed, the great majority of all taxes do sooner or later fall, upon the consumer, the "incidence of taxation" in this case is not upon the rated inhabitants of Brighton alone, nor upon the inhabitants of Brighton at large, but, as to a great portion of the coals, upon persons without the limits of the Act, and not resident in the town at all, but who are simply members of the community at large. The "drawback" is only payable upon coals originally destined for some point without the limits of the Act, and which are merely to be conveyed through Brighton. It seems to me, therefore, that this coal duty is a valuable and profitable source of income to which the corporation and their successors are entitled, for various purposes of the nature to which I have already adverted, and that, upon every principle applicable to the construction of the Income Tax Act, it is a valuable and profitable "hereditament," and as such liable to income tax.

MARTIN, B.—I am also of the same opinion. The first question proposed to us is, whether the rates or duties levied by the Corporation of Brighton upon coals under this Act of Parliament which has been referred to, are chargeable with income tax, and I am opinion that they are. It seems to me that the question depends upon whether they are, and can be designated as 'property or profits,' and that is the real question in the case. By the Act of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, the Legislature thought fit to impose upon the subjects of this country an income tax; and it is plain from the enactments of the statute, that they meant to include every species of property and profits whatever. The various descriptions of property, the subject matters to be taxed, are contained in five schedules; the first (A) says that the tax is to be imposed upon all "lands, tenements, and hereditaments;" and I think there is good reason for contending that this rate or tax is a "hereditament." But it is not, I think, material to decide that question now. The second schedule (B.) is in respect of the occupation of lands, tenements, and hereditaments, upon which a tax is imposed. The third schedule (C) imposes a tax upon "all profits arising from annuities, dividends, and shares of annuities payable to any person or body." The fourth schedule (D) charges the tax upon "the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person from any kind of property whatever, and upon the annual profits or gains arising or accruing from any profession, trade, employment, or vocation." The fifth schedule (E) is in respect of "every public office or employment of profit, and upon every annuity, pension, or stipend payable by Her Majesty." These five schedules include almost every imaginable species of property and profit. But, lest there should be any doubt upon the matter, sect. 100, (schedule D) enacts that "The duties shall extend to every description of property or profits which shall not be contained in either of the other schedules and not specially exempted." Now it seems to me to be almost impossible that any net could be spread wider than that is, for it catches "every description of property or profits" whatever, not previously comprised in any of the schedules, which alone seem to include almost everything. The real question then is, whether this coal rate or duty is "property or profits" within this Act of Parliament, the object of which was to tax everything. Now, I am opinion that the quality and nature of this rate depend upon the statute of 13 Geo. 3, and not upon the construction of the subsequent statute of Geo. 4, which Mr. Manisty has referred to and so much relied on. That subsequent statute enacted that, for the general benefit of the town, all the property of the corporation, including this duty and the profits of the market, and the rents of certain lands belonging to the corporation were to go into one common fund; and acordingly we have the amounts under each head of income set out in the account in paragraph 19 of the case. First, there is the general district rate; that would be a tax properly so called, and not in my opinion coming within the description of "property or profits." Then come "scavenging, pavements, highways, lighting streets, fees for testing gas meters," and then we have "coal duties 10,358*l.* 10*s.* 6*d.*" That is followed by "market tolls," and then by some other property belonging to them, "Town-hall Rooms" and "White Lion-yard premises." Now all these sources of profit are by the 6 Geo. 4 consolidated into one, but that has not at all the effect of altering the quality or nature of these particular tolls; and, as my Lord has already stated, the Municipal Corporation Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76) directs that the rents of land and other property of the corporation shall be brought into the borough fund along with the rates to be raised in the ordinary way, yet no one can contend that, because that 92nd section so enacts, therefore, the property of the Corporation of Liverpool or London, or any other municipal borough, is to escape the payment of income-tax. It is nothing more than enacting that the income of public property shall bear its share of the expenditure of the kingdom. The 13 Geo. 3 was an Act "for paving, lighting, and cleansing the streets, lanes, and places within the borough of Brighthelmstone, in the county of Sussex, for removing nuisances and annoyances, and preventing the like for the future, for holding and regulating a market within the said town, for building and repairing groyns, to render the coast safe and commodious for ships and vessels to embark and land sea coal, culm, and other coal for the use of the inhabitants of the said town, and for levying a duty thereon, and for other purposes." By it commissioners were appointed, to whom powers were given to purchase lands for, and to establish a market in the town. That it seems they have done. They have purchased the land and established the market, and they collect market tolls by virtue of the Act, in regard of which tolls they admit the liability to pay income-tax. With respect, therefore, to one species of property created by the Act, they pay this income-tax. The Act then goes on to provide that these coal tolls shall be applied in repairing certain groyns in such manner as thereinafter mentioned. Then it recites that "the town of Brighthelmstone is situate by the sea, and within six miles of the port or harbour of Shoreham, and belongs to the said port; and great part of the said town having been destroyed by the breaking in of the sea, several groyns were some years since erected, which have preserved the said town, and the coast is now safe and commodious, at several times of the year, for ships and vessels to unload and land sea coal, culm, and other coal, at the beach of the said town, for the use of the inhabitants thereof. And whereas the said groyns are become greatly out of repair, and the inhabitants of the said town are not able to raise money sufficient to repair the same without the aid and authoirty of Parliament." It is then enacted that these commissioners shall be trustees for the purpose of "repairing, improving, maintaining, and preserving the said groyns." And then it proceeds to enact that, after the 20th June 1773, there shall be paid to the said trustees and their successors the sum of 6*d.* upon every chaldron of sea coal which may be landed on the beach of the coast of the town of Brighthelmstone, and they may appoint a person to receive it. And then, to the intent that the rate and duty might be truly paid, it was further enacted, "that no collector or officer of customs of the port or harbour of Shoreham (to which port the said town of Brighthelmstone doth belong and is subject) should give any discharge or take any report outwards for any ship, or permit any ship to leave the port until the master had produced a certificate that the above rate or duty had been paid or secured to be paid;" and it also contained a power enabling the commissioners "to enter any such ship in the event of non-payment of the said rate or duty, and to detain and sell such ship and her furniture for the purpose of realising the said rate or duty." And a power was also given to borrow 1500*l.* on the credit of the rate and duty. It seems to me, therefore, that this is a rate, a tax, or a property, which was given to these trustees absolutely; and if the repair of these groyns would not cost them a farthing, they were, nevertheless, entitled to the duty. They were entitled to receive it, wholly independent of any particular expenses in regard to the groyns; and though it may be said that the consideration for granting the tolls was the repair of these groyns, yet they were nevertheless absolutely entitled to them. As has been said by the learned Attorney-General, I see no distinction between this rate or duty and the rate or duty in respect of a light-house, which is well known to be a most valuable property. The Holyhead corporation had a right to erect lighthouses, and to levy a tax upon ships which passed by within a certain distance from them. That that was a property of the most valuable kind is evidenced by what my Lord stated in the course of this argument, that, in regard to one lighthouse alone, 400,000*l.* was paid to the owner of it upon its being taken possession of by the Government. I also happen to know, from my own knowledge and experience, several cases of the same kind, of corporations and individuals being entitled to payments of this sort in regard to certain duties to be performed, b t still not duties immediately connected with the expenditure of the sum of money received. For these reasons, therefore, and looking at the very general words of this Act of Parliament, and it being the object of the Legislature that every species of "property or profits" should be subject to it, I am of opinion that these coal rates or duties are a species of property falling within the "property or profits," which are the subject-matter for the imposition of the income-tax, and that the corporation of Brighton must pay income-tax upon them. They have paid it for several years, and it seems to me that they must continue to pay it.

KELLY, C. B.—My brother Channell who has just been called away on public duty as Election Judge, before he left the court, desired me to say, that having heard the arguments, he entirely concurred in the judgment which we were about to and have pronounced for the Crown.

FOREMAN AND WIFE v. THE MAYOR, &c., OF CANTERBURY.

Local board of health—Liability for acts of their servants.

The defendants, who were the local board for the district of Canterbury, having employed their servants to do certain work upon the roads within such district, such servants left a heap of stones in the road, without any light or caution being affixed, and the plaintiffs, who were driving along such road upon a dark night, and not being enabled to see such heap of stones, drove against them and were injured:

Held, that the defendants were liable for the negligence of their servants.

Quære, whether they would have been liable if the placing of the heap of stones in the road had been the act of their surveyor.

THIS was a rule calling upon the plaintiffs to show cause why the verdict returned for them should not be set aside, and a new trial had, on the ground of misdirection by the learned judge in holding the defendants, as a local board, to be liable in an action for the act complained of and proved, inasmuch as their liability, if any, as surveyors of the highways, is of a different character, and no liability to an action for damages exists in such a case.

The declaration stated that the defendants wrongfully suffered certain earth, rubbish, and stones, which had been placed by them in a heap on a public highway, to remain there during the night without any guard or light or means to prevent persons from driving against the same, whereby the said plaintiff, Alfred Foreman—who was then with his said wife lawfully driving in his cart drawn by his horse along the said highway, in the night time—drove his said cart and horse against the said heap and upset the said cart, and the said plaintiff Jane was thrown out of the said cart, and seriously and permanently injured and damaged.

The defendants were the local board of health, under the provisions of the Local Government Act 1858; and it appeared that on the evening of the 26th Nov. 1869 the plaintiff, Mr. Foreman, who was a builder and carpenter, was returning from Canterbury towards his own home, about 3 miles distant, together with his wife (the female plaintiff), in his spring cart, at about seven o'clock in the evening, which was very dark, and were proceeding at a moderate pace, when they came to a part of the road where a heap of stones had been placed, and which projected into the road a distance of about 7ft., and so narrowing the road at that part to about 13ft., causing a serious obstruction. Not seeing any obstacle in the way, the plaintiff drove against the stones, and the horse fell forward over them, throwing the cart over on its right side and injuring Mrs. Foreman by falling upon her, and inflicting upon her very serious injuries. The stones had been brought to the spot by a contractor for some works to be done there, where they were at the time of the accident, by the direction and with the consent of the surveyor of the defendants, such spot being within the district over which they had jurisdiction. At the trial it was admitted by the defendants' counsel that if there was any liability at all, the defendants were the parties liable.

In the course of the argument LUSH, J. referred to sect. 37 of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, as constituting the surveyor an officer whom the local board of health have no authority to dismiss without the consent of the general board of health.

The arguments are sufficiently set forth in the following judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 27.—BLACKBURN, J.—In this case Mr. Denman obtained a rule nisi for a new trial, "on the ground of misdirection by the Lord Chief Justice in holding the defendants, as a local board, to be liable in an action for the acts complained of and proved, inasmuch as their liability, if any, as surveyors of the highways, is of a different character, and no liability to an action for damages exists in such a case." [He stated the facts.] The accident having arisen in that way, it is quite clear that the persons who put the stones there were negligent in not putting proper lights to protect passengers coming along the road from the risk of running upon them, and those persons would be liable for that act of negligence; and if they acted as servants of other persons, those who stood in the relation of masters to them would be answerable for the consequences of that negligence. Mr. Denman, in the argument before us, endeavoured to raise a separate point—that the Chief Justice, in leaving the case to the jury, did not expressly ask them whether there was negligence in leaving those stones in the road and not having sufficiently lighted and guarded them. It appears plain enough upon the facts that negligence in some one must have been taken for granted at the trial, and the rule on that ground was refused, and was only granted on the ground I have stated. The local board of health are, by the Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), s. 117, made surveyors of highways; and Mr. Denman correctly stated the law when he said that they would not be liable simply because they were surveyors of highways; but there is nothing in the Act which would relieve them, merely because they were surveyors, from liability which they would otherwise incur. In an ordinary case, where the surveyor of highways is acting for a township or parish, he would be clearly liable for any act of his own personal negligence. There is nothing to relieve him from that. If he had left the stones in the road in such a way as has been described, he would be personally liable for negligence. If he was himself the master of the servants, he would be equally responsible for their negligence. But in fact and in practice the surveyor never is the master of the persons who are employed on the roads. There is no matter of law which would prevent him being so. If, by any arrangement he made with the parish, he took upon himself to do the work by his servants, he would be responsible for those servants, though he was surveyor of the highways. But that being an unusual and uncommon state of things, it would require distinct proof to show that the persons who left the stones in that position were his servants, they generally being the servants of the parish, and the parish being a body which cannot be sued. But when it is a local board who are acting as surveyors, the state of things is in general the other way. The persons who are employed as labourers to mend the highways are in general servants of the local board; although the local board of health are a body who might very well contract with a contractor, yet they are a body who generally do the work themselves, that is, by their servants, and pay those servants. Therefore, generally speaking, as a matter of fact, those who actually do the work, when it is done by a local board of health as surveyors, are servants of the local board of health. That, if it is a disputed fact, requires, of course, proof; but, at the same time, it would be the ordinary state of things. Now, when in the course of the trial evidence was about to be given in support of the case of the plaintiffs to show that the persons who left the stones there were servants of the local board of health, there was an admission made dispensing with further proof; and, after that, the question went upon whether the local board could be made responsible for what has been done. I have already said that it is our opinion that the local board of health incur no such liability merely because they are surveyors. But the local board of health, if they were masters of the persons who were guilty of negligence, would be responsible for their acts, and they are not relieved from that responsibility merely because they are either surveyors or a local board. There was one case cited in the course of the argument (sup.), in which the Court of Common Pleas decided that a body like the local board of health, who were made surveyors of highways, were not responsible for the negligence of those who were their servants; and upon looking at the facts of that case it would appear that it would have been an authority directly in point for the present defendants if the case were still an authority at all; but upon looking at the reasons of that decision, we consider it to be overruled by the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Mersey Docks v. Gibbs (sup.). It is not overruled by name, but the principle upon which that case was decided in the House of Lords does overrule it, because it was decided that a public body like the local board of health are answerable for the negligence of their servants, just as if they were acting as the servants of a private person, and not for a corporation incorporated for a public purpose. Of course the individuals composing the body are not responsible; it is the local board of health that are responsible, and they would have to pay the damages out of the funds in their hands as a local board of health. There was one other point which occurred to one of the members of the court, and which was the only reason why we did not deliver judgment at once, and that is this: The 37th section of the Public Health Act 1848 requires the local board of health to appoint a surveyor and other persons named as officers and servants; and at the end of the section it is said that they may dismiss at pleasure all the officers and servants except the surveyor, and the surveyor is not to be dismissed without the approval of the General Board of Health. That being so, it would be a question to consider whether the surveyor whom they are thus required to appoint, and whom they are not allowed to dismiss at pleasure, is in the relation of servant to them in such a way as that, if the matter were being done by the surveyor, and the cause of the mischief were the negligence of the surveyor, the local board of health would be responsible for his negligence. I do not wish to express any opinion as to whether they would or would not be responsible. But if it had appeared that the mischief had been done by the negligence of the surveyor, and that point had been raised, it would have been desirable to consider the question, and determine whether they would be responsible for the act of the surveyor or not. But we think no such question arises in this case. It is probable that the negligence was not that of the surveyor, but of some subordinate who, though appointed by the surveyor, was still the servant of the local board, as much as a guard or a porter on a railway is the servant of the railway company, although they are appointed by the manager of the traffic, or the secretary or some other superior officer. It is probable that the negligence was that of some subordinate; it was a fact exclusively within the knowledge of the defendants, and if their case was that the negligence was the negligence of the surveyor, who, in one view, would not be their servant, that would have been a matter which would have required proof at the trial; and where the admission was made in the general terms it was, it dispenses with this proof; and we think it cannot be said afterwards that there was any misdirection in the judge in not pointing out that distinction, inasmuch as if it had been pointed out at the trial, it probably would have been shown that the negligence was not the negligence of the surveyor, but was the negligence of some undoubted servant of the local board. For these reasons we think the rule ought to be discharged.

Rule discharged.

REG. (ON THE PROSECUTION OF LOVIBOND) v. PRICE AND OTHERS.

Mandamus — Return — Demurrer — Commissions for inquiring into corrupt practices at elections — Refusal to grant certificate of indemnity reviewable by this court.

The decision of commissioners acting under the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 57 and the 26 Vict. c. 29 (for inquiring into the existence of corrupt practices in parliamentary elections), refusing a witness a certificate under sect. 7 of the last-named Act on the ground that he had not answered any one of the questions put to him, the answers to which might criminate or tend to criminate him, is reviewable by this court.

The prosecutor was examined by such commissioners, and certain questions were put to him, criminating or tending to criminate him, which he alleged he duly answered, but which the commissioners were of opinion he had not answered, and thereupon refused him a certificate of indemnity. A mandamus having been issued commanding them to grant such certificate, and alleging that he had answered every question relating to the matters then inquired into and the answers to which criminated or tended to criminate him, the said commissioners returned that they, after due deliberation and consideration thereupon had, were of opinion and duly adjudged and determined that he had not answered every one of the said questions, the answers to which might criminate or tend to criminate him; and thereupon, and for the reasons aforesaid, they were of opinion and duly adjudged and determined that the said H. L. was not entitled to receive from them, and that it was not their duty to give, and they declined and refused and still refuse to give him such certificate:

Held, upon demurrer, that the return was bad.

IN Hilary Term 1870, this court made absolute a rule calling upon Edwin Plumer Price, Thomas Chisholm Anstey, and Charles Edward Coleridge, Esqrs., the commissioners appointed to inquire into the existence of corrupt practices in the borough of Bridgewater, to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue directed to them commanding them to grant to Henry Lovibond a certificate of protection and indemnity pursuant to the statute 26 & 27 Vict. c. 29, s. 17: (see the report of the rule, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 12.)

The mandamus was as follows:

Victoria, by the Grace of God of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland Queen, Defender of the Faith, to Edwin Plumer Price, Thomas Chisholm Anstey, and Charles Edward Coleridge, Esquires, the commissioners appointed pursuant to the provisions of the statute passed in a session of Parliament holden in the 15th and 17th years of our reign, for the purpose of making inquiry into the existence of corrupt practices in the borough of Bridgewater. Whereas, by our royal commission issued for the purpose of causing inquiry to be made into the existence as aforesaid of corrupt practices in the said borough of Bridgewater, you, the said Edwin Plumer Price, Thomas Chisholm Anstey, and Charles Edward Coleridge, Esquires, were the commissioners named in such commission, and we have been given to understand and been informed in our court before us that on the 23rd Aug. last you commenced your inquiry under such commission, at the said borough of Bridgewater, and that one Henry Lovibond, of the said borough of Bridgewater, attorney-at-law, having been duly summoned, personally appeared before you, then being such commissioners as aforesaid, at Bridgewater aforesaid, to be examined by and before you, touching the subject matter of the said inquiry; and that upon such inquiry he was duly sworn, and was required by you to give, and did give on oath, on the 2nd and 3rd Sept. last, certain evidence, and answered every question relating to the matters then inquired into, which he was required by you, as such commissioners, to answer, and the answers to which criminated or tended to criminate him, the said Henry Lovibond; and that he was, in consequence of so answering, entitled to receive from you, and it was your duty to give him, under your hands, a certificate, stating that he was, upon his examination, required by you, the said commissioners, to answer questions relating to the matters aforesaid, the answers to which criminated or tended to criminate him, and that he had answered all such questions. And, whereas, we have been further given to understand that he, the said Henry Lovibond, being so entitled as aforesaid, did in due form apply to you, as such commissioners, for a certificate as aforesaid, and that you, the said commissioners, refused to give him such certificate, and still do refuse to give it, in contempt of us, and to the great damage of him, the said Henry Lovibond, as we have been informed from his complaint made to us in that behalf. Whereupon he hath humbly besought us that a fit and speedy remedy may be applied in this respect, and we, being willing that due and speedy justice should be done in the premises (as it is reasonable), do command you, the said Edwin Plumer Price, Thomas Chisholm Anstey, and Charles Edward Coleridge, as such commissioners as aforesaid, firmly enjoining you that immediately after the receipt of this writ, you do give the said Henry Lovibond such certificate as aforesaid, or that you show us cause to the contrary thereof, lest by your default the same complaint shall be repeated to us, and how you shall have executed this writ, make known to us at Westminister forthwith, returning to us this our writ. And this you are not to omit, &c. Witness, Sir Alexander James Edmund Cockburn, Baronet, at Westminster, the 27th Jan. 1870.

By the Court, NORTON.

The return ran thus:

Return.—We, the commissioners, do most humbly certify and return to our sovereign Lady the Queen, at the time and place in the said writ mentioned, as follows, that is to say, that we, the said commissioners, in the said writ named, were, by warrant under the royal sign manual, dated the 23rd June 1869, duly appointed commissioners (pursuant to the provisions of the statute in the said writ mentioned) for the purpose of making inquiry into the existence of corrupt practices at the last election of members to serve in Parliament for the borough of Bridgewater, and that in pursuance of such appointment, and under the authority of the law in that behalf, the said Henry Lovibond was duly summoned, and appeared and was examined on oath before us in relation to such corrupt practices as aforesaid, and that in the course of such examination the said Henry Lovibond was duly required by us to answer certain questions relating to such corrupt practices as aforesaid, the answers to which might criminate or tend to criminate him; and having so examined the said Henry Lovibond and duly required him to answer such questions as aforesaid, we, the commissioners, after due deliberation and consideration thereupon had, were of opinion and duly adjudged and determined that the said Henry Lovibond had not answered every one of the said questions, the answers to which might criminate or tend to criminate him. And thereupon, and for the reasons aforesaid, we, the said commissioners, were of opinion, and duly adjudged and determined, that the said Henry Lovibond was not entitled to receive from us, and that it was not our duty to give, and we declined and refused, and still refuse, to give him such certificate as in the said writ is in that behalf mentioned.

EDWIN PLUMER PRICE.
For myself and the other commissioners.

To this return there was a demurrer.

The prosecutor's points were, first, that the return made by the defendant to the writ of mandamus is bad as containing no legal answer thereto, inasmuch as it neither traverses, nor confesses, and avoids the allegations in the said mandamus; secondly, that the adjudication of the said commissioners that the said Henry Lovibond had not answered every one of the said questions is not conclusive in that behalf, and that their finding is subject to be reviewed by this court; thirdly, that this court has power to review the determination of the said commissioners on any question of fact which it is the duty of the said commissioners to determine; fourthly, that upon the facts disclosed it was the duty of the said commissioners to give the said Henry Lovibond such certificate as in the said writ is mentioned; fifthly, that the return of the said commissioners does not traverse or deny the allegation in the said writ that the said Henry Lovibond had answered every question relating to the matters then inquired into which he was required by the said commissioners to answer, and the answers to which criminate, or tended to criminate him, but merely alleges that the said commissioners were of opinion that he had not answered every one of such questions, and adjudged and determined that the said Henry Lovibond had not answered every one of such questions; sixthly, that the said return is bad, inasmuch as it tenders no issue in fact which the said Henry Lovibond can accept, and does not deny as a fact that the said Henry Lovibond had answered all such questions as aforesaid; seventhly, that if the said Henry Lovibond did, in fact, as is alleged in the said writ, answer all such questions (and which fact is not denied by the said commissioners in their said return), the allegation in the return to such writ, that it was the opinion of the said commissioners that he had not so answered, is not a legal answer to such allegation of fact.

The defendants' points were, first, that the return made by the defendants to the writ of mandamus herein contains matter affording a good answer in law to the said writ; secondly, that it was the duty of the said commissioners, and they were bound to determine whether the said Henry Lovibond had answered every one of the said questions, the answers to which might criminate, or tend to criminate him, before granting him such certificate, as in the said writ in that behalf is mentioned; thirdly, that the said commissioners, having adjudged and determined that the said Henry Lovibond had not answered every one of the said questions, the answers to which might criminate, or tend to criminate him, the finding and determination of the said commissioners is conclusive in that behalf, and assuming them to have acted bonâ fide in the discharge of their duty (which is not questioned), such finding and determination on a question of fact is not subject to be reviewed by this court; fourthly, that this court has no power to review the determination of the said commissioners on any question of fact which it is the duty of the commissioners to determine; fifthly, that the said commissioners, having adjudged and determined that the said Henry Lovibond had not answered every one of the said questions, the answers to which might criminate or tend to criminate him, the said Henry Lovibond, was not entitled to receive from them, nor was it their duty to give him, such certificate as in the said writ is in that behalf mentioned.

The Attorney-General (the Solicitor-General and Archibald with him) now appeared on behalf of the commissioners in support of the return to the mandamus, and stated that the question having been very fully argued by himself and his learned friends upon the rule absolute for the mandamus, and having no additional arguments to present to the court, and as the same question arose upon the demurrer which was so argued upon the rule, he did not propose again to argue the matter, but would be content with the judgment of the court being pronounced for the prosecutor without argument (if the court should remain of the same opinion as when the rule was made absolute), so that the case should be taken at once to the Exchequer Chamber, since, should that court affirm the judgment of this court, legislation upon the subject might be instituted.

Henry James, Q. C. (T. W. Saunders with him), assented to this, remarking that, when the rule for the mandamus was made absolute, their Lordships expressed their views at considerable length, and that whichever party succeeded upon the present argument, resort would be had to a court of error.

COCKBURN, C. J.—Although the decision of this court in ordinary cases making a rule absolute for a mandamus is not to be taken as binding the court upon the argument upon the return, since it is merely an expression of an opinion that there is sufficient shown to call for an answer; yet as this case was very fully argued upon the rule, and each member of the court expressed his views very strongly in the prosecutor's favour, and we see and have heard nothing to lead us to the belief that we are likely to change our opinions, there will be no useful end accomplished by a re-argument. Our judgment, therefore, may at once be given for the prosecutor, though this course must not be taken as a precedent.

Judgment for the prosecutor.

In consequence of the course sanctioned by the court, the judgments pronounced by the learned judges upon making the rule for the mandamus absolute is to be taken as the judgment now pronounced by them. CLARKE AND GOODGE (apps.), v. STANFORD (resp.)

Hackney carriage—What is a "plying for hire" 32 & 33 Vict. c. 115, ss. 4, 7.

A carriage which is standing in a place to which a certain portion of the public have access, ready to be hired by the public resorting to such place, is a carriage plying for hire, and is therefore a hackney carriage within the meaning of the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 115, and must be licensed.

A railway company arranged with a livery stable keeper that he should supply certain flys to stand in a yard at their station to await the arrival of passengers by their trains. The drivers were not to invite passengers by speech, but were to wait until called for by a servant of the company, or hired by the passenger himself. In pursuance of this arrangement, a fly was so placed:

Held, that this was a plying for hire, which constituted the fly a hackney carriage, requiring a licence.

THIS was a case stated by justices under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, upon a conviction of the appellants (32 & 33 Vict. c. 115) as follows:—

First, the informations charge that on the 18th June 1870 the said Frederick E. Clarke did unlawfully ply for hire, with an unlicensed carriage, at Harrow Railway Station, contrary to the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 115, and also that the said Samuel Goodge, on the said 18th June 1870, did unlawfully act as driver of an unlicensed hackney or stage carriage at Harrow Railway Station, contrary to the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 115; secondly, the following were the facts, as proved:—The London and North-Western Railway Company have a station at Harrow, within the limits of the metropolitan police district, which are those also of the Hackney Carriage Act (32 & 33 Vict. c. 115). The yard in front of the station is inclosed and is their private property. The appellant is a livery stable keeper. The railway company had upon certain terms arranged with the appellant to supply certain broughams, flys, and carriages, part of the same terms being that the said vehicles should stand on the premises of the company within the said yard to await the arrival of passengers by the trains. The appellants' servants who drive the flys were instructed not to invite passengers by speech, but to wait until called by a servant of the company or hired by the passenger himself; when so called the person requiring the fly entered and was driven according to his own directions, and paid the fare; thirdly, it was contended by the respondent that a fly so used was within sect. 4 of the Hackney Carriage Act (32 & 33 Vict. c. 115), which defines a hackney carriage to be "any carriage for the conveyance of passengers which plies for hire within the limits of this Act, and is not a stage carriage," and therefore requiring to be licensed, and to observe the regulations prescribed by the provisions of that Act; fourthly, It was contended by the appellants that, inasmuch as the fly was in the private yard of the railway company, it was not "plying for hire" within the meaning of the statute above cited; fifthly, our opinion was that the appellants' fly, while waiting in the yard of the railway station, was in fact "plying for hire" within the meaning of the definition of a hackney carriage in sect 4 of the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 115. We were of opinion that the fact that the driver was ready to take up any passenger coming by rail as a fare was sufficient, and that the circumstance that the yard was enclosed and that other hackney carriages were not allowed there was of no moment, and we therefore convicted the appellant Clarke in a penalty of 10*s*., and the appellant Goodge, as such driver, in a like penalty of 10*s*; sixthly, the opinion of this honourable court is requested whether such construction of the said statute is correct.

If, in the judgment of this honourable court, the fly as contended by the appellants was not a hackney carriage plying for hire within the meaning of the said recited statute, then the conviction is to be quashed; but if the opinion of this honourable court should be that under the circumstances above stated the fly of the appellants was a hackney carriage plying for hire within the meaning of the said statute, then the conviction is to be confirmed. Given under our hands this 16th day of November 1870.

EDWARD WM. COX.
IRWIN E. B. COX.

By the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 115 (The Metropolitan Public Carriage Act 1869), power is given to one of the Secretaries of State, who by sect. 6, may from time to time license to ply for hire within the limits of the Act hackney and stage carriages.

By sect. 7 it is enacted that, "if any unlicensed hackney or stage carriage plies for hire, the owner of such carriage shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding 5*l*. for every day during which such unlicensed carriage plies;" and the driver is also liable to a similar penalty unless he proves that he was ignorant of the fact of the carriage being an unlicensed one.

Bosanquet appeared for the appellants.—This was not plying for hire within the meaning of the Act, which means a holding out to the general public a readiness to take all passengers. Here the carriage was upon the private premises of the railway company, and was there for the purpose alone of taking up passengers who may have come by the trains. The carriage was not plying for passengers, but was upon the premises of the company to accommodate those persons coming by the trains who may have required its use. It is like the case of a carriage going into the courtyard of a nobleman's house at his request, when he has a number of guests more than he can accommodate with vehicles of his own for their departure. The case of Case v. Storey (L. Rep. 4 Ex. 319; 38 L. J. 113, M. C.; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 618) is in point. There it was held that a hackney carriage, whilst on the premises of a railway company by their leave for the accommodation of passengers by their trains, is not "plying for hire" in any "street or place" within the meaning of the Hackney Carriage Acts; and although that case was decided under the 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 22, s. 4, which enacts that every carriage with two or more wheels which shall be used for the purpose of standing or plying for hire in any public street or road at any place within the distance of five miles from the General Post-office shall be deemed and taken to be a hackney carriage within the meaning of this Act, yet the principle of that case applies to this one, although the words "public street or road," are not in the present statute. In his judgment Kelly, C.B. says: "First, then, was the carriage in this case standing or plying for hire?" Those words must mean that the carriage is to be at the disposal of anyone of the public who may think fit to hire it. I think, therefore, that they are not applicable here. The railway company, it appears, allow a number of cabs to come upon their premises, and there await the arrival of the trains, in order to provide accommodation for the arriving passengers. In one sense these cabs are undoubtedly plying for hire, but they are not so plying in a general sense, but only to such an extent, and subject to such regulations, as the licence given to them by the railway company may admit. To what extent and subject to what regulations must depend upon the particular terms of the licence in each case. For example, there might be an agreement between the company and the cabmen they allowed to enter their station as to the order in which passengers should be taken up, and so forth. But whatever particular arrangement might be made, the hackney carriages subject to it could not be said to be "standing or plying for hire," which must mean ready at any moment to be hired by any one of the public. [COCKBURN, C.J.—That case was decided upon an Act of Parliament in which the words were different. There it was necessary that the plying for hire should be in a public street or road; but under the present Act the plying for hire may be in any place.] The judgment, however, of the Lord Chief Baron is still in point as regards what constitutes a plying for hire. [MELLOR, J.—You say that he was upon the premises of the railway company by agreement with them.] Yes; that is so—[COCKBURN, C.J.—But he was not carrying passengers for them; he was there to carry anyone who came by the railway. LUSH, J.—It would seem as though the Legislature intended to meet such a case as this by making use of the words "any carriage for the conveyance of passengers which plies for hire within the limits of this Act." According to your argument, all the cabs in London would be exempt if they merely went to the stations to take up passengers.] Suppose a fly proprietor had his establishment on the other side of the railway company's premises, and a railway servant goes there and says, "Come for a passenger," he would not be liable as he would be upon the private property of the company, and not liable to be hired by the general public. What difference, therefore, is there if he has his fly ready upon the company's premises? [COCKBURN, C.J.—There is nothing in the Act which says that the plying for hire must be in a public place.] He was merely waiting to be hired in a private place. [COCKBURN, C.J.—It was private property, but a public place.] Merely waiting to be hired cannot be a plying for hire. [LUSH, J.—It is waiting to be hired in a place to which the public resort.]

COCKBURN, C.J.—This is clearly a case within the statute. It is not the same as Case v. Storey, because under the Act upon which that decision took place it was necessary that the party should be plying for hire in a public street or road. It is true that the Lord Chief Baron thought that being at the station ready to be hired was not a plying for hire; but we are not bound by that opinion, as it was not necessary to the decision of the case. I think that the words "plying for hire" are satisfied by the facts of this case. The flys are certainly admitted to the station yard by virtue of an agreement with the company, whereby it is stipulated that the vehicles should stand on the premises of the company within the said yard to await the arrival of passengers by the trains, the drivers being instructed not to invite passengers; and although it is not so found by the case, yet I take it that the flys are to ply for hire exclusively for the purposes of the railway, and that it would not be open to them to carry any other portions of the public. Well, but surely this is a plying for hire, for it is a standing in an open place ready to take as a fare any person who may arrive by the trains. I think that when a person has a carriage ready for use at a place frequented by the public, and is willing to carry a passenger, though he does not solicit anyone, he is plying for hire. This statute carefully avoids the difficulty of the former one as exposed in the case of Case v. Storey, and, I have no doubt, advisedly.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. Although in some sense the premises upon which the fly was standing were private property, and the company had a right to exclude persons from it, yet as they allowed a certain number of flys to come there for the purpose stated, it became a public place, and the plying was undoubtedly for hire. The difference between the present and the former statute is, that in the former one "public street or road" are mentioned, whilst in the present one these words are omitted. I must say that I am of opinion that this is a carriage which is liable to the duty. It is allowed to enter the station yard under certain conditions. What is it there for? Why, to be hired. It is then plying for hire. The driver exhibits himself, and is ready to allow his fly to be hired. The fly is in a place where carriages stand to be hired, and I cannot see how this can be anything else than a plying for hire.

LUSH, J.—I am also of opinion that this was a plying for hire. It is no longer necessary that the plying should be in a public street or road. The new Act apparently intentionally excludes that condition. Now this carriage was waiting to be hired by passengers who arrived by the railway. Surely this was a plying for hire.

COLEMAN (app.) v. BATHURST (resp.)

Game — Reservation of to the landlord — What amounts to—1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32 (Game Act).

The appellant, who was tenant of a farm under the respondent, as his landlord, entered into an agreement with him that he would not destroy any game, nor keep any hound or other dog destructive thereof, and would at all times at the request of his landlord or his agent forbid any person or persons hunting, shooting, coursing, fishing, or trespassing on the said farm, or any part thereof, and would endeavour to the utmost of his power to preserve all game bred and being thereon. The appellant having killed certain game upon the said farm, and being proceeded against under sect. 12 of the 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32 (the Game Act):

Held (per Cockburn, C.J. and Mellor, J., Lush, J. dissentiente), that the agreement did not amount to a reservation of the game to the respondent, and that the conviction of the appellant was therefore erroneous.

1. AT a petty sessions, holden at Salisbury in and for the Salisbury and Amesbury division of the county of Wilts, on the 20th Sept. 1870, an information preferred by Sir Frederick Hutchinson Hervey Bathurst, Bart., hereinafter called the respondent, against John Coleman, hereinafter called the appellant, under sect. 12 of the Act 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, charging for that he the said John Coleman, on the 15th Sept. 1870, in the liberty of Clarendon Park, in the said county of Wilts (he being the occupier of certain land there situate), the right of killing the game upon such land being reserved by his landlord (the said Sir Frederick Hutchinson Harvey Bathurst, Bart.), did then and there unlawfully kill upon such land certain game, to wit, five hares, contrary to the statute in that case made and provided, whereby and by force of the statute the said John Coleman had forfeited a sum of money not exceeding 2*l.*, and for every head of game so killed such sum of money not exceeding 1*l.*, was heard and determined by us, the said parties respectively being then present by their respective attorneys, and upon such hearing the appellant was duly convicted before us of the said offence, and we adjudged him to pay for the said offence the sum of 2*l.*, and the further sum of 1*l.* each for four head of game proved to have been killed by him.

2. And whereas the appellant being dissatisfied with our determination upon the hearing of the said information, as being erroneous in point of law, hath, pursuant to sect. 2 of the said statute (20 & 21 Vict. c. 43), duly applied to us in writing to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and the grounds of such our determination as aforesaid for the opinion of this court, and hath duly entered into a recognisance as required by the said statute in that behalf; now therefore we, the said justices, in compliance with the said application and the provision of the said statute, do hereby state and sign the following case.

3. Upon the hearing of the information it was proved that the appellant was tenant to the respondent of a farm called Rangers Lodge Farm, situate within the liberty of Clarendon, in the county of Wilts, under the terms and conditions of an unstamped written agreement, a copy of which, signed by the attorneys of the respective parties, is annexed to this case. A duplicate of the said agreement, signed by the agent of the respondent, was delivered to and is in the possession of the appellant.

4. The respondent's attorney tendered the said agreement in evidence, but its reception was objected to by the appellant's attorney, on the ground that it was not stamped. The respondent's attorney contended that the said information was a criminal proceeding within sect. 27 of the statute 17 & 18 Vict. c. 83, and that the said agreement was therefore admissible in evidence, although it was not stamped. He also offered to pay the penalty and duty on the said agreement in case we were of opinion that the same was not admissible in evidence unless duly stamped. We admitted the said agreement although not stamped, and without payment of the duty or penalty.

5. The respondent's gamekeeper proved that he had known the farm in question for the last six years, during the whole of which time the respondent had exercised the exclusive right of shooting over it. The appellant's attorney objected to this evidence being received.

6. It was also proved that on the 15th Sept. 1870, the appellant shot four hares on the said farm called Rangers Lodge Farm, and that when he was accosted by the respondent's keepers, the said four hares and a fifth also, with a rabbit, were in the appellant's possession, and that he asserted at the time that he had a right to kill game, on the ground that he had taken out a game certificate, and expressed his intention of continuing to do so.

7. It was contended by the appellant's attorney that the exclusive right to the game had not been reserved by the said agreement to the respondent.

8. A majority of the bench were of opinion—first, that the said information was in a criminal proceeding within the meaning of sect. 27 of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 83, and that therefore the said agreement was admissible in evidence, although not stamped; secondly, that on a true construction of the said agreement the game on the said farm was reserved to the respondent, and we gave our determination against the appellant in the manner before stated.

9. The questions of law arising on the above statement for the opinion of this court are, first, whether the agreement was, under the circumstances herein stated, legally admissible in evidence without being stamped; secondly, whether, upon a true construction of the said agreement, the game was reserved to the respondent.

10. If the court should be of opinion that the said conviction was legally and properly made, and the appellant is liable as aforesaid, then the said conviction is to stand; but if the court should be of opinion that the game was reserved by the said agreement to the respondent, but that the said agreement being unstamped was not legally admissible in evidence, the respondent is to be at liberty to stamp the said agreement, and thereupon the conviction is to stand. But if the court should be of opinion that the game was not reserved by the said agreement to the respondent, then the said conviction is to be null and void.

Given under our hands this 22nd Nov. 1870, at Salisbury, in the county aforesaid.

For selves and fellow justices, RADNOR.
EDW. HUXMAN.
C. R. SMITH.

The agreement referred to was as follows:—

Memorandum of agreement made and entered into this 24th May 1864, between Sir Frederick Hutchinson Hervey Bathurst, of Clarendon-park, in the county of Wilts, baronet, by John Hayward, his agent of the one part, and John Coleman, of Salisbury, in the said county of Wilts, veterinary surgeon, of the other part, whereby the said John Hayward agrees to let and the said John Coleman agrees to take and rent from the 29th Sept. now next ensuing, all that farm called Rangers Lodge Farm, situate within the liberty of Clarendon in the county of Wilts, &c. (The usual covenants were contained therein, and amongst others the following), "And the said John Coleman also hereby further agrees that he will not destroy any game nor keep any hound or other dog destructive thereof, and will at all times at the request of the said Sir Frederick Hutchinson Hervey Bathurst or his agent forbid any person or persons hunting, shooting, coursing, fishing, or trespassing on the said farm, or any part thereof, and will endeavour to the utmost of his power to preserve all game bred and being thereon.

By sect. 12 of the 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32 (The Game Act) it is enacted:

That where the right of killing the game upon any land is by this Act given to any lessor or landlord in exclusion of the right of the occupier of such land, or where such exclusive right hath been, or shall be specially reserved or granted to, or doth or shall belong to the lessor, landlord, or any person whatsoever other than the occupier of such land, then and in every such case, if the occupier of such land shall pursue, kill, or take any game upon such land, or shall give permission to any other person so to do, without the authority of the lessor, landlord, or other person having the right of killing the game upon such land, such occupier shall, on conviction before two justices of the peace, forfeit and pay for such pursuit such sum of money not exceeding 2*l*., &c.

Metcalfe appeared for the appellant.—Upon a true construction of the agreement it cannot be said that the game was reserved to the respondent. The appellant merely agreed not to destroy the game.

Lopes, Q. C. (Bromley with him) was called upon.—The agreement must be taken as reserving the game to the landlord—no particular form of words is necessary; the agreement really has no meaning unless it was meant to reserve the game to the landlord. The tenant has covenanted not to kill it, then for whom is it reserved? [MELLOR, J.—Primâ facie the game belongs to the tenant; and it is for you to show that it belongs to some one else. It might well be that the tenant might undertake to preserve the game without its being in any one else.] How can it be said to be in him when he undertakes not to destroy it, and to do all he can to prevent others from destroying it? [COCKBURN, C. J.—The landlord has stipulated that as long as the lease continues the tenant shall not kill the game; the game is not reserved to him. The right is, in fact, reserved to no one. The landlord has no right to go upon the land. MELLOR, J.—He merely disables the tenant from killing, he does not reserve the game to himself.] The intention of the parties is very clear; it was undoubtedly that the game should not be the tenant's, but his landlord's.

COCKBURN, C. J.—Although the case is not free from doubt, I must say that I do not think that this agreement is sufficient to bring it within the 12th section. The agreement prevents the tenant from killing game, and he certainly commits a breach of that agreement by doing so, for which an action would lie. But the question is, does the agreement bring the case within the 12th section of the Game Act? [His Lordship here read the section.] Now this agreement stipulates that the tenant shall not kill or destroy the game; but it does not go on to give the game to the landlord, or to any other person. It would seem as though the right to the game were in abeyance. The right is incident to the soil, unless there be a stipulation that the tenant is not to have it. I think in this case that the stipulation does not give the game to the landlord, and so, that he has no right to go upon the land to kill it. I think that there should be something more than an absence of a right in the tenant to kill game to bring it within the 12th section. It must be remembered that it is sought to charge this not as a civil, but a criminal offence.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. The only question is, whether game is by this agreement reserved to the landlord? I think that the person who drew up this agreement must have been under the impression that the game in the first instance belonged to the landlord, for all the stipulations seem to point in that direction. It seems to me that this stipulation is nothing more than an engagement to preserve the game, and not to give it to the landlord. The landlord's remedy is an action for a breach of contract. I think the landlord has not reserved the game to himself. If we were to hold that this agreement amounted to a reservation, we should be interpreting words beyond their natural meaning.

LUSH, J.—I am sorry that I cannot concur with the rest of the court, for I am of opinion that this agreement does reserve the game to the landlord. I think we should construe the 12th section as though this were a civil action for a trespass. [His Lordship here read the section.] Now, under what circumstances does the game go to the landlord? For that we must refer to the 8th section. The language of that section shows that the word "reservation" is not to be taken in any merely technical sense, but that the reservation may be any agreement by which the landlord, and not the tenant, is to have the game. We must see what is the real meaning of the agreement. The tenant binds himself that he will not destroy the game nor keep any hound or other dog destructive thereof, and will at all times, at the request of the said Sir Frederick Bathurst, or his agent, forbid any person or persons hunting, shooting, coursing, fishing, or trespassing on the said farm or any part thereof, and will endeavour to the utmost of his power to preserve all game bred and being thereon. Now, it is true that it does not go on and say in words that he will reserve the game for the landlord, or that the landlord should have the game; but I cannot see what the agreement is for, if the game is not reserved to the landlord.

Beer-house — Application for a certificate — Old licence—Forfeiture of—New application for a certificate—Refusal.

Although, by virtue of sect. 19 of the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 27, justices cannot refuse to grant a certificate in respect of a house which was licensed on the 1*st May* 1869, except for one of the causes mentioned in sect. 8, yet if the licence has been actually forfeited, they may treat a subsequent application for a certificate as an original application, and may exercise a discretion in refusing it.

The house of the appellant had an existing licence on the 1*st May* 1869, but at the licensing meeting in the following August the said licence was lost on account of the personal misconduct of the then tenant. At the licensing meeting in Aug. 1870 the present appellant applied for a certificate, which was refused, on the ground that he had not shown the necessity for such a house in the neighbourhood:

Held, that the magistrates were justified in treating such application as an original one, and in exercising their discretion in refusing it.

At the general annual licensing meeting and special sessions for granting licences to keepers of inns, alehouses, and victualling houses in England, holden at Bradford, in and for the borough of Bradford, in the county of York, on the 30th Aug. 1870, the said John Hargreaves, hereinafter called the appellant, applied for a certificate under 32 & 33 Vict. c. 27, for the sale of beer to be consumed on the premises, at a certain house in the said borough, known by the name of the "Turk's Head." It was proved in evidence on the part of the appellant that on the 1st May 1869 a licence was in force in respect to the said house for the sale by retail therein of beer to be consumed on the premises, which said licence was on account of the personal misconduct of a former occupier lost at the Brewster Sessions, held in the month of Aug. 1869, and that the appellant and the said house, in respect of which he applied, were duly qualified as by law is required. The justices were satisfied with the evidence produced on the part of the appellant of his good character, and no evidence was offered, nor was it proved that the said house or any adjacent house or shop owned or occupied by the appellant was of a disorderly character, or frequented by thieves, prostitutes, or persons of bad character, nor that the applicant having previously held a licence had forfeited it for his misconduct, or that he had through misconduct at any time previously been adjudged disqualified from receiving any such licence, or from selling any beer, cider, or wine, and no evidence was offered on the part of the appellant showing the necessity of a house licensed to sell beer on the premises in the neighbourhood. But upon the hearing of the application, the justices refused to grant the certificate as applied for, and the appellant gave notice of appeal on the following grounds:

1. That I am aggrieved by the said decision which you have come to, and that the authority or certificate to the said house, situate in Birksland-street, in New Leeds, in the township and borough of Bradford aforesaid (and formerly kept as a beerhouse, and called the Turk's Head Inn beerhouse), should have been granted to me at the said general licensing meeting.
2. That your refusal to grant the said authority or certificate was contrary to law.
3. That there was no valid reason to warrant your refusal to grant the said authority or certificate.
4. That I, as a matter of right and of law, was legally entitled to require that the said authority or certificate should be granted to me.
5. That no sufficient ground was alleged by you for refusing to grant the said authority or certificate.
6. That the said decision which you came to in respect of my said authority or certificate is arbitrary, unjust, and unfair, and not impartial.
7. That the decision, order, or determination which you came to in respect of the granting of the said authority, certificate, or licence to the said house, situate in Birksland-street, in New Leeds, in the township and borough of Bradford aforesaid, at the said general annual licensing meeting, is illegal, and contrary to the spirit and tenor of the several statutes in that case made and provided.
8. That I was entitled to such authority or certificate according to the evidence I adduced before you.
9. That your refusal to grant the said authority or certificate was contrary to the evidence.
10. That in refusing to grant authority or certificate, you acted under certain erroneous impressions which should not be entertained in adjudicating upon matters at a general annual licensing meeting.

An order of a judge was then obtained under sect. 11 of the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, that the facts should be stated in the form of a special case for the opinion of this court, which case was stated as follows:

It is contended on the part of the appellant that as he produced satisfactory evidence of his good character, that as it was not proved that the house in respect of which he applied, or any adjacent house or shop was of a disorderly character, or frequented by thieves, prostitutes, or persons of bad character, or that the appellant had forfeited a previous licence for misconduct, or had through misconduct been previously adjudged disqualified from receiving any licence, or from selling beer, cider, or wine, and that as he the appellant proved that he and the house in respect of which he applied, were duly qualified as by law is required, and that on the 1st May 1869 a licence was in force with respect to the said house for the sale by retail of beer to be consumed on the premises, it was not lawful for the justices to refuse his application for a certificate, and that such house, so long as it is duly qualified as by law is required, and is not frequented by persons of bad character, but is occupied by an owner with whose character the justices are satisfied, has a vested interest in such certificate; which contention is disputed by the respondents, who allege that, as during the latter part of the year 1869, and the first part of the year 1870, a licence was not in force in respect of the said house, they were authorised in considering the application for a certificate by the appellant as an original one, and in requiring the appellant, on applying for a certificate, to satisfy them of the necessity for such a licensed house in the neighbourhood.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether it was lawful for the justices to refuse an application for a certificate, it having been proved that a licence was in force in respect of the said house on the 1st May 1869, and the grounds specified in sect. 8 of the statute 32 & 33 Vict. c. 27, having been disposed of to their satisfaction.

By sect. 19 of the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 27, it is enacted that—

Where on the 1st May 1869 a licence under any of the recited Acts is in force with respect to any house or shop for the sale by retail therein of beer, cider, or wine, to be consumed on the premises, it shall not be lawful for the justices to refuse an application for a certificate for the sale of beer, cider, or wine, to be consumed on the premises, in respect of such house or shop, except upon one or more of the grounds upon which an application for a certificate under this Act in respect of a licence for the sale of beer, cider, or wine, not to be consumed on the premises, may be refused in accordance with this Act: Provided that, where a person licensed in respect of such house or shop to sell therein by retail beer, cider, or wine, to be consumed on the premises, is convicted after the passing of this Act of more than one offence against the tenor of his licence, or of more than one offence for which any penalty is imposed by any of the said recited Acts, the justices by whom such person is convicted may, if they think fit, order that the house or shop shall for the purposes of this section be thenceforth deemed to be a house or shop in respect of which no licence for the sale by retail of beer, cider, or wine was in force at the time of the passing of this Act, &c.

Hannay appeared for the appellant.—The magistrates were wrong in refusing the certificate, as the house had a licence on the 1st May 1869, and two convictions had not taken place, as mentioned in the proviso of the 19th section. It could not have been the intention of the Legislature that with regard to an old licensed house, if the landlord turns out of possession a tenant who has misconducted himself, the landlord is to forfeit the advantage of the licence, though he himself may take possession and seek for a renewal of the certificate. [LUSH, J.—The case states that the licence was lost. How was it lost by the former tenant?] That does not appear. The case merely states that the licence was lost in consequence of the personal misconduct of a former occupier. The Act never intended to prevent the owner from getting a good tenant where there has been a bad one whom he has turned out. The magistrates treated the application of the appellant as an original application. [COCKBURN, C. J.—Does not the 19th section imply that there is an existing licence?] The applicant applied as soon as he had any power to do so. He had first to turn out the tenant who had misconducted himself. [COCKBURN, C. J.—The section surely applies only to the renewal of licences. Can it be said that this was an application for a renewal when a twelvemonth had elapsed for the refusal to renew the former certificate?] The object of the Legislature was to protect the interests of old licensed houses. In Reg. v. The Justices of Lancashire (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 461), Lush, J., in giving judgment, says: "When on the 1st May 1869 a licence is in force with respect to any house, for the sale by retail of beer to be consumed upon the premises, it shall not be lawful to refuse an application for a certificate for the sale of beer to be consumed on the premises, except on one or more of the grounds upon which a licence to sell beer, to be consumed off the premises, may be refused." In the present case there was no objection whatever to the appellant, but the magistrates chose to treat the application as though the house had never had a licence.

Campbell Foster, for the respondents, was stopped by the court.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that the magistrates were right. The house certainly had a licence on the 1st May 1869, and if at the next licensing day an application had been made by the appellant for a certificate, and it had been refused, the magistrates may have been wrong, and they may have been compelled to grant it. It was the intention of the Legislature to put the granting of certificates in the discretion of the magistrates, with this exception, that where the house had a licence on the 1st May 1869, they shall not be at liberty to refuse the certificate, except upon one of the grounds mentioned in the 8th section. The existing licences, therefore, were not to be interfered with except for the cause mentioned. That provision, however, cannot be made to extend to cases where the licence has dropped. In such a case the magistrates have still a discretion to exercise. In the present case the certificate was not renewed in 1869, and when, therefore, the appellant came in 1860 for a renewal of the certificate, the magistrates were justified in treating it has an original application, and in exercising their discretion with respect to the wants of the neighbourhood.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is not disputed that in the case of a new application the magistrates have a discretion as to granting or refusing a certificate. In this case the old licence was forfeited, and was at an end. In the succeeding August another application was made to the magistrates for a certificate. The magistrates, considering this to be a new application, and the wants of the neighbourhood not requiring such a house, they exercised their discretion in refusing the certificate; and in this I think they were justified.

LUSH, J.—I am also of the same opinion. It is clear from the construction of the 19th section that it was not intended that magistrates should put an end to the then existing licences without a cause; but when for any sufficient cause the licence has been put an end to, then they are at liberty upon any fresh application to exercise their discretion.

REGISTRATION APPEAL.

Jan. 20 and April 24, 1871.

ROLLESTON (app.) v. COPE (resp.).

*Vote for a county—Shares in a building society—Value of freehold—*8 Hen. 6 c. 7.

The claimant had, in 1863, conveyed three houses, of which he was owner in fee, to a building society, by way of mortgage, as security for 300*l. advanced to him by the society. He was bound by the deed and the rules to pay monthly instalments of* 3*l.* 9*s. for ten years. He was in actual possession of the property and had paid* 350*l., which was the whole amount then due. He had two years' payments still to make, but he might redeem the mortgaged property for a present payment of* 73*l.* 1*s.*

The annual value of the houses was 31*l.* 4*s.*

The annual payments by the claimant were 41*l.* 8*s., of which two-thirds was paid in discharge of principal and the remainder as interest upon the advance.*

The revising barrister refused to allow the claim to vote:

Held, that the claimant's interest in these houses was of the value of 40*s. by the year, at the least, above all charges, according to* 8 Hen. 6, c. 7; and that he was therefore entitled to o vote for the county.

Robinson v. Dunkley, 15 C. B., N. S., 478, confirmed.

AT a court holden for the revision of the list of voters for the parish of St. Mary, in the southern division of the county of Leicester, one James Cope duly objected to the name of Benjamin Rolleston being retained on the list of voters for the said parish. The name of Benjamin Rolleston (hereinafter called the claimant) appeared upon the list of voters entitled to vote thus:—

Christian and Surname of the Claimant at full length.	Place of Abode.	Nature of Qualification.	Street, Lane, or other like place in the Parish.
Benjamin Rolleston.	26, Asylum-street.	Freehold houses	71, 73, 75, Asylum-street.

The facts of the case as proved before the revising barrister were as follows:

The claimant, Benjamin Rolleston, is a member of a freehold building society called the Leicester Permanent Benefit Building Society, established under 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, in which society he held three shares.

In the month of February, in the year 1863, the claimant was possessed of three freehold tenements, and was desirous of borrowing the sum of 300*l.* in respect of his said three shares in the said society, and in consideration of the society advancing him that sum, he executed a mortgage in fee of the said freehold tenement to the society to secure the subscriptions, payments, redemption moneys, and fines in relation to the sum of 300*l.* by monthly instalments of 3*l.* 9*s.*, extending over a period of ten years.

The mortgage deed provided that, if during the above mentioned period the mortgagor neglected for four consecutive calendar months to pay all the subscriptions and payments, and to perform the regulations which, on his part as a shareholder and mortgagor, were by the rules of the society directed to be paid and performed, the society should enter into possession of the premises and sell and dispose of them.

The claimant has duly paid all the interest due under the mortgage deed, and has always been and now is in the actual possession of the property.

The periodical payments made by the claimant have amounted to 350*l.* in the whole. The claimant has two years' annual payments still to make, but he may redeem the mortgaged property for a present payment of 73*l.* 1*s.*

The annual value of the freehold tenements is 31*l.* 4*s.*, and the annual payment made to the society is 41*l.* 8*s.* This last-mentioned payment is made generally in reduction of the sum borrowed, and in discharge of the claimant's payments and subscriptions, in accordance with the rules of the said society.

The interest, which is not more than 7 per cent. for the term of years, is capitalised and added to the sum borrowed.

The receipts given by the society to the claimants do not show what sum is received for interest, and what is received for principal, but if the annual payment of 41*l.* 8*s.* were apportioned, two third parts would be paid in discharge of principal, and one third part in payment of the interest.

It was contended on behalf of the claimant that only so much of the annual payment as represented the interest on the loan, as in the case of a common mortgage should be deducted from the annual value, and if this were done, the claimant has a freehold of 40*s.* annual value in the said freehold houses.

It was contended on behalf of the objector, that the whole of the payments to the said society, on whatever account they are made, should be set-off against the annual value of the property, and if this were done, the claimant has not a freehold of 40*s.* annual value in the said tenements.

The Revising Barrister was of opinion, that in accordance with the decided cases, the whole amount of the payments to the society was a charge upon the estate, and should be deducted from the annual value thereof, and that such deduction reduced the value of the estate below 40*s.*, and he erased the name of the claimant off the list of voters.

Other appeals were consolidated.

If the court should be of opinion that only so much of annual payments as would represent the interest on the loan, as in the case of an ordinary mortgage, should be deducted from the annual value of the claimant's property, then the names of the said B. Rolleston and the other persons mentioned in the schedule, were to be restored to the lists of voters; if otherwise, then their names were to be erased.

J. O. Griffits, for the appellant, argued that as in the case of an ordinary mortgage, the interest only should be considered a charge upon the land—the payment of principal is a mere investment for the benefit of the estate. He cited the cases afterwards reviewed in the judgments of the court.

Quain, Q. C., for the respondent, relied upon the words of the statute 8 Hen. 6, c. 7, and the earlier authorities decided upon this point.

Griffits in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 24.—BOVILL, C. J.—The claimant being a member of and holding shares in a building society, was the owner and in possession of certain freehold houses, in respect of which he claimed to be on the register of county voters. These houses he had conveyed by way of mortgage to the society as security for 300*l.* advanced to him, and by the mortgage-deed and rules of the society, in order to redeem the property, he was bound to pay, during a period of ten years from 1863, to the society monthly instalments of 3*l.* 9*s.* —which amounted to the sum of 41*l.* 8*s.* in each year; and in case of certain defaults the society might enter upon the houses. At the time in question the claimant had paid 350*l.*, and two years remained during which he would have to pay the monthly instalments, or he might then have redeemed the property by a present payment of 73*l.* 10*s.* The annual value of the houses was 31*l.* 4*s.* It was contended for the claimant that only such sum as would be equivalent to interest on the loan ought to be deducted from the annual value to the claimant. The learned revising barrister was of opinion that the whole of the payments ought to be deducted in accordance with two decisions of this court, and he disallowed the claim to vote. The appellant relied upon another and later decision of this court which he contended overruled the two previous cases. The question submitted to us is whether only so much of the annual payments as would represent interest on the loan should be deducted, and upon the result of our opinion on that point this appeal is made to depend. The statute of 8 Hen. 6, c. 7, requires that the voter "shall have free land or tenement to the value of 40*s.* by the year at the least, above all charges," and declares that "such as have the greatest number of them that may expend 40*s.* by year and above, as afore is said, shall be returned by the sheriffs of every county knights for the Parliament." The sheriff is also empowered "to examine upon the Evangelists every such chooser how much he may expect by the year;" and the Act declares "that he which cannot expend 40*s.* by year, as afore is said, shall in no wise be chooser." The property therefore must be of the value of 40*s.* a year at the least, above all charges within the meaning of that enactment. The statute 28 Geo. 3, c. 36, s. 6 treats the interest of the voter as one which must be of the value of 40*s.* by the year over and above the interest of any mortgage upon the estate, and also above all outgoings payable in respect of the said estate. Under the provisions of different statutes and ultimately by the Registration Act of 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 74, a person who has mortgaged his estate, but continues in possession, is entitled to the franchise, though his equitable estate must be of the same value that would be requisite if he were still the owner of the legal estate: (see Copland v. Bartlett, 6 C. B. 18; and Barrow v. Buckmaster, 12 C. B. 664.) It has also been decided that expenses incurred in increasing the annual value must be deducted, because they are absolutely necessary in order to produce such value, such as the cost of manuring and cultivating land and the maintenance and repairs of houses and buildings (Hamilton v. Bass, 12 C. B. 631), the cost of collecting rents when such an expense is found to be necessary (Sherlock v. Steward, 7 C. B., N. S., 21), and when the property is let to a tenant the amount of the tenant's rates, if and when the landlord has undertaken to pay them: (Moorhouse v. Gilbertson, 14 C. B. 70.) Other cases have been dicided on the ground that the deductions sought to be made were charges within the meaning of the statute, such as a rentcharge (Copland v. Bartlett 6 C. B. 18, and the cases there cited by Mr. Badeley), and Barrow v. Buckmaster (12 C. B. 664), the yearly interest secured by a mortgage (Moore v. Carisbrooke 12 C. B. 661), and yearly interest actually paid by agreement, where the principal was secured by the mortgage: (Lee v. Hutchinson, 8 C. B. 16.) The same rule I apprehend would apply to the case of annuities or other annual sums charged upon the property; but, in the case of an ordinary mortgage it has never been supposed that the whole principal money must be deducted in the year when it is due or becomes payable. There are also three important cases directly bearing upon the present question, and each of them decided with reference to building societies. The first is the case of Copland v. Bartlett, where the claimant, being a member of a building society, had obtained a conveyance of the property, and had executed a mortgage to the trustees. The amount of the purchase money secured was 65*l.*, and the claimant was bound by the mortgage deed to pay 15*s.* a month (equal to 9*l.* a year); whilst the annual value of the property was only 8*l.*, but if only interest on the 65*l.* was to be deducted there would have been a clear yearly value of 40*s.* This court decided that these monthly payments were a charge upon the property, and that they must be taken into account in ascertaining the annual value, and so they reduced the annual value below 40*s.*; the vote was disallowed. The next case was Beamish v. Stoke (11 C. B. 29). The annual value of the property there, was 6*l.*, and it was mortgaged to the trustees of the building society; the amount due upon the mortgage for principal was 47*l.* 10*s.* 3*d.*, and the payment which the claimant was bound to make of 4*s.* 6*d.* weekly on account of principal and interest amounted to 11*l.* 14*s.* per annum. This sum was apportioned by the secretary as follows: namely 8*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.* in part liquidation of the principal of the mortgage debt; 6*s.* for incidental expenses of working the society; and 2*l.* 10*s.* for premium or interest on the principal remaining unpaid. It was not disputed that the 6*s.* and the 2*l.* 10*s.* should be deducted, and the only question submitted to the court was whether the payment in part liquidation of the principal ought to be deducted in ascertaining the annual value. The court decided that the whole of these weekly payments constituted a charge upon the property, and must be deducted, notwithstanding a part of them was made for repayment of the principal.

The last of the three cases is Robinson v. Dunkley, which came before this court in 1863, and is reported in 15 C. B., N. S., 478. In that case the claimant, who was a member of a building society, had executed a mortgage to them. The amount advanced in the first instance was 73*l.* and he was bound to make monthly payments amounting in the whole to 4*l.* per annum. The property was of the value of 3*l.* per annum. On the 31st Jan. preceding the registration he had paid the whole amount owing by him with the exception of 2*l.* This sum would be payable by him by monthly payments during the following six months, and was in fact paid by the month of July. The revising barrister expressly found as a fact that the 71*l.*, having been paid before the 31st Jan., and the remaining 2*l.* by July, the claimant had a freehold prior to the 31st Jan. of the value of 40*s.* per annum, and, therefore, he retained his name on the list of voters. This case was decided in favour of the respondent on the appeal. It was contended before us that this latter case was at variance with the previous decisions, and virtually overruled them. It is difficult to reconcile those decisions, and still more difficult to distinguish the present case in principle from Robinson v. Dunkley. The question is, no doubt, involved in much doubt, and but for the decision in the last case, I should have had no hesitation in acting as the revising barrister has done in this case upon the authority of Copland v. Bartlett and Beamish v. Stoke, and upon the reasons of the very learned and eminent judges who decided those cases. The later case, however, of Robinson v. Dunkley having been decided, I think it is better to abide by that decision; there are also strong arguments in support of it, and applying it to the present case, the result will be that, the payments made by the claimant representing a greater value than 40*s.* a year, the decision of the revising barrister must be reversed, and the claim to vote allowed. The question in these cases in future for the revising barrister to consider will be whether taking the payments which have been made for principal or purchase-money into account, and deducting the proper annual sums independently of the payments on account of principal, the claimant's interest in the property is of the value of 40*s.* by the year. If his interest in the property be found to be of that value he will be entitled to the franchise, otherwise his claim to be placed on the list of voters must be disallowed.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. This case ought to be decided according to the construction of the statutes and their application to the substantial interest of the mortgagor, not his dry legal as distinguished from his equitable estate. The statute of Hen. 6 would exclude him from the franchise, because of his not having the legal estate. The subsequent statutes have corrected this, and the effect of them is to treat the mortgagor as having the freehold subject to a charge of the principal money, or so much as remains unpaid, and of the interest. In an ordinary mortgage, payment of the principal may be enforced at any time after the day it falls due, but no regard is paid to that incumbrance provided that the statute of Hen. 6 is in other respects satisfied. To satisfy that statute two conditions must be fulfilled. First, the land must be freehold to the annual value of 40*s.* at the least above all charges, in the original "outre les reprises," a term never applied that I can find to a payment which redounds to the permanent benefit of the owner of the land, as building a house or the like, but only to such payments as rentcharges, ordinary repairs, and taxes, and by analogy to interest, the payment of which, once made, is so much spent and gone, neither enjoyed by nor invested for the owner or mortgagor; secondly, the voter must be able to spend—that is, have for his own benefit, 40*s.* by the year. It follows, therefore, that to vote in respect of an equity of redemption, first, that estate must be of the value of 40*s.* by the year; and, secondly, the voter must have in respect thereof a present benefit or capacity of benefit of 40*s.* by the year. If the land is mortgaged up to its full value, or to such an amount that the equity of redemption is not worth the purchase of 40*s.* a year, the first condition is not fulfilled. This was the case supposed by Wilde, C.J., in Copland v. Bartlett (6 C. B. 23) when he asked "How was the right to vote formerly dealt with where the property in respect of which the vote was claimed was charged up to the full value? My impression is that the vote was never allowed." And the same opinion was expressed by Jervis, C.J., in Beamish v. Stoke (11 C. B. 37), when he said "The case does not find that that which the party has already paid towards the purchase-money is worth 40*s.* a year in perpetuity:" and Maule, J. said "Suppose a man agreed to stand in the claimant's shoes, would it be worth his while to give 40*s.* a year for his interest in the land?" This consideration was sufficient for the decision of those cases, which, though they raised and decided the question whether principal could be deducted, did so upon statements of fact not showing that the principal paid had created an interest worth 40*s.* a year beyond repairs. Between those cases and the present, there are striking and cardinal differences of fact. No doubt expressions were used by the judges indicating an opinion that the payments on account of the principal were to be considered as charges, which unquestionably they were in one sense, viz., that unless enough had been paid on account of principal to make the equity of redemption worth the purchase of a perpetual 40*s.* a year, there was nothing to satisfy the first conditions in the statute. The concurrence of V. Williams, J., in Robinson v. Dunkley (15 C. B., N. S., 478), is conclusive as to the true scope of the authority. In the present case both conditions are fulfilled, The mortgage is for 300*l.*, principal to be repaid with interest in ten years by instalments of 3*l.* 9*s.* a month, making 41*l.* 8*s.* a year, or, in all, 414*l.*, so that the proportion of principal to interest is ascertained by the deed, and it is found as a fact. The property can, in fact, be redeemed for a present payment of 73*l.* 10*s.*, the payments remaining to be made, if paid as to-day, amounting to 82*l.* 16*s.* The amount of value above all charges, except the mortgage, is 31*l.* 10*s.*, so that the equity of redemption, if sold at the ridiculously low price of five years' purchase, would produce a sum sufficient to pay off the whole remaining charges, and leave a balance which, if invested in Consols, would produce more than 40*s.* a year. Why? for this simple reason, because the payments made by the mortgagor were not all "reprises," but to the extent of the two-thirds, or thereabouts, paid (and found by the case to have been paid) on account of principal, they were investments, and permanently beneficial investments, by and for the mortgagor, as much, or rather more, than if he had paid them into his bankers, to be ready for the mortgagee when he chose to call for his money. Each of those payments was a purchase for the mortgagor of so much of the mortgage interest in the land, and each of them added to the value of the mortgagor's estate, now accrues to his benefit. Each of them was therefore "expended" by and for him, each would, in a properly kept account, go to investment of capital, and would not be mere outgoings; that is not if there was a "reprise" in the proper sense of something taken back for the mere temporary use of the land. As for the payments being pre-appointed to be made on certain days, this cannot alter their judicial character. The payment of the principal is invariably pre-appointed for some day. It is for the convenience of the parties, not to alter the relation between them, that several days are mentioned instead of one. It follows from what has been said, that the second condition of the statute Hen. 6, c. 7, as modified by the subsequent Acts giving the franchise to a mortgagor, is also complied with, because, deducting from 41*l.* 8*s.* the two-thirds which the case finds to be referable to principal, there remains 13*l.* 16*s.*, which, deducted from 31*l.* 10*s.* leaves a clear substantial present annual income of 17*l.* 14*s.* In effect and substance the claimant has a freehold worth, at twenty years' purchase, 630*l.*, less 73*l.* 10*s.* 557*l.* 10*s.*, and deducting out of the two years' payments that remain, which can properly be called "reprises," he can expend 17*l.* 14*s.* by the year. Thus, both upon the reason of the matter, and according to the distinct authority of Erle, C. J., and his companions in Robinson v. Dunkley (15 C. B., N. S., 478), the decision against the right to vote was wrong, and ought to be reversed.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion, and in consequence of the previous decision in this court I desire to add the reasons for my judgment. The claimant, who is the appellant, being seised in fee of land and houses, mortgaged them by a deed dated the 12th Feb. 1863, to the Leicester Building Society to secure 300*l.*, advanced by the society on three shares held by the claimant as a member of the society, to be repaid with capitalised interest, in ten years by monthly payments of 3*l.* 9*s.* The mortgage was in fee, subject to a proviso for redemption upon payment by the claimant during ten years of the subscription, redemption moneys, and fines, payable by him in respect of his three shares, according to the rules of the society, and certain tables annexed to them; and the deed provided that when the 300*l.* and all other payments should have been satisfied, the security should be in a certain prescribed manner discharged. A power was contained in the deed enabling the trustees, in case of default in the payment of the instalments, to take possession of the property and sell the same to satisfy what might be due on the security. The case finds that the claimant has always been in the actual possession of the property, that he has kept up the payment of all his instalments, having paid in all 350*l.*, and that he was entitled to redeem the property by a present payment of 73*l.* It is also found that the annual value of the property is 31*l.* 4*s.* The revising barrister further finds, which the mortgage deed and rules enable him to do, that the interest which is not more than 7 per cent., is capitalised for the whole term, and added to the sum borrowed, and that although no apportionment is made in form, yet if the monthly instalments, which amount to the annual payment of 41*l.* 8*s.*, were apportioned, two-thirds of it would be paid in discharge of principal, and one-third only in payment of interest. It is obvious from these findings that in substance two-thirds of the annual payment of 41*l.* 8*s.*, viz., 27*l.* 12*s.* goes in every year to reduce the principal, and so to increase the beneficial interest of the claimant in the estate, and that one-third viz., 13*l.* 16*s.* only is attributable to interest, and that this latter sum when deducted from 31*l.* 4*s.*, the annual value of the property, leaves 17*l.* 8*s.*, as the clear beneficial annual value of the estate to the claimant. The revising barrister held in accordance with what he considered to be the effect of the decided cases, that the whole amount of the payments to the society was a charge upon the estate, and should be deducted from the annual value, and that as this deduction would reduce such value below 40*s.*, the name of the claimant should be erased from the list of voters. But, on the other hand, he found, as the fact undoubtedly is, that if so much only of the annual payments as represented the interest on the loan ought to be deducted from the annual value, then the claimant had a freehold of the annual value of 40*s.*; and if this court should hold that this was the proper deduction, he declared that the name of the claimant was to be restored to the list. It appears to me that this last declaration of the revising barrister ought to prevail, for on the above facts and findings I come to the conclusion that the claimant has a freehold of the value of more than 40*s.* by the year above all charges. The question to be decided is whether so much of the above annual payment as represents the repayment of the principal of the mortgage debt is a charge within the meaning of the statute 8 Hen. 6, to be deducted from the annual value of the freehold. The 8 Hen. 6, c. 7, requires the voter to "have free land or tenement to the value of 40*s.* by the year above all charges" (outre les reprises). The 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 74 (after reciting 2 Will. 4, c. 45, ss. 23 and 26), enacts that "No mortgagee of any lands or tenements shall have any vote" . . . . "for or by reason of any mortgage estate therein, unless he be in the actual possession or receipt of the rents and profits thereof, but that the mortgagor in actual possession or in receipt of the rents and profits thereof shall and may vote for the same, notwithstanding such mortgage." These are the statutes to be expounded. The statute 6 Vict. expressly enacts that a mortgagor in possession shall vote notwithstanding the mortgage, and as a consequence notwithstanding the mortgage debt. It has been settled, and, although at one time much questioned, it is not now disputed, that the interest of the mortgage debt is a charge to be deducted from the annual value of the land. It was so decided by several election committees (see the cases collected in Rogers on Elections). The Act 28 Geo. 3, c. 36, s. 6, required a declaration from the voter that he had "an estate of the clear yearly value of 40*l.* over and above the interest of any money secured by mortgage upon the said estate." This enactment, whilst it is a clear statutory declaration that the interest on a mortgage debt is to be deducted from the annual value, amounts by necessary implication to an equally clear declaration that the money secured by mortgage, that is, the principal, need not be deducted. If the principal of the mortgage debt were to be deducted in estimating the yearly value of the land, few mortgagors in the year when the principal fell due, or in any future year whilst it remained due, would be entitled to vote, for the principal would in almost all cases exceed the yearly value of the estate. It is clear that this was not the intention of Parliament, for, as I have already observed, it would be opposed to the express enactment of 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 73, that a mortgagor in possession may vote, notwithstanding the mortgage, which, of course, assumes the existence of the mortgage debt. Then can it make a substantial difference that the principal money is to be repaid by periodical instalments, biennial, annual, monthly, or otherwise? It is equally the principal money, and so far from this distinction creating a difference adverse to the right to vote, it surely is in favour of the mortgagor that he is not liable to pay the whole principal at once. If the question had been res integra, I confess I should have felt little hesitation in coming to a conclusion in favour of the claimant, but former decisions of this court undoubtedly occasion some difficulty. In Copland v. Bartlett there was a monthly payment of 15*s*., but the case did not contain any finding to distinguish principal from interest, as the present case does, and the court likened the whole payment to a payment of interest on a mortgage, and so gave judgment against the right to vote. The next case (Lee v. Hutchinson) is not an authority against the respondent. It decided no more than that the interest on the mortgage-money must be deducted from the annual value. The observations made by Jervis, C. J., and Maule, J., on the statute 28 Geo. 3, c. 36, are consistent with a decision in favour of the present claimant. In the case of Beamish v. Stoke, the mortgage-deed provided for a weekly contribution of 4*s*. 6*d*., which, when paid, was appropriated by the secretary to three objects, viz.: first, to payment of interest; secondly, to the mortgagor's share of the incidental expenses of the security; and thirdly, the remainder to reduce the principal. The court, although so much of the payment as was appropriated to interest did not reduce the value below 40*s*., held that, inasmuch as the whole payment did so reduce it, the claimant was not entitled to vote. The judges there said, "that the case was governed by Lee v. Hutchinson, which only followed Copland v. Bartlett." Now, certainly in Lee v. Hutchinson, in which the interest alone exceeded the annual value, the point assumed to have been decided by it did not arise. It may be observed also, that in Beamish v. Stoke, the value of the equity of redemption was not found. In the course of the argument of that case, Jervis, C.J. said, p. 37, "The case does not find that that which the party has already paid towards the purchase money is worth 40*s*. a year in perpetuity." In the present case the facts are found from which it distinctly appears that what the claimant has so paid is worth much more than 40*s*. a year. But whatever may be the true effect of the cases on which I have now commented, I think that the later case of Robinson v. Dunkley has shaken, and in my opinion overthrown, their authority, supposing they are to be construed as the respondent seeks to do. In Robinson v. Dunkley, the society had advanced to the claimant 73*l*., and by his mortgage to the society he was to repay the amount by monthly sums amounting to 4*l*. a year. The deed did not apportion the payment between principal and interest. It appeared that the value of the land was only 3*l*. per annum, and that in the qualifying year the monthly sums were payable, so that if the full amount of them was deducted from such value, a clear 40*s*. did not remain to the voter for that year—but as it also appeared that 71*l*. of the principal had been paid off on Jan. 31, the court held that the revising barrister was right in finding that the claimant had a freehold of the value of 40*s*. per annum, and in retaining his name on the list of voters; inasmuch as, notwithstanding that the annual payment exceeded the annual value for that year, the claimant had a clear beneficial interest in the land, beyond the encumbrance, of more than 40*s*. by the year. It being plain that the monthly payments in the case of Robinson v. Dunkley, would if deducted have reduced the value in the particular year below 40*s*.; it follows that if the case of Copland v. Bartlett was decided on the ground that the whole of these payments are to be deducted from the annual value, whatever may be the value of the equity of redemption, then the decision in the latter case is opposed to that ratio decidendi and overrules it, and if that was not the ratio decidendi in Copland v. Bartlett, then that case is not necessarily in opposition to the rights of the claimant in the present appeal, where the revising barrister has found that after deducting the charge for interest there is an annual value accruing to the mortgagor of more than 40*s*. I own that I can interpret Robinson v. Dunkley in no other way than as a decision that so much of the monthly payment as represents a repayment of principal money did not form a charge on the annual value. It is true that in that case a large amount of the principal money had been paid off, but so long as the whole mortgage debt remaining due does not reduce the value of the equity of redemption below 40*s*. by the year, and the interest does not absorb it, the largeness or smallness of the amount paid off cannot make an essential difference. Treating the question on principle, I confess I can see no distinction between a mortgagor who has to repay the mortgage debt in a single sum, and one who has to repay it by periodical payments, except one in favour of the latter. In substance the latter would be from the nature of things in a sounder position, for he would on payment of each instalment relieve his land of its burden and increase the beneficial value of it, whilst the former was suffering the whole burden to remain upon it, and this anomaly would occur from a contrary view, viz., that a man who had borrowed 100*l*. on his land, payable by instalments, and had paid off 90*l*., would have no vote, whilst the man who borrowed 100*l*., payable in one sum, and had paid off nothing, would be entitled to vote. But in neither case, as it seems to me, can the principal debt be properly deemed a charge on the annual value. It is a charge on the corpus of the estate, and every payment of an instalment of it is so much added to the beneficial interest of the mortgagor. If, indeed, the whole mortgage-debt is so large in proportion to the estate that it would cover the full value of it, or so nearly as not to leave a beneficial interest of the yearly value of 40*s*. to the mortgagor, then there would be an entire failure of such an interest in the freehold as would entitle the mortgagor to a vote. In the present case, the principal debt does not produce this consequence, and, for the reasons above referred to, I think the decision of the revising barrister should be reversed.

BRETT, J.—I agree entirely and absolutely in the judgment given by my brother Willes. I can see no answer to the argument used in that judgment. The only doubt I have had in this case, and I must confess it was a very strong one, was whether the court could be allowed to come to that decision after the cases of Copland v. Bartlett, and Beamish v. Stoke had been accepted for so many years as treating the principal as a necessary part of the case, and after the rights of so many persons had been decided on the faith of that interpretation.

VESTRY OF BERMONDSEY (apps.) v. RAMSAY (resp.)

Metropolis Local Management Acts Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, ss. 77, 96)—"Present or any future owner"—Res judicata.

Sect. 77 of the Metropolis Local Management Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102) makes certain expenses recoverable by a vestry "from the present or any future owner of the property. . . . . either by action at law or in a summary manner before a justice of the peace at the option of the vestry." Sect. 96 of the same Act empowers the vestry to require the payment "either from the owner or from any person who then, or at any time thereafter, occupies the premises," and provides "that such owner or occupier shall be liable to pay the same, and the same shall be recovered in manner authorised by the Act":

Held, that the obligations imposed by the Act, and the remedies given by the Act to enforce them, are independent and cumulative, and the remedies may be resorted to in succession until the charge is satisfied by payment, subject when necessary to the equitable jurisdiction of the court to restrain vexatious actions.

In 1866 the vestry of B., having paved a street, recovered under sect. 77 judgment against S., who at that time was the owner of certain premises abutting on the street, for his proportion of the expenses of such paving. Nothing, however, was ever realised under the judgment, and the vestry never took any steps to enforce it, nor had they issued execution, or registered the judgment in order to charge the premises as against a mortgagee or purchaser. The premises were subsequently bought by H., and the respondent became occupier of them as tenant to H.

Held, that the judgment recovered by the vestry against S. was no bar to an action by the vestry against the respondent in respect of the same proportion of the expenses of such paving, CASE stated by the judge of the Southwark County Court.

1. This is an action brought in the Southwark County Court of Surrey by plaint issued on the 1st Oct. 1869, to recover the sum of 38*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.*, being the proportion of the expense of paving a thoroughfare lately known as St. James-street, but now called Layard-road, in the parish of Bermondsey, under the provisions of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, and the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, and was heard before Charles S. Whitmore, Esq., the judge of the said Southwark County Court of Surrey, on the 11th Nov. 1869, when the following state of facts was found:—

2. The plaintiffs are the vestry of the parish of Bermondsey, in the county of Surrey, and the defendant is the occupier of the premises 7, Layard-road, aforesaid.

3. A notice of the intention of the plaintiffs to pave the said street was served upon John Richardson Soper on the 10th March 1866, he then being the owner of the said premises; and he was required to pay the amount of the estimated proportion of the cost of the work on the 10th April following.

4. The said John Richardson Soper having made default in the payment of his proportion as aforesaid, an action was commenced against him in the Court of Common Pleas for the recovery of the said amount, and judgment was signed in the said action on the 6th Nov. 1866, for the sum of 38*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.* for debt, and 25*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.* costs, but no execution was issued or other proceedings taken thereon. Such judgment was consented to by the said John Richardson Soper on the understanding that it should not be enforced for a certain period, and immediately afterwards the said John Richardson Soper executed a deed of arrangement which was duly registered, but nothing has ever been paid to the plaintiffs under the said deed.

5. Subsequently to the execution of the said deed of arrangement the premises came into the possession of the Rev. John Milner, who was the mortgagee of the said premises.

6. On or about the 24th Oct. 1866, the said Mr. Milner, the mortgagee, sold the said premises to Mr. Thomas Herbert, who is the present owner thereof, and subsequently application was made by the said vestry to Messrs. Morris, Stone, Townson, and Morris, the solicitors for the said J. Herbert, for the payment of the said estimated proportion, but the said vestry were never paid the same, or any part thereof.

7. The said John Milner still retains in his hands a sum of money due and owing to the said John Richardson Soper, greater in amount than the said estimated proportion for which such judgment as aforesaid was recovered against the said J. R. Soper by the said vestry, but the said vestry, as such judgment-creditors have not taken any steps in exercise of the powers vested in them by the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, to attach such debt due to the said judgment-debtor in the hands of the said John Milner.

8. The said vestry never received any notice that the said John Milner retained such sum of money as in paragraph 7 mentioned, nor were the said vestry at any time, before the action commenced against the present defendants, informed thereof by the said John Milner or any person on his behalf, neither did the said facts in any other manner come to the knowledge of the said vestry, previously to the commencement of the said action.

9. The said vestry have never issued any writ of execution under the said judgment against the said premises.

10. On the 15th April 1869, a notice was served on the said Thomas Herbert, the then owner of the premises, requiring him to pay the said sum of 38*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.*, but nothing was ever paid by him, or on his behalf.

11. On the 16th July 1869, a notice was served on the defendant, who was the then occupier of the said premises, pursuant to the 96th section of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, requiring her to pay the said amount of 38*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.*, and further giving her notice not to pay any rent to her landlord without first deducting the said sum of 38*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.*

12. Application was made to the defendant by the plaintiffs to disclose the amount of the rent payable by her in respect of the said premises, but she wholly refused to disclose the same.

Upon the above state of facts judgment was given for the defendant, but on the application of counsel for the plaintiffs the judge of the said Southwark County Court reserved for the opinion of this court the following question: Whether the plaintiffs having proceeded and obtained judgment against a former owner of the said premises for the amount of the proportion of the expenses of paving the said street, and the said judgment being still unsatisfied, and the plaintiffs having taken no proceedings to enforce the same against the said judgment-debtor, and not having issued execution and registered the same in order to charge the said premises as against a mortgagee or purchaser in manner provided by the statues 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38, and 27 & 28 Vict. c. 112, the said plaintiffs are entitled to proceed against a subsequent owner or occupier under the provisions of the said before mentioned Act or Acts for the recovery of the said amount of the proportion of expenses of paving the said street. If the Court of Common Pleas shall be of opinion that the obtaining of the said judgment against the said John Richardson Soper does preclude the plaintiffs from proceeding as above mentioned, then the judgment in favour of the defendant to stand with costs of suit. But it otherwise then the judgment to be entered for the plaintiffs for 38*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.* with costs of suit.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 29.—M. SMITH, J., delivered the judgment of the court (Willes, M. Smith, and Brett, JJ.).—In this appeal from the judge of the Southwark County Court, which was argued before my brothers Willes and Brett and myself, the question is whether an unsatisfied judgment recovered by the vestry for 38*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.*, in respect of the expense of paving a street under the Metropolis Local Management Acts, against a former owner of the tenements occupied by the respondent, as tenant under a succeeding owner, is a bar to an action against the respondent as such occupier. The 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, s. 77, makes such expenses recoverable "from the present or any future owner of the property" . . . . "either by action at law or in a summary manner before a justice of the peace, at the option of the vestry." The 96th section empowers the vestry to require the payment "either from the owner or from any person who then or at any time thereafter occupies the premises," and enacts "that such owner or occupier shall be liable to pay the same, and the same shall be recovered in the manner authorised by the Act." The occupier is only liable under the provisions of the Act to the extent of rent actually due or accruing due after notice, and he is empowered to deduct the payments from his rent. The charge of 38*l.* 5*s.* 4*d.* became payable in 1866, when Soper was owner, and a judgment was obtained in this court against him in an action for that amount on the 6th Nov. 1866. Herbert subsequently became owner, and the respondent occupied the premises as his tenant. It is not contended that under the circumstances stated in the case, the respondent would not as the present occupier be liable to pay the unpaid proportion of the paving rate, unless the judgment recovered against Soper is a bar to an action. The statute 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, for the first time gives a remedy by action to recover those charges. The question therefore to be decided, viz., whether the judgment obtained against the former owner is a bar to the remedy by action against the occupier, is one of the first impression, and it is necessary to ascertain the nature of the obligation imposed by the above-mentioned statute. In the first instance the statute creates a personal obligation on the owner "present or future," and further, to secure the payment, imposes a kind of indirect charge on the land. The 96th section imposes the obligation to pay, and gives the remedy against either the owner or any person who then, "or at any time thereafter, occupies the premises." These obligations, and the remedies given to enforce them, appear to us to be independent and cumulative, and, as a consequence of so holding, we think the remedies may be resorted to in succession until the charge is satisfied by payment, subject when necessary to the equitable jurisdiction exercised by the court to restrain vexatious actions. The obligation is clearly not a joint obligation, and the owner and occupier could not be sued together. And this being so, there is no objection of a technical kind arising from a change of remedy to prevent the occupier being sued after a judgment against the owner. And we see no substantial ground arising from the nature of the obligation according to our interpretation of the statute, to render the judgment alone without satisfaction a good answer. No doubt in the case of a joint liability giving a joint cause of action against several, the recovery of judgment against one of the obligees is a bar to an action against the other: (King v. Hoare 13 M. & W. 494.) But this is not so where the liability is joint and several, or where several parties are independently and collaterally bound by the same obligation. The principle is well expressed by Lord Ellenborough, C. J. in Drake v. Mitchell (3 East, 251). In that case one of these joint covenantors had given a bill of exchange for the debt secured by the covenant, on which bill judgment was recovered, and it was held that this judgment was no bar to an action of covenant against the three. Lord Ellenborough said, "I have always understood the principle of transit in rem judicatam to relate only to the particular cause of action in which the judgment is recovered operating as a change of remedy from its being of a higher nature than before. But a judgment recovered in any form of action is still but a security for the original cause of action, until it be made productive in satisfaction to the party, and, therefore, till then it cannot operate to change any other collateral concurrent remedy which the party may have." In the present case, the judgment recovered against the owner has created a change of remedy quoad him; but we think it does not operate to affect the collateral concurrent remedy against the occupier. The principle is illustrated by the familiar instance of actions against the several parties to a bill of exchange, and by the cases, which have a close analogy to the present, of principals and sureties in which the recovery of judgment against one party is no bar to actions against the other. For these reasons, we think the appellants are entitled to maintain the action, and, consequently, that the judgment given for the defendant must be reversed, and the judgment entered for the plaintiffs, with costs.

Reg. v. Thoman.

Indictment—Malicious injury—Statement of the amount of damage done.

In an indictment under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 51, for maliciously damaging personal property, the damage exceeding 5l., it is not necessary to allege the value of the articles injured, but only that the amount of the damage done to the several articles exceeded 5l. in the aggregate.

Case reserved for the decision of this court.

At the general quarter sessions of the peace holden by adjournment at St. Mary, Newington, in and for the county of Surrey, on Monday, the 6th Feb. 1871, Margareth Thoman was tried and convicted upon the following indictment:—

Surrey.—The jurors for our lady the Queen, upon their oath present, that Margareth Thoman, on the 30th Jan. 1871, in and upon three frocks, six petticoats, one flannel petticoat, one flannel vest, one pinafore, one jacket, one pair of knickerbockers, one flannel night gown, one woollen cape, one sash, one table cloth, one sheet, three hats, and one brooch of the value of twenty pounds, and of the property of Gilbert Alder, unlawfully and maliciously did commit certain damage, injury, and spoil to an amount exceeding five pounds, by unlawfully and maliciously cutting and destroying the same against the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

At the trial the prisoner's counsel objected that the indictment was bad, because the value of the articles damaged was ascribed to them collectively and not individually, and he contended that the value of each class of article ought to have been stated separately.

The court overruled the objection, but reserved the point for the decision of the court for consideration of Crown Cases Reserved.

Judgment upon the prisoner was respited until the decision of such court should be known, and the prisoner was committed to the custody of the governor of the common gaol at Newington, in the said county.

Wm. Frdk. Harrison, Chairman.

Morgan Thomas (Poulter with him) for the prisoner.—By the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97. s. 51, "whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously commit any damage, injury, or spoil upon any real or personal property, &c., to an amount exceeding 5*l*., shall be guilty of a misdemeanor." Value, therefore, is of the essence of the offence, and a value should be put on each article alleged to be injured in the indictment. In Rex v. Forsyth (Rus. & Ry. 274), the prisoner (a bankrupt) was indicted under the Bankruptcy Act for concealing property to the amount of 20*l*., and the value was ascribed to all the articles collectively, and it was held necessary to make out the offence as to every one of the articles. [Martin, B., referred to the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 23, which enacts (inter alia) that no indictment shall be insufficient for want of the statement of the value or price of any matter or thing, or the amount of damage, injury, or spoil in any case where the value or price, or the amount of damage, injury, or spoil is not of the essence of the offence.] That does not apply where value is of the essence of the offence, as in this case. [Bovill, C.J.—The amount of damage is of the essence of the offence here, and not the value of the several articles damaged.] In Reg. v. Williams, (9 Cox Crim. Cas. 338), it was held that damage committed at several times in the aggregate, but not at any one time exceeding 5*l*., will not sustain an indictment under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 51.

Royles, for the prosecution.—The value of the articles damaged is not the essence of the offence, but the amount of the damage done is.

Bovill, C.J.—We are all of opinion that it was not material to allege the value of the several articles in the indictment, but only to allege that the amount of the damage exceeded 5*l*. The conviction must therefore be affirmed.

Conviction affirmed.

Embezzlement—Clerk and servant—Traveller and collector.

The prisoner was employed as traveller to solicit orders, and collect the moneys due on the execution of the orders, and to pay over moneys on the evening of the day when collected, or the day following. The prisoner had no salary, but was paid by commission. The prisoner might get orders when and where he pleased within his district. He was to be exclusively in the employ of the prosecutors, and to give the whole of his time—the whole of every day, to their service:

Held, that the prisoner was a clerk and servant within the Embezzlement Clause, sect. 68 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96.

Case reserved for the decision of this court.

The prisoner was tried before me at the Michaelmas Quarter Sessions of the peace, holden by adjournment at Sheffield, in and for the West Riding of the county of York, on the 28th Nov. 1870, upon an indictment which charged him with having feloniously embezzled several sums of money, the property of Joseph Hall, and another, his masters.

The prosecutors, the said Joseph Hall and Charles Haslehurst Greaves, who carried on business in partnership in Sheffield as brewers and wine and spirit dealers, under the firm of William Greaves and Company, employed the prisoner from 1861 to 1866 as traveller and bookkeeper, at a weekly wage of 15*s*. The prisoner then left the prosecutors' service and took other employment.

About three years after this the prisoner was again engaged by Messrs. Greaves and Company on a fresh agreement. The terms (which were not in writing) are stated in the evidence of Joseph Hall to have been as follows:—

The prisoner was employed as traveller to solicit orders for, and to collect the moneys due on the execution of such orders by the firm, and to pay over to the said Joseph Hall, or to Charles Haslehurst Greaves, or to the clerk at the brewery in Sheffield, the total net amount of the moneys so collected by the prisoner on the evening of the day when such moneys were so received by him, or on the day following, in case the prisoner should then be travelling at a distance from the brewery. In case the prisoner had neither received money nor obtained orders, he was not expected to go to the brewery that day, but when he came there it was his duty to enter in the cash book of the firm the name and address of the customer from whom he had received any money, the amount, the date of the receipt, and the discount allowed (if any) to the customer, and to pay over to the firm the net amount of the money received by him, the discount being deducted. Every three months the prisoner had an account given to him of the various sums then owing by the customers to the firm, and it was the prisoner's duty to deliver these accounts, and apply for payment from the customers on presenting them. In case such accounts were not paid, the firm enforced payment thereof. The prisoner had no authority to retain in his hands moneys belonging to the firm. He had to travel in the town of Sheffield and neighbourhood. His district comprised about six miles round Sheffield, and included the town of Rotherham. He was to be exclusively in the employment of the firm, to whom he was to give the whole of his time—the whole of every day. The prisoner had no salary, but was paid by a commission of 5 per cent. on all orders for goods he obtained for the firm, and an additional 5 per cent. on the amount of cash collected by him on payment by the customers for the goods supplied by the firm on such orders. The firm were to pay to the prisoner his commission every week, but this was not always done with regularity, and the prisoner was not always regular in his attendance at the brewery, and, although the firm complained of his irregularity, they did not discharge him.

It was further stated by Joseph Hall on cross-examination, that the prisoner could get orders when and where he pleased within his district, and that he had to collect money as soon as he could, and as he chose. His duty was to go to both old and new customers of the firm, and to collect money when and where he thought proper; he was not bound by particular orders, he was at liberty to dispose of his time as he pleased, but he was to employ the whole of it in the service of the firm.

It was proved and admitted by the prisoner on 21st Oct. that he had retained in his hands, and had not accounted for, several sums of money which he had received from the firm by virtue of the before-mentioned employment; the three sums charged in the indictment had been received by the prisoner on the 26th May, the 1st June, and 26th Aug. respectively.

During the course of the case the counsel for the prisoner called my attention to Reg. v. Bowers (L. Rep. 1 Cr. Cas. Res. 45; 10 Cox C. C. 250), and at the close of the case for the prosecution it was contended that the prisoner was not a clerk or servant to the prosecutors within the meaning of the statute 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96.

I declined to stop the case, and directed the jury to decide whether the prisoner had been proved by the evidence of Joseph Hall to be a servant to the prosecutors or not. The jury found the prisoner guilty, judgment being respited until the opinion of the Court of Criminal Appeal is pronounced upon the above objection, and defendant is on bail.

The question for the opinion of this honourable court is, whether the prisoner, under the circumstances herein stated, was a clerk or servant to the prosecutors, so as to be liable to be convicted of the crime of embezzlement.

WALTER SPENCER STANHOPE, Chairman.

No counsel appeared to argue for the prisoner.

Forbes, for the prosecution.—The conviction was right. This case is distinguishable from Reg. v. Bowers, where the prisoner was paid by commission, and was at liberty to get orders or not, as he pleased, for in the present case the prisoner was bound to devote the whole of his time to the prosecutors' service. In Reg. v. Turner (22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 278) it was held by Lush, J., that a traveller who was bound to "diligently employ himself in going from town to town in England, Ireland, and Scotland, and soliciting orders for the prosecutor, and who was not without the prosecutor's written consent to take or execute any order for vending or disposing of similar goods to the prosecutors for or on account of himself or any other person, and who was to be paid by commission, and to render weekly accounts, was a clerk or servant within the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 68. [BRAMWELL, B.—The effect of the agreement here is that the prisoner was not to be told how he was to work, but still he was to do it. BLACKBURN, J.—He was a servant to do this kind of work, but might use his own discretion as to the way of doing it.] In Bower's case it was optional with the prisoner whether he got any orders at all. [BOVILL, C.J., referred to Reg. v. Tite (L. & C. 13; 8 Cox Crim. Cas. 458.) A traveller paid by commission and employed to get orders and to receive payments was held to be a clerk or servant, although he was at liberty to receive orders for other persons also. In this case the prisoner was bound to devote the whole of his time to the prosecutors.]

BOVILL, C.J.—The evidence in this case clearly showed that the prisoner was a clerk or servant within the statute. There is nothing in the evidence inconsistent with that relation. Reg. v. Tite conclusively shows that the prisoner was a clerk or servant. The conviction will be affirmed.

Conviction affirmed.

REG. v. TOWNLEY.

Larceny—Animals feræ naturæ.

Rabbits were netted, killed, and placed in a place of deposit, e.g., a ditch, on the land of the owner of the soil on which the rabbits were caught, and some three hours afterwards the poachers came to take them away, one of whom was captured by gamekeepers, who had previously found the rabbits and lay in wait for the poachers,

Held, that this did not amount to larceny.

CASE reserved for the opinion of this Court by Blackburn J.

The prisoner and one George Dunkley were indicted before me at the Northampton Spring Assizes for stealing 126 dead rabbits.

In one count they were laid as the property of William Hollis, in another as being the property of the Queen.

There were also counts for receiving.

It was proved that Selsey-forest is the property of Her Majesty.

An agreement between Mr. Hollis and the Commissioners of the Woods and Forests on behalf of Her Majesty was given in evidence, which I thought amounted in legal effect merely to a licence to Mr. Hollis to kill and take away the game, and that the occupation of the soil and all rights incident thereto remained in the Queen. No point, however, was reserved as to the proof of the property as laid in the indictment.

The evidence showed that Mr. Hollis's keepers, about eight in the morning on the 23rd Sept., discovered 126 dead and newly killed rabbits and about 400 yards of net concealed in a ditch, in the forest, behind a hedge, close to a road passing through the forest.

The rabbits were some in bags and some in bundles, strapped together by the legs, and had evidently been placed there as a place of deposit by those who had netted the rabbits.

The keepers lay in wait, and about a quarter to eleven on the same day Townley and a man, who escaped, came in a cab driven by Dunkley along the road. Townley and the man who escaped left the cab in charge of Dunkley, and came into the forest, and went straight to the ditch where the rabbits were concealed, and began to remove them.

The prisoners were not defended by counsel.

It was contended by the counsel for the prosecution that the rabbits on being killed and reduced into possession by a wrongdoer became the property of the owner of the soil, in this case the Queen (Blades v. Higgs, 32 L. J. 182, C. P.; 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 798, 834); and that even if it was not larceny to kill and carry away the game at once, it was so here, because the killing and carrying away was not one continued act.

1 Hale P. & C. 510, and Lee v. Risdon (7 Taunt. 191) were cited.

The jury, in answer to questions from me, found that the rabbits had been killed by poachers in Selsey-forest, on land in the same occupation and ownership as the spot where they were found hidden.

That Townley removed them, knowing that they had been so killed, but that it was not proved that Dunkley had any such knowledge.

I thereupon directed a verdict of not guilty to be entered as regarded Dunkley, and a verdict of guilty as to Townley, subject to a case for the Court of Criminal Appeal.

It is to be taken as a fact that the poachers had no intention to abandon the wrongful possession of the rabbits which they had acquired by taking them, but placed them in the ditch as a place of deposit till they could conveniently remove them.

The question for the Court is whether on these facts the prisoner was properly convicted of larceny.

The prisoner was admitted to bail.

COLIN BLACKBURN.

No counsel appeared to argue on either side.

BOVILL, C. J.—[After stating the facts.] The first question that arises is as to the nature of the property. Live rabbits are animals feræ naturæ, and are not the subject of absolute property; though at the same time they are a particular species of property ratione soli, or rather the owner of the soil has the right of taking them, and as soon as he has exercised that right they become the absolute property of the owner of the soil. That point was decided in Blades v. Higgs (sup.) as to rabbits; and in Lonsdale v. Rigg (26 L. J. 196, Ex.), as to grouse. In this case the rabbits having been killed on land the property of the Crown, and left dead on the same ground, would therefore in the ordinary course of things have become the property of the Crown. But before a person can become convicted of larceny of a thing attached to the soil, there must not only be a severance of the thing from the soil, but a felonious taking of it also after such severance. Such is the doctrine as applied to stealing trees and fruit therefrom, lead from buildings, fixtures, and minerals. But if the act of taking is continuous with the act of severance, it is not larceny. The case of larceny of animals feræ naturæ stands on the same principle. Where game is killed and falls on another's land, it becomes the property of the owner of the land; but the mere fact that it has fallen on the land of another does not render a person taking it up guilty of larceny, for there must be a severance between the act of killing and the act of taking the game away. In the present case we must take it that the prisoner was one of the poachers, or connected with them. Under these circumstances, we might come to the conclusion that it was a continuous act, and that the poachers netted, killed, packed up, and attempted to carry away the rabbits in one continuous act, and therefore that the prisoner ought not to have been convicted of larceny.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear that if a person kills rabbits, and at the same time carries them away, he is not guilty of larceny. Then, when he kills rabbits and goes and hides them, and comes back to carry them away, can it be said that is larceny? A passage from Hale's P. C. 510—"If a man comes to steal trees, or the lead off a church or house, and sever it, and after about an hour's time or so come and fetch it away, it is felony, because the act is not continuated, but interpolated, and in that interval the property lodgeth in the right owner as a chattel, and so it was argued by the Court of King's Bench, 9 Car. 1, upon an indictment for stealing the lead off Westminster Abbey"—was relied on by the prosecution. There is also a dictum of Gibbs, C.J., to the same effect in Lee v. Risdon (7 Taunt. 191). I am not insensible to the effect of those dicta; but here we must take it as a fact that the poachers had no intention to abandon possession of the rabbits, but put them in the ditch for convenience sake; and I concur in thinking that the true law is that, when the poachers go back for the purpose of taking them away, in continuation of the original intention, it does not amount to larceny.

BRAMWELL, B.—Our decision does not appear to me to be contrary to what Lord Hale and Gibbs, C.J., have said in the passages referred to. If a man, having killed rabbits on the land of another, gets rid of them because he is interrupted, and then goes away and afterwards comes back to remove the rabbits, that is a larceny; and so, if on being pursued he throws them away; and it is difficult to perceive any distinction where the owner of a chattel attached to the freehold finds it on his land severed, and the person who severed afterwards comes and takes it away. It is in those cases so left as to be in the possession of the true owner, and the Act is not as Lord Hale expresses it, continuated. In this case, however, the rabbits were left by the poachers as trespassers in a place of deposit, though it happened to be on the land of the owner; and it is just the same as if they had been taken and left at a public house, or upon the land of a neighbour. If they had been left on the land of a neighbour or at a public house, could it have been said to be larceny? Clearly not; and if not, why it is larceny because the poachers left them in a place of deposit on the owner's own land? It seems to me that the case is not within the dicta of Lord Hale and Gibbs, C. J., but that here the act was continuated, and that there was an asportation by the poachers to a place of deposit, where they remained not in the owner's possession.

BYLES, J.—I cannot say that I have not entertained a doubt in this case; but upon the whole I think that this was not larceny. The wrongful taking of the rabbits was never abandoned by the poachers, for some of the rabbits were in their bags. It could hardly be said that if a poacher dropped a rabbit, that could convert it into larceny, yet that would follow if the conviction were upheld.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. Larceny has always been defined as the taking and carrying away of the goods and chattels of another person; and it was very early settled where the thing taken was not a chattel, as where a tree was cut down and carried away that was not larceny, because the tree was not taken as a chattel out of the owner's possession, and because the severance of tree was accompanied by the taking of it away. The same law applied to fruit, fixtures, minerals, and the like things, and statutes have been passed to make stealing in such cases larceny. Though in the House of Lords, in Blades v. Higgs, it was decided that rabbits killed upon land became the property of the owner of the land, it was expressly said that it did not follow that every poacher is guilty of larceny, because, as Lord Cranworth said, "Wild animals, whilst living, though they are, according to Lord Holt, the property of the owner of the soil on which they are living, are not his personal chattels so as to be the subject of larceny. They partake, while living, of the quality of the soil, and are, like growing fruit, considered as part of the realty. If a man enters my orchard and fills a wheelbarrow with apples, which he has gathered from my trees, he is not guilty of larceny, though he has certainly possessed himself of my property; and the same principle is applicable to wild animals." The principle is as old as 11 Year Book (par. 33), where it is reported that a forester who had cut down and carried away trees could not be arraigned for larceny, though it was a breach of trust; but it was said it would have been a different thing if the lord of the forest had out down the trees and the forester had carried them away, then that would have been larceny. So that in the case of wild animals, if the act of killing and reducing the animals into possession is all one and continuous, the offence is not larceny. The jury have found in this case that the prisoner knew all about the killing of the rabbits, and that they were lying in the ditch. It is clear that during the three hours they were lying there, no one had any physical possession of them, and that they were still left on the owner's soil; but I do not see that that makes any difference. Then there is the statement from Hale's P. C. 510, where it is said that larceny cannot be committed of things that adhere to the freehold, as trees, or lead of a house, or the like, yet that the Court of King's Bench decided that, where a man severed lead from Westminster Abbey, and after about an hour's time came and fetched it away, it was felony, because the act is not continuated but interpolated; and Lord Hale refers to Dalton, c. 103, p. 166. And Gibbs, C. J. expressed the same view very clearly in Lee v. Risdon. Now, if that is to be understood as my brother Bramwell explained, I have no fault to find with it; but if it is to be understood that the mere fact that the chattel by the has been left for a time on the land of the owner, and so has remained the owner's property, and that the person coming to take it away could be convicted of larceny, I cannot agree with it as at present advised. If we are to follow the view taken by my brother Bramwell of these authorities, they do not apply here, for no one could suppose that the poachers ever parted with the possession of the rabbits. I agree that in point of principle it cannot make any difference that the rabbits were left an hour or so in a place of deposit on the owner's land. The passage from Lord Hale may be understood in the way my brother Bramwell has interpreted it, and if so the facts do not bring this case within it.

Conviction quashed.

DRIVER v. THE KINGSTON HIGHWAY BOARD.

District Highway Board—Power of to repair roads in district — Parish adopting Local Government Act 1858 — Effect of on power of board to repair —Ultra vires—Liability of board for materials for repairs supplied to their order—Highway Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 61), ss. 17, 20, 21, 41— Construction.

In Dec. 1865, the defendants (the K. Highway Board), having jurisdiction under the Highway Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 61), over a district comprising, amongst other parishes, the parish of W., advertised for tenders for the supply of materials for repairing the roads in W. in 1866, in answer to which the plaintiff sent in a tender, which was accepted, whereupon a contract for such supply was entered into by him with the defendants. In Jan. 1866 the defendants approved their surveyor's estimate of the approximate amount of expenditure for the several parishes, and by their direction a call of 768*l. was made upon the parish of W., one moiety of which the parish paid in Feb.* 1866, the other moiety, after a dispute as to their liability, being paid by them in 1867.

On the 24th March 1866, the parish of W. passed a resolution, under sect. 41 of the Highway Act 1862, adopting the Local Government Act 1858, and the statutory requirements having been complied with, a notice, signed by the Home Secretary, appeared in the "London Gazette," on the 11*th May* 1866, that at the expiration of two months from the passing of such resolution the said Act of 1858 would have the force of law within the parish of W. On the 26*th July* 1866 the defendants received notice from the local board of the adoption by the latter parish of the Local Government Act 1858.

Up to that date (26*th July* 1866) the defendants continued to repair the W. roads, with materials supplied by the plaintiff to their surveyor's order, just as if W. had not adopted or intended to adopt the Local Government Act 1858, and without being requested by the W. Local Board to do such repairs. The amount of materials supplied by the plaintiff for 1866 exceeded the amount contemplated by the estimate and contract at the beginning of the year; but there was nothing unusual in that fact, inasmuch as for the previous years 1864, 1865, the plaintiff, under contracts similar to the present one, had supplied and been paid by the defendants, for materials so supplied by him, in excess of the amounts estimated for those years.

In an action for goods sold and delivered, &c., the plaintiff sought to recover the price of the materials so supplied by him from the 1*st Jan. to* 26*th July* 1866, which he contended the defendants were liable to pay, inasmuch as he had no notice of W. ceasing to be a member of the K. Highway District, or that he was to discontinue supplying the materials; but, on the contrary, he continued to supply to order, through the surveyor of the defendants, materials which the defendants used, but in any event they were liable to pay him up to the 24*th May, until which date the plaintiff alleged the parish of W. continued to be a member of the K. Highway Board. The defendants denied their liability on the ground that by adopting the Local Government Act* 1858 on the 24*th March, W. thenceforth ceased to form part of the K. Highway District, and the defendants had no longer any power to repair roads in that parish, or to make calls on W. in order to pay the plaintiff; and that the plaintiff could not recover from the defendants for any portion of the materials supplied for W. subsequently to the* 24*th March.*

Upon a special case, stating all the above facts, it was Held by the Court of Exchequer (Martin and Bramwell, BB.), that the plaintiff was entitled to recover from the defendants the whole amount of his claim, and that the defendants had not, in repairing the roads in W. between the 24*th March and the* 24*th May, or between the* 24*th May and the* 26*th July, acted* ultra vires, so as to prevent the plaintiff from recovering the price of the materials so supplied by him during either of those periods:

Per Martin, B.—It is a question of fact; and on the facts stated, the court should find a verdict for the amount claimed as for goods bonâ fide supplied to the order of a person authorised by the defendants to give it, and used for their purposes:

Per Bramwell, B.—The words, "upon such adoption being made," in sect. 41 of the Highway Act 1862, must mean "upon such adoption coming into operation," and therefore the resolution of the parish of W., on the 24*th March, to adopt the Local Government Act* 1858, did not amount to an adoption of it, nor did the parish "cease to form part of the K. Highway District," within that section, until the expiration of two months from such date; and although, on such adoption, the parish ceased to form part of the district, yet it is, by sect. 41, to be "subject to the payment of any contribution due from the parish to the board at the time of such adoption." The defendants, therefore, were bound to repair the W. roads, if not to the end of the year, at least to the extent of the funds they had received for that purpose:

Quære, whether, if fresh funds had been necessary for the repairs after the 24*th May, the board would, under the circumstances, have had power to raise them in the way prescribed by sect.* 21 of the Highway Act 1862.

THIS was an action by the plaintiff to recover 341*l.* 12*s.* 8*d.* for goods sold and delivered, &c., and for work and materials done and provided by the plaintiff for the defendants, and for money due on accounts stated, to which the defendants pleaded never indebted; payment before action; and a set-off; on which plea issue was joined. At the trial before Keating, J., and a special jury, at the spring assizes (1870) for Surrey, at Kingston, a verdict by consent was entered for the plaintiff for the full amount claimed, subject to a reference to a legal arbitrator, to whom the cause and all matters in difference between the parties were referred, with power to the arbitrator to direct the verdict to be entered for the plaintiff or the defendant, as he should think proper, and to state a special case for the opinion of the court as to the whole or part of the claim; and the arbitrator, having entered upon the arbitration, and heard evidence on both sides, made his award in the form of the following

SPECIAL CASE.

1, 2, 3. The plaintiff is a carman and contractor at Wimbledon, and the defendants are the Kingston Highway Board. The Kingston highway district, in the years 1865, 1866, had jurisdiction over seventeen parishes, including the parish of Wimbledon, out of which jurisdiction in the years from 1866 to 1870, five parishes, including Wimbledon, passed as hereinafter mentioned; but during 1864, 1865, and part of 1866, Wimbledon parish formed part of the Kingston Highway Board.

4. John Niblet was surveyor to the said board during the whole of the time, and continued so to the end of the year 1869.

5. On the 30th Nov. 1865, Niblet made a report to the Kingston Highway Board of the estimated amount of materials which would be required for the year 1866 for the repair of the roads in the various parishes of the district. This estimate for Wimbledon parish was as follows:

Mitcham gravel, 800 cubic yards, at 5*s.* 6*d.*, 220*l.*;
Wimbledon ditto, 800 ditto, at 3*s.* 3*d.*, 130*l.*

6. The Kingston Highway Board advertised for tenders for the supply of materials for the repairs of the roads in, amongst other parishes, Wimbledon parish. The plaintiff tendered for Wimbledon parish, and his tender was accepted. A copy of the document containing the specification, form of tender, schedule of prices, and the contract entered into by the plaintiff with the Kingston Highway Board for the supply of 600yds. of Wimbledon gravel, or thereabouts; and 600yds. of Mitcham gravel, or thereabouts, for Wimbledon parish, is annexed to and forms part of this case, and is marked A.

7. The Kingston Highway Board, on the 25th Jan. 1866, expressed their approval of their surveyor's estimate of the approximate amount of expenditure for the several parishes of their district, and directed calls to be made upon the several parishes, and, amongst others, a call of 768*l.* upon the parish of Wimbledon. The parish of Wimbledon paid one moiety of their call in or about Jan. or Feb. 1866.

8. On the 24th March 1866, the parish of Wimbledon, under sect. 41 of the Highway Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 61) passed a resolution adopting the Local Government Act 1858. Wimbledon is a parish containing a population exceeding 3000.

9. A copy of such resolution appeared in the Surrey Comet, which circulates in the parish of Wimbledon, on the 31st March 1866, and 14th April 1866, in the following form:

Wimbledon.

We, George Pollock and Michael Ogden, churchwardens, do hereby give notice that the Local Government Act 1858 was, on the 24th March inst., duly adopted in this parish, by a resolution of the overseers and ratepayers. GEO. F. POLLOCK.

Dated this 26th March 1866. MICHAEL OGDEN.

10. On the 11th May 1866, there appeared in the London Gazette the following notice, signed by the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

Local Government Act 1858.

Notice of adoption of Act by Wimbledon, Surrey.

Whereas the Local Government Act 1858 was duly adopted on the 24th March 1866, by the parish of Wimbledon, in the county of Surrey, and notice of such adoption has been given, and the other requirements of the said Act have been duly complied with, and whereas the period fixed by the said Act, for appeal against the resolution for the adoption of the said Act by such parish, has now expired, and no such appeal has been made, now, therefore, I, as one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, do hereby give notice that the Local Government Act 1858, has been duly adopted within the said parish of Wimbledon, in the county of Surrey, and that, in accordance with the provisions thereof, the said Act will, at the expiration of two months from the date of the passing of the aforesaid resolution, have the force of law within such parish.

Given under my hand this 11th May 1866.

(Signed) G. GREY,
Home Office, Whitehall.

11. On or about the 26th July 1866, the Kingston Highway Board received a letter from Mr. John Sidney Smith, the chairman of the Wimbledon Local Board, giving notice that the parish of Wimbledon had adopted the Local Government Act 1858, and asking the Kingston Highway Board to render their accounts.

12. The Kingston highway board continued to repair the roads in Wimbledon parish up to the 26th July 1866, with materials supplied by the plaintiff to Niblet's order, just as if Wimbledon parish had not adopted, or intended to adopt, the Local Government Act 1858, and without being requested by the Wimbledon Local Board to do such repairs.

13. The plaintiff seeks to recover in the present action the price of the materials so supplied up to the 26th July 1866. The particulars are more specifically set forth in the next paragraph.

14. The plaintiff supplied

Between 1866. Jan. 1 and March 24.	347yds. Mitcham gravel amounting, at 5s. 6d., to	95	8	6
	464yds. Wimbledon gravel at 3s. 3d.	75	8	0
		£170	16	6
Between 1866. Jan. 1 and March 24.	869yds. Mitcham gravel at 5s. 6d.	238	19	6

		£342	3	3
Between May 24 and July 26.	450yds. Mitcham gravel at 5s. 6d.	123	15	0
		£153	0	0

Or, combining the two last-mentioned intervals between

		£	s.	d.

	815yds. Wimbledon gravel at 3s. 3d.	132	8	9
		£495	3	3

The following note was written by the arbitrator in the margin of p. 3 of the draft special case:

I have obtained the amounts between Jan. 1 and March 24 from the highway board book. The other figures are from Mr. Buckston's summary.—L. S.

15. There was nothing unusual in the fact that the materials supplied in 1866 exceeded the amount contemplated by the estimate and contract at the beginning of the year, inasmuch as in the years 1864, 1865, during which the plaintiff had supplied the Kingston Highway Board, as ordered by their surveyor for the repairs of the roads in Wimbledon parish, under contracts substantially similar to that for 1866, the amount actually supplied had exceeded, though not to such an extent as in 1866, the amount estimated and contracted for; and the Kingston Highway Board paid the plaintiff for all the materials so supplied during these years 1864, 1865.

16. The plaintiff also seeks to recover in this action the sums of 4l. 1*s.* for team work done for the Kingston Highway Board, and 5l. 4*s.*, for three years' rent of a store let to the Kingston Highway Board. Copies of the particulars of this claim in respect of these matters, with dates, are annexed to and form part of this case. For the purposes of this case it is to be taken that these particulars are correct, and that the work charged for was done for the store let to the Kingston Highway Board, for the purpose of the repair of the roads in Wimbledon parish.

17. The plaintiff received payments from the Kingston Highway Board, on account of materials supplied for the repairs of the roads in Wimbledon parish in the year 1866, amounting to 227*l.* 14*s.* 3*d.* —viz., 97*l.* 7*s.* 9*d.* on the 22nd Feb., and 130*l.* 6*s.* 6*d.* on the 26th April 1866.

18. The payments so received by him from the board, as will be seen from paragraphs 14 and 17, more than covered his claim for gravel supplied up to 24th March 1866, the day on which the parish of Wimbledon passed their resolution adopting the Local Government Act 1858, as mentioned in paragraph 8.

19. Towards the end of 1866 litigation ensued between the Kingston Highway Board and the Wimbledon Local Board, respecting the second moiety, amounting to 384*l.*, of the call made as in paragraph 7 above mentioned, which second moiety had not been paid by Wimbledon parish, and which that parish declined to pay on the ground that it did not become due till July 1866, after the adoption of the Local Government Act 1858, in Wimbledon parish. Ultimately, in the course of the year 1867, this second moiety was paid to the Kingston Highway Board.

20. The Kingston Highway Board alleged, and still allege, that on taking an account between the Kingston Highway Board and the parish of Wimbledon, the amounts received by the Kingston Highway Board in respect of Wimbledon parish during the whole time of its connection with the Kingston Highway Board did not cover the total expenditure of the Kingston Highway Board in respect of that parish, irrespective of the plaintiff's present claim, to meet which the Kingston Highway Board had therefore no funds; that after the adoption of the Local Government Act 1858 by Wimbledon parish, the Kingston Highway Board had no power to make further calls on Wimbledon parish for the purpose of paying the plaintiff, nor could they make calls on the other parishes remaining in their district for that purpose; that where a parish under the jurisdiction of a highway board adopts the Local Government Act 1858, and thereby becomes exempt from future calls of such highway board, and all debts incurred on behalf of that parish have not been paid, and the highway board has no funds in hand belonging to such parish, the creditor or creditors cannot recover such debt or debts from the highway board at all; and that the local board of Wimbledon ought to pay the plaintiff's claim, inasmuch as the Kingston Highway Board were obliged to repair the roads in Wimbledon parish until they received the notice from the Wimbledon Local Board on the 26th July 1866, mentioned in paragraph 11 of this case. The Local Board of Wimbledon refused to pay, and gave as a reason that they had paid the amount of the rate made by the Kingston Highway Board for the year 1866, which rate they alleged was sufficient to cover the amount actually expended by the Kingston Highway Board on the roads in Wimbledon parish in that year. A copy of a letter of the 13th June 1868, addressed by the clerk of the Kingston Highway Board (Mr. James Bell) by direction of the Kingston Highway Board, to the Secretary of State for the Home Department, and also a copy of a letter of March 1868 from the clerks to the Wimbledon Local Board (Messrs. Batt and Son) to the Home Office, are annexed and form part of this case (Appendix D and E), for the purpose of showing the grounds taken by the two boards, but not for the purpose of showing how the accounts actually stood between the Kingston Highway Board and Wimbledon parish.

21. It is now contended, on behalf of the Kingston Highway Board, that they acted ultra vires, in repairing the roads in Wimbledon parish, after the 24th March 1866; and à fortiori in repairing them after the 24th May 1866; and therefore, that they are not legally liable to pay the plaintiffs for the materials supplied after either of these dates, and that they have no power to raise funds for such a purpose.

22. The plaintiff had no knowledge of the facts stated in paragraphs 5, 7, and 11, nor of the state of the account between the Kingston Highway Board and the parish of Wimbledon, nor was he shown to have had any knowledge of the facts stated in paragraphs 8, 9, and 10.

The first question for the opinion of the court is, whether the Kingston Highway Board acted ultra vires in repairing the roads in Wimbledon parish, during the interval between the 24th March 1866 and the 24th May 1866, so as to prevent the plaintiff from recovering in this action the price of the materials supplied by him as above-mentioned.

The second question is like the first, substituting for the interval therein mentioned the interval between the 24th May and the 26th July 1866.

If the court answers the first question in the negative and the second in the affirmative, the verdict for the plaintiff is to stand; but the damages are to be entered for the sum of 123*l.* 14*s.*; that is to say, the aggregate of the three sums:

and	342	3	3
	351	8	3
Less the sum of	227	14	3
	£123	14	0

If the court answers both questions in the negative, then the verdict for the plaintiff is to stand; but the damages are to be entered for the sum of 276*l.* 14*s.*, that is to say, the aggregate of the three sums

and	495	3	3
	504	8	3

If the court answers both questions in the affirmative, then the verdict for the plaintiff is to stand; but the damages are to be entered at £9 5*s.*, the aggregate of the sums of 4*l.* 1*s.* and 5*l.* 4*s.*

If, according to the answers given to the above questions and the above directions, the damages are entered for any sum beyond the sum of 9*l.* 5*s.*, then the defendants are to pay the plaintiff the costs of this reference and award; but if, on the contrary, the damages are entered for the said sum of 9*l.* 5*s.*, then each party is to pay his or their own costs of the reference, and one moiety of the costs of this award.

The plaintiff's points for argument:—First, that he is entitled to recover the whole amount of his claim, inasmuch as the whole of the gravel supplied by him was so supplied in pursuance of a contract between him and the defendants, and according to the orders and directions of their surveyor, and the whole of such gravel was used by the defendants; secondly, that the plaintiff received no notice from the defendants that the parish of Wimbledon had ceased to be a member of the Kingston Highway Board, and no notice was given by the defendants to the plaintiff to discontinue the supply of gravel for the use of the said parish, after it had ceased to be a member of such board, but the defendants, through their surveyor, still continued to order and direct the supply and delivery of the gravel as if the parish had continued to be a member of the said highway board; thirdly, that in any event, the plaintiff is entitled to the amount claimed to be due to him up to the 24th May 1866, inasmuch as the parish of Wimbledon continued to be a member of the Kingston Highway Board until that date.

The defendant's points for argument—First, that, by passing the resolution to adopt the Local Government Act, the Wimbledon parish, on the 24th March 1866, ceased to form part of the district under the defendant's management; secondly, that the defendants could not, after the 24th March

1866, repair or cause to be repaired any roads in Wimbledon parish; thirdly, that the defendants were a board, constituted under Act of Parliament for certain specific purposes, of which, since the 24th March 1866, the repairing of roads in Wimbledon parish was not one, and that they are consequently not liable, under the facts stated in the case, for the price of materials after the 24th March 1866; fourthly, that it is consistent with the case, as stated, that a large part of the materials supplied by the plaintiff after the 24th March 1866, were supplied under a supposed contract or contracts with the defendants made after that date, and which, after that date, they were in law incapacitated from making; fifthly, that the defendants could not after the 24th March 1866, contract with the plaintiff for repairing the roads in Wimbledon parish; sixthly, that on the 24th May 1866, the Wimbledon parish ceased to form part of the district under the defendants' management; seventhly, that on the 24th May 1866, the Wimbledon parish adopted the Local Government Act, within the meaning of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61, s. 41. (Points 8, 9, 10, and 11 were precisely similar to points 2, 3, 4, and 5 above mentioned, substituting only the date of the 24th May 1866 for the 24th March 1866.)

Prentice, Q.C. (with him was Hance), on the part of the plaintiff, contended that the plaintiff was entitled to recover from the delendants the full amount of his claim for gravel bonâ fide supplied to the order of their surveyor, and used for the repair of roads within their district, during the entire period from the 1st Jan. to the 26th July. As to that portion supplied from 1st Jan. to 24th March, no question was now raised. With respect to the period from the 24th March to the 26th July it was submitted that the plaintiffs were liable, the goods having been supplied to their order, and used for repairing their roads, and the plaintiff having up to the 26th July had no notice that Wimbledon parish had ceased to be a member of the Kingston Highway Board, or that he was to discontinue the supply of gravel. But, in any case, for the gravel supplied in the interval between the 24th March and the 24th May the defendants were liable, because the parish of Wimbledon did not cease to be a member of the highway board, and the adoption by them of the Local Government Act 1858 was not complete and operative, until the expiration of two months from the 24th March, the date of their resolution to adopt it. During these two months, if the Kingston board were not liable for the repairs, the roads must have gone unmended, for Wimbledon parish had no authority to repair them. [BRAMWELL, B.—Your argument is, some one must have had the duty and liability of repairing the roads. Wimbledon parish could not do it, therefore the Kingston Highway Board must do so—that is, up to the 24th May.] Just so. He cited and referred to the Local Government Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98), ss. 19 and 20;

Highway Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 61), s. 41;
Highway Act Amendment Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 101), s. 32.

Denman, Q.C. (with him was Castle), for the defendants contra, urged the argument contained in their points, and contended that Wimbledon having by their resolution on the 24th March to adopt the Local Government Act, ceased then and there to form part of the highway district, the defendants were then functi officio, and could not thenceforth legally do any repairs to the Wimbledon roads; and having done them, as the plaintiff also did, without knowledge of the facts of the case, no contract was thereby effected. The plaintiff and the defendants were in pari innocentiâ as regards notice up to the 26th July. The materials were delivered on the Wimbledon roads and used there. The user therefore was that of Wimbledon. [BRAMWELL, B.—The plaintiff's point, I should say, was simply this, work done and payment due unless cause to the contrary be shown.] This is shown to the contrary, that all these things were done in pursuance of the Act. Sects. 3, 9, and 17 of the Highway Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 61) refer wholly and solely to parishes within the district, and the defendants contend that sect. 41 of that Act, under which Act alone this district is rated, is strong to show that Wimbledon had ceased to form part of the district. By that section a stop was put to the district as far as Wimbledon was concerned, and to all repairs of the road in Wimbledon parish by the district highway board. [BRAMWELL, B.—The emphatic words of sect. 41 "shall cease to form part of such district" must have reference to something future and not to past matters.] We say that this is something future. There was not a sum due from the parish at that time, and we could not be reimbursed for it, and so it cannot be to be paid by us. [BRAMWELL, B.—You admit that up to the 24th March the plaintiff is entitled to recover?] Yes, and that has been paid. The plaintiff relies on sects. 19 and 20 of the Local Government Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98), and says that notwithstanding the strong words in sect. 41 of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61 (The Highway Act 1862), there was no adoption of the Act of 1858 by Wimbledon until after the 24th March. But the defendants, on the other hand, say that, upon the parish of Wimbledon ceasing, as we contend that on the 24th March it did cease, to be in the Kingston Highway District, every clause of the Act, as far as Wimbledon is concerned, fell to the ground, inasmuch as everything to be done by the highway board under the Act must be done in the highway district. Therefore what was done after the 24th March was clearly ultra vires of the Kingston Highway Board.

MARTIN, B.—I am of opinion that the plaintiff in this case is entitled to the judgment of the court in his favour. There are two questions submitted to us by the arbitrator on the special case for our determination; the first is, whether or not the Kingston Highway Board acted ultra vires in repairing the roads in the parish of Wimbledon, in the interval between the 24th March and the 24th May 1866, so as to prevent the plaintiff from recovering, in this action, the price of the materials supplied by him during that period, as mentioned in the special case? The second question is like the first, except that, for the interval between the 24th March and the 24th May, as above mentioned, the interval between the 24th May and the 26th July should be substituted. Now, in my opinion, the plaintiff is entitled to recover on both heads of claim. In my opinion it is materially a question of fact, and turns upon the 12th and 15th paragraphs of the special case stated by the learned arbitrator. The 12th paragraph finds that "the Kingston Highway Board continued to repair the roads in Wimbledon parish, up to the 26th July 1866, with materials supplied by the plaintiff to Niblet's order" (he was the surveyor of the defendants), "just as if Wimbledon parish had not adopted, or intended to adopt, the Local Government Act 1858, and without being requested by the Wimbledon Local Board to do such repairs;" and the 15th paragraph finds that "there was nothing unusual in the fact that the materials supplied in 1866 exceeded the amount contemplated by the estimate and contract at the beginning of the year, inasmuch as in the years 1864, 1865, during which the plaintiff had supplied materials to the Kingston Highway Board, as ordered by their surveyor for the repairs of the roads in Wimbledon parish, under contracts substantially similar to that for 1866, the amount actually supplied had exceeded, though not to such an extent as in 1866, the amount estimated and contracted for; and the Kingston Highway Board paid the plaintiff for all the materials so supplied during those years, 1864, 1865." Upon those two findings of the arbitrator, I am of opinion that we, if sitting here as a jury on the facts, ought to find a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount claimed, as for goods sold and delivered upon an order given by a person competent, and authorised by the defendants, to give it; and that that is the true and real liability upon the defendants on the facts stated. It was as much an ordinary case of goods sold and delivered as in the case of an action against a city company for provisions supplied for one of its feasts, or for any other matter done by a corporation in the way of its business by its public officer. The only answer set up to that is that this was a matter ultra vires of the highway board. Now I confess, for my own part, that I do not, and never did, well understand what ultra vires means, and I cannot say that I have been much enlightened on the point by the argument in the present case. There was a case not very long ago before the Court of Exchequer, in which Sir Charles Taylor brought an action against the Chichester and Midhurst Railway Company, to recover a sum of money on a contract. I recollect, and no doubt my brother Bramwell, who, as well as myself, was a party to the judgment in that case, recollects it also, that the Court of Exchequer, after an argument of three days upon the doctrine of ultra vires, failed to comprehend it, and eventually gave judgment in favour of Sir Charles Taylor. The case went up to error, and the Court of Exchequer Chamber held that the contract was ultra vires, and our judgment was reversed; but I am bound to say that I never quite understood that judgment. The case then went up to the House of Lords, and there the decision of the Exchequer Chamber was reversed, and I see that Lord Westbury prefaces his judgment on this point by stating that "It is impossible for anyone, who rightly apprehends the meaning of the term ultra vires, to entertain any reasonable doubt about the matter; the whole thing is mere imagination about the agreement being ultra vires, and about the company committing a breach of trust. It proceeds only from a want of more accurately understanding the meaning of terms, and the rules by which they are applied." (a) Now, if a person who is competent to contract, and is by law competent to do so without fraud, enters into a contract, I own I cannot see how, because such person has exceeded that which he ought to do, it therefore ceases to be his contract. It may be said that it does so cease, but to my mind it is very difficult to comprehend it. But I think that even Mr. Denman will admit that he has no very strong argument to support the doctrine of ultra vires in the present case. My judgment in this case is founded on this, that this is an ordinary action for goods sold and delivered, the goods having been ordered by a person who, there is the strongest evidence to show, had authority to order them; and they were supplied and were used bonâ fide, and without any fraud, for the purposes of the defendants' board; and nothing has been shown or said to satisfy me that there is any rule of law, of reason, or of common sense, which should excuse them, as the persons whose servant so ordered these goods, from paying the price of them. If the highway board has gone beyond its authority in the matter, it must do as other people must do in such a case, namely, take the consequences of their own voluntary act.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion, and think that the plaintiff in this case is entitled to our judgment. And first, with reference to the objection which has been raised that the highway board acted ultra vires in this matter, I think I understand what that term means. I may observe that I was engaged in, I believe, the first case in which the point was raised as to the competency of a railway company to make a contract, and I was surprised at the decision. I refer to the case of The East Anglian Railway Company v. The Eastern Counties Railway Company, in the Common Pleas (11 C. B. 775; 21 L. J. 23, C. P.), which, I think, was the first time that the question of ultra vires was raised, and the objection was taken, and was upheld by the court, that a railway company, incorporated by Act of Parliament, and having a common seal, cannot, even with the assent of all its shareholders, legally enter into a contract involving the application of any portion of its funds to purposes foreign from those for which it is incorporated. But the question which arose in that case is not, to my mind, the same as that which arises here; and I am strongly inclined to think, if nothing else had appeared in this case, except that the Kingston Highway Board had ordered gravel to be purchased for the repairs of the roads not within their district, that that would have been ultra vires, and that the person who supplied the gravel could not have recovered, because this board is only competent to contract with reference to the purposes and within the district for which it is created; and I should have thought that it could have no more power to bind itself to pay the people by whom the gravel was supplied in a parish which was not a member of the board, or within its jurisdiction, than it could have power to contract for building a bridge in a different county. However, I think the question is not so bare a one as I have supposed, and it appears to me that different considerations arise here. Now, as to the first period of time in dispute, that, namely, from March 24th to May 24th, I confess that I have never had a doubt about it, and I do not see how a doubt can be entertained on the matter, except by doing the Legislature a very grievous wrong. The facts upon that part of the case, are clearly these, that the defendants would have been liable to repair the roads in Wimbledon parish up to the 24th May, unless the Local Government Act had before that time been adopted by Wimbledon parish, within the meaning of the Highway Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 61). Then Mr. Denman says it was adopted before that time, because the resolution to adopt it, which was passed two months previously, was in fact the adoption of it. But the resolution to adopt is not in my opinion the adoption within the statute. When we come to look at the Act of Parliament, the Local Government Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98), under which this resolution was passed, it is clear that it is a resolution which is to be operative only in case something else does not happen. It may be appealed against, it may be reversed; and a variety of other matters may take place, and it is not until two months after the resolution to adopt the Act, that the Act is so adopted as to have the force and effect of law in the parish (sect. 20). Indeed, Mr. Denman himself says, in effect, that, until the expiration of these two months, Wimbledon parish could not have repaired its roads. If he does not admit it, he does not, at all events, deny that for two months it would have been impossible for the Wimbledon board to act. The consequence of that would be that if the district highway board could not act for these two months, then, whatever might be the state and condition of the roads in Wimbledon parish, they must, during that period, go unrepaired. Can anyone suppose that such an absurdity as that is to be found in the Act of Parliament? and are we to do the Legislature the wrong of supposing them to have passed an Act having such a preposterous effect? I think the 41st section of the Highway Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 61), puts the matter in the true light, where it says: "Upon such adoption being made, such parish, or part of a parish, shall cease to form part of such district." That must mean "upon such adoption coming into operation." Therefore, as to the first point, with reference to the period from the 24th March to the 24th May, I cannot come to any such conclusion as the defendants would desire me to do. But with respect to the other point my opinion, I confess, is not so clear. At the same time, I have a strong opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment on that point as well as on the other, and upon this ground, if we look at the Act of Parliament which regulates these districts for the purpose of repairing the highways (25 & 26 Vict. c. 61), we see that it is evidently contemplated that there will be certain annual expenses, and that there is to be an annual estimate of the expense of keeping the roads in repair. I do not say that it is necessary, or that the district board ought, at the beginning of every year, at once to levy the full estimated amount; on the contrary, it is obvious that they may levy it at different times and in different portions. Further, it is manifest that, if the sum first estimated should not prove to be enough, then there may be a further sum levied by precept to the overseers provided it does not exceed a certain amount; and although that may be so, it is manifest that the statute contemplated certain annual expenses and a certain annual sum; and it is also manifest that it was intended by the statute that the work should not be done upon credit, but that the highway board should put themselves in funds at the first for the work that would have to be done subsequently, because in the same way as a poor-rate ought not to be retrospective, so neither ought a highway rate to be; and what ought to be done is, that the money should be collected and received for the repairs to be done thereafter. It is necessary to refer to the statute (25 & 26 Vict. c. 61) to see these different things, and I would refer to the 17th section, in which it is said that "it shall be the duty of the district surveyor of such parish to submit to the board, at their first meeting in every year, an estimate of the expenses likely to be incurred during the ensuing year for maintaining and keeping in repair the highways in each parish within the district of the board, and to deliver a copy of such estimate," and so forth; and by sect. 20 it is provided that "the salaries of the officers appointed for each district, and any other expenses incurred by any highway board, for the common use or benefit of the several parishes within such district, shall be annually charged to a district fund, to be contributed by, and charged upon, the several parishes within such district, in proportion to the average of the expenditure incurred during the three last preceding years, in such parishes respectively, in maintaining and keeping in repair the highways thereof." And then, by sect. 21, it is enacted that, "For the purpose of obtaining payment from the several parishes within their district, of the sums due from them, the Highway Board shall order precepts to be issued to the overseers of the said parishes, stating the sum to be contributed by each parish, and requiring the overseers of such parish, within a time to be limited by the precept, to pay the sum therein mentioned to the treasurer of the board; and the overseers shall comply with the requisition of such precept by paying the sums to be contributed by their respective parishes, out of any moneys in their hands applicable to the relief of the poor; but no contribution required to be paid by any parish, at any one time in pursuance of this Act, shall exceed" the sum therein specified, and so on. I do not think that one need go farther with the sections of the Act of Parliament, but if that be so, then the consequence is that the parish of Wimbledon, at the beginning of 1866, ought to have been called upon, as they were in fact called upon, to contribute a certain sum, which was divided, for the convenience of those who had to pay it, into two sums, which, however, might have been received by the defendants at the outset. They were also liable to a charge which is to be annual, for the salaries of the officers. Now, is it conceivable, if that be so, if the Wimbledon board at the commencement of the year pay all this money, and then afterwards, in the month of March the two months came into operation, so that the Local Government Act 1858 is adopted—is it, I say, conceivable, that the Kingston Highway Board are to keep all the money that is to be paid to them, estimated and received upon the footing that the roads will be repaired by them for the whole year, and that then the Wimbledon parish, having paid the Kingston board for repairs for a year, are nevertheless, after that, to repair the roads in their own parish? It seems to me that such a state of things is impossible. To make such a consequence follow would require the most stringent and peremptory words in the Act of Parliament. But the only words that are relied on are these, I think, in the 41st section of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61, "any parish, or part of a parish, included in a highway district, may adopt the Local Government Act in the same manner and under the same circumstances, in and under which it might have adopted the same, if it had not been included in such district; and upon such adoption being made, such parish, or part of a parish, shall cease to form part of such district." So it does. It does not form part of that district any longer; but it is nowhere said that the district board shall not repair the highways, and receive the money when the precept is issued. Nothing of the sort is there. On the contrary, the section proceeds immediately to say, "subject nevertheless to the payment of any contribution that may at the time of such adoption be due from such parish or part of a parish to the highway board." Well, it may be said, if the argument is a well founded one, then the consequence would follow that if, in the latter half of the year, it had been found that the estimated sum was not enough, the Kingston board would have been unable still to go on repairing the highways, and have a further claim on the Wimbledon board. I am not at all sure that that might not be answered in the affirmative; but it is enough to say that the question has not arisen here. It may somehow or the other be that the defendants could not get at the Wimbledon board under these circumstances; but all that we have to do now is to decide this particular case; and although sect. 41 says that "on the adoption of the Act," which I will say was on the 24th May, "the parish shall cease to be a part of the district," yet it does not say that the district board shall not repair those roads, the price of repairing which it has received; and therefore as it would have been a gross injustice if it had said so, we certainly ought not to interpolate these words into the Act. I think, therefore, that it follows from these different considerations, that the Kingston Highway board were bound to repair the roads in the parish of W., I am inclined to think to the end of the year; but, if not to the end of the year, at all events to the extent of the funds that they had received for that purpose. They have not shown that they have gone beyond those funds. Whether or not, if any fresh funds were necessary in order to repair to the end of the year, the defendants had power, under the circumstances, to raise such fresh funds in the manner before alluded to, I will not positively decide, though I am not at all sure that they had not such power. It is enough to say that, to the extent of the funds they had, they were bound. The consequence is, that they had power to order the gravel here, and so the order was not ultra vires, and therefore they must be answerable for the debt; and our judgment must be for the plaintiff for the full amount.

ADAMS (app.) v. MASTERS (resp.)

*Game—Trespass in pursuit of—Bonâ fide claim of right—Jurisdiction of justices—*1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, s. 30.

The respondent laid an information against the appellants under sect. 30 of the 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32 (The Game Act), for trespassing in pursuit of game. At the hearing he gave evidence that the lords of the manor had in the year 1815 granted the right of shooting, down to the present time, and that he was then renting the shooting of them. On the part of the appellant it was alleged that he had a lease from the said lords of the manor of the lands said to be trespassed upon, dated 1859, in which there was no reservation of a right to the game, and that the alleged trespass was committed in the assertion of his right to the game. The justices having convicted the appellant:

Held, that under the circumstances the claim of right having been bonâ fide made, the jurisdiction of the justices was ousted.

THIS was a case stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, upon a conviction of the appellant, as follows:—

At a petty sessions holden at Axbridge, in and for the division of Axbridge, in the county of Somerset, on the 26th Sept. 1870, an information preferred by John Masters, hereinafter called the respondent, against Thomas Adams the younger, hereinafter called the appellant, under sect. 30 of the statute 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, charging for that the said appellant did within three calendar months last past, to wit, on the 9th Sept. 1870, at the parish of Wedmore, in the said county of Somerset, unlawfully commit a trespass by being in the daytime of the same day upon certain closes of land in the possession and occupation of John Hawkins, Robert Millard, George Day, Thomas Comer, Robert Duckett, Samuel Sparks, and Charles Champeny, in search of game (woodcocks, snipes, quails, landrails, and conies), without the licence or consent of the owner of the land so trespassed upon or of any person having the right of killing the game upon such land, or of any other person having a right to authorise the said appellant to enter or be upon the said land for the purpose aforesaid contrary to the statute in such case made and provided, whereby and by force of the said statute the said appellant had forfeited a sum of money not exceeding 2*l.*, to be applied as the statutes in that behalf made and provided direct, was heard and determined by us the said justices, the said parties respectively being then present. At the hearing of the aforesaid information it was admitted by the appellant that he was upon the lands in question and for the object in question; and that the said lands formed a parcel of the manor of Blackford, in the county of Somerset, but it was stated by him, and not disputed by the respondent, that he was there in company with, and under the authority of, William Shartman Glanvile, Esq. That the said William Shartman Glanvile, by his solicitor, asserted that he had a bonâ fide legal right to be upon such lands by himself, his friends, and servants, for the purpose of taking game, and that the said William Shartman Glanvile, and his ancestors, had enjoyed such right for at least twenty years without interruption, and that he had the consent of the tenants of the said land, and whose names are mentioned in the aforesaid information, as the possessors and occupiers thereof, and in whose leases (made since the passing of the 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32) was no reservation of the right of sporting to their landlord. No evidence was given or tendered by or on behalf of the appellant or the said William Shartman Glanvile in support of such assertions and allegations, but an adjournment was asked for that such evidence might be produced, which adjournment was refused by us.

On behalf of the respondent, it was stated and not disputed by the appellant that he was acting as gamekeeper to Charles Augustus Homfray, Esq., by whose authority and direction the above information was laid, and that the said Charles Augustus Homfray had rented the shooting over the said land from the landlords thereof who are lords of the said manor of Blackford, who had not however reserved to themselves, as before stated, the right of sporting over the said land in the leases to the said tenants before mentioned. It was proved at the said hearing, by the production of leases by the respondent, that the exclusive right to the shooting over the said lands had been granted by the landlords, lords of the manor, and owners in fee of the said lands, from the year 1815 downwards to the present time. The leases to the tenants and occupiers aforesaid are not rack-rent leases, but leases granted in consideration of the payment of a fine and an annual chief rent and land tax, and are for a term of twenty-one years, commencing from the 29th Sept. 1859.

No other leases than those before referred to were produced, and those leases besides containing grants of the right of hunting, hawking, fishing, and fowling, also contained demises of certain lands within the manor. Under these circumstances, and on this evidence, it was contended on the part of the appellant that he had proved the right of the said William Shartman Glanvile, to the sporting over the said land, and that consequently he, the appellant, being in company with the said William Shartman Glanvile, could not be a trespasser upon the said land, and that even if such proof was not established to our satisfaction, yet, that he being there under a bonâ fide claim of right, our jurisdiction was ousted, and we ought not to convict him of the alleged offence. We, however, being of opinion that the grant by the landlords and lords of the manor, to the said Charles Augustus Homfray of the exclusive right which he claimed to sport over the said land, precluded all other rights including those claimed by, or under the said tenants, found that the appellant was guilty of the offence alleged in the said information, and adjudged him to pay a fine of 5*s.* for the said offence, granting him at the same time this case for the opinion of your honourable court. A similar information was laid against the said William Shartman Glanvile by the respondent, but the hearing thereof stands adjourned until the decision of your honourable court.

The questions of law arising on the above stated case for the opinion of the court, therefore, are: First, were we the said justices empowered in law to convict, and ought we to have convicted the appellant in respect of the said alleged trespass? or, secondly, was our jurisdiction taken away by the statement and evidence before us, and were there any circumstances in the case as brought before us which ought to have made us refuse to convict the appellant, or refuse to exercise our jurisdiction in the case? Whereupon the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench is asked whether or not we, the said justices, were correct in our determination as aforesaid, and as to what further should be done or ordered by the said court in the premises. And the court is humbly solicited according to the power vested in the court by the said statute (20 & 21 Vict. c. 43), to remit the case to us, the said justices, with the opinion of the court thereon, or to make such other order as to the court may seem fit. Given, &c.

Grantham, appeared for the appellant.—The justices should not have convicted after the appellant had set up a claim of right. The case finds that the tenants of the manor had leases in which there was no reservation to the landlords of the game. The tenants, therefore, were entitled to claim a right to the game, and the justices could not try that question.

T. W. Saunders, for the respondent, was called upon.—The justices were right in convicting. The claim set up by the appellant was merely that in a lease granted in 1859 there was no reservation of the game; but the respondent proved that the lords of the manor had granted the right to the game on the manor to parties through whom he claimed as long ago as the year 1815, and that such grant was in force down to the present time. The only proof adduced was that of the respondent. The appellant did not produce even his lease. [BLACKBURN, J.—I should doubt that upon the statement in the case, which implies that he did produce his lease, for it states the contents.] The justices conceived that as the right to the game had been granted away as long since as 1815 the appellant, whose lease commenced only in 1849, could have no right to the game, and the absence of any express reservation was accounted for by this, that the lords of the manor had no right themselves in any game, either to grant or reserve. [COCKBURN, C. J.—But the appellant might fairly have assumed, that as his lease did not reserve the right to the game, he himself had a right to it. It does not appear that he was aware of any right in anyone else.] It is immaterial whether he was aware of the rights of others or not, if he had no legal right in himself. His trespass need not have been wilful. This was decided in Morden (app.) v. Porter (resp.) (29 L. J. 213, M. C.), where it was held that it is not necessary in order to support a conviction under sect. 30 that the defendant should have intended to commit or have been conscious that he was committing a trespass. In that case Williams, J., said, "I may intimate my opinion that it is quite immaterial whether the defendant was or was not conscious that he was committing a trespass, as the Act says that any person going upon land in the daytime in search of game under circumstances that make him a trespasser civilly shall be liable to be convicted. [COCKBURN, C.J.—That was a case where he was actually trespassing without a claim of right. Here he sets up a claim which is bona fide. BLACKBURN, J.—And which may in truth be very well founded.] That cannot be, for the case finds that the lords of the manor had granted the right to the shooting from the year 1815 down to the present time. [BLACKBURN, J.—That may be, but it does not state that the grant of the shooting was to the respondent or anyone through whom he claims.] That was so in fact, and if there is any doubt upon it, the case could be sent back to the justices to have this fact stated. [COCKBURN, C.J.—We should hardly be justified in doing so in a case of this sort.] The justices evidently were satisfied that the right of shooting was in the respondent.

COCKBURN, C. J. (a.)—It may be so that he has this right, but the question is whether the appellant who had no knowledge of it ought to have been convicted of a trespass? If he had been served with any notice by the respondent showing that the right to the game was in him, it might have been otherwise. But upon the facts as stated in the case it is clear that the claim of right was made bonâ fide, and under circumstances which warranted the appellant in believing that he had a right to the game. The conviction, therefore, cannot be supported.

WHITING (app.) v. CARPENTER (resp.)

The Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847—Appointment of meters—Purpose of appointment—Obligation to employ.

By the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 (10 Vict. c. 27), it is enacted by sect. 82 that when a sufficient number of weighers have been appointed by the undertakers under the powers of this and the special Act, the master of any vessel, or the owner of any goods shipped, unshipped, or delivered within or upon the harbour or dock or pier shall not employ any person other than a weigher or meter licensed by the undertakers or appointed by the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Customs to weigh or measure the same, under a certain penalty. The Mayor and Corporation of Portsmouth were, under an Act of Parliament passed in the year 1839, entitled to the right to take certain dues in respect of vessels lading or unlading upon or from the wharves of the harbour; a subsequent Act passed in the year 1868, giving the corporation additional powers, and conferring upon them the exclusive appointment and regulation of meters and weighers within the harbour, and incorporating the 81*st and* 82*nd section of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act* 1847. The corporation thereupon made certain bye-laws for the appointment, government, and payment of meters. In the year 1807 the corporation granted a lease to a Mr. Burridge (through whom the respondent claimed) for 999 years of certain premises, in which there was a proviso that all such goods, wares, and merchandise as shall be proved to be bonâ fide the sole property of the said Burridge, his executors, administrators, or assigns, who shall be legally and beneficially entitled to the said premises when such goods, &c., shall be landed, shipped, or unshipped, brought to, carried, or laden to, upon, or from certain premises in the harbour mentioned, shall be freed and discharged from all wharfage, average, petit customs, and other duties usually paid at any time or times heretofore, or which at any times hereafter during the said respective terms shall become due or payable to the said mayor, aldermen, or burgesses. The respondent unloaded a cargo of coals at the premises in the harbour in question, for his own use, and did not employ a corporation meter:

Held, that he was under no legal obligation to employ such meter.

THIS is a case stated by justices.

At a petty sessions holden at the Sessions Room at the borough of Portsmouth on the 18th April 1870, an information preferred by Edmund Whiting, chamberlain to the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Portsmouth, and on their behalf (hereinafter called the appellant), against Thomas Carpenter (hereinafter called the respondent, under sect. 82 of the 10 Vict. c. 27), charging that he the said Thomas Carpenter, on the 26th March last, did weigh a large quantity of coals forming part of the cargo of a vessel called the Robert, then lying and being for the purpose of discharging in the harbour of Portsmouth in the said borough, to wit, in a certain place there called the Camber, part of the said harbour, the said Thomas Carpenter not being licensed by the council of the said borough, nor appointed by the Commissioners of her Majesty's Customs, to weigh and measure the same, contrary to the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, and which information was heard and determined by us the said parties respectively, being then present, and upon such hearing we dismissed the said information.

In the year 1839, by an Act of Parliament, intituled "An Act for Enlarging the Town Quay of the Borough of Portsmouth, and for Improving that portion of the Harbour of Portsmouth called the Camber," there were then certain clauses inserted in that Act which gave to the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses, acting by the council of the borough, the right to take and receive dues in respect of vessels lading or unlading upon or from the wharves of the corporation, to be made by virtue of that Act, or in the said Camber, certain tonnage rates, and also in respect of merchandise landed upon or shipped from the said wharves or elsewhere upon the banks and shores of the said borough, within the limits of the same, certain other rates called wharfage rates.

In the year 1868 another Act of Parliament, intituled "The Portsmouth Camber Quays Act 1868," was passed, which did not repeal the Act of 1839, but incorporated certain clauses of it, and gave additional powers to the mayor and corporation for the collection of the same dues as were payable under that Act in respect of a new wharf erected outside the limits of the Camber at a place called Flathouse, as set forth in sect. 20 of the Act of 1868—that is to say, from and immediately after the passing of this Act the corporation may demand and take for and in respect of all vessels unlading from or upon the new wharf recently constructed at that part of the borough called Flathouse, and now belonging, to, or which may hereafter be constructed or acquired by, the borough, the tonnage fees due on sums specified in the second schedule to the Act of 1839; and they may also demand or take for or in respect of all goods, wares, merchandise, commodities, and things, except the personal luggage of passengers, which shall be laden or unladen, landed or shipped, upon or from any such wharf or quay as in this section before mentioned, the full amount of the rates or sums specified in the third schedule to the Act of 1839, and the full amount of such rates or sums upon things not specified in the said third schedule as are payable under sect. 64 of the same Act. But nothing in this Act shall be deemed or construed to affect the exemption contained in sect. 68 of the Act of 1839, or any person entitled to such exemption by virtue of any lease or leases, and such exemption shall be deemed to extend to this Act in respect of the matters or things to which such exemptions extends, so long as the said lease or leases shall continue.

By sect. 27 of the same Act it is enacted, the corporation shall (except as hereinafter mentioned) have the exclusive appointment and regulation of meters and weighers within all parts of the harbour and borough of Portsmouth, and for that purpose sects. 81 and 82 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 shall be incorporated with this Act, and for the purposes thereof the expressions "limits of the harbour, dock, and pier," and "harbour, or dock, or pier" in those sections shall mean and include all parts of the harbour and borough of Portsmouth, provided always that nothing in this section contained shall extend or be construed to extend to the weighing or meting of coals unladen or landed for the use and service of the Portsea Island Gas Company, at their works, or for the use and services of the port of Portsmouth and Ryde Steam Packet Company at such company's wharf, unless either of the said companies shall become sellers of coal; nor shall anything in this section extend or be construed to extend to coals or other goods, wares, merchandise, commodities, and things landed on any part of the shores of the said harbour, other than so much of the shores of the island of Portsea as are within the borough of Portsmouth.

The corporation under the Act of 1868, and sects. 81 and 82 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 incorporated therein, made certain bye laws for the government of meters to be appointed under the said Act, and fixing thereby the rates to be paid to them for weighing and measuring goods, and which bye laws were confirmed by the Privy Council on the 11th Nov. 1869; and with the bye laws are published and incorporated the 81st and 82nd sections of the Harbour, Docks, and Pier Clauses Act 1847 as follows:

Sect. 81.—Where under the special Act the undertakers have the appointment of meters and weighers, the undertakers may appoint and license a sufficient number of persons to be meters and weighers within the limits of the harbour, dock, and pier and remove any such persons at their pleasure, and may make regulations for their government, and fix reasonable rates to be paid or other remuneration to be paid to them for weighing and measuring goods.

Sect. 82. When a sufficient number of meters have been appointed by the undertakers under the powers of this and the Special Act, the master of any vessel or the owner of any goods shipped or unshipped or delivered within or upon the harbour, or dock, or pier, shall not employ any person other than a weigher or meter licensed by the undertaker, or appointed by the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Customs to weigh or measure the same; and if in such case any person other than a meter or weigher licensed by the undertakers, or a meter or weigher appointed by the commissioners of Her Majesty's Customs, shall weigh or measure any such goods as aforesaid, such person, as well as the person by whom he shall be employed, shall, for every such offence, be liable to a penalty not exceeding 5*l.*, and the weighing or measurement of any such goods by any such person shall be deemed illegal.

It was under the above section (82) that the respondent was summoned for having acted as a meter in contravention of the same.

The following evidence was adduced in support of the information:—

Mr. John Howard, the town clerk of the borough, being sworn, stated that as such he has the custody of corporation charters, muniments, and other documents. He produced the Acts of Parliament of 1839, 1847, and 1868, a copy of the bye-laws made by the council of the borough for the regulation and payment of meters appointed under the incorporated sect. 87 of the Harbours Act 1847, under the seal of the corporation, with the allowance of the same by the Privy Council; and the minute book of the council containing the appointment of meters by the corporation. He also stated that one Thomas Martin, a witness, was one of the meters.

On cross-examination he stated that when the Act of 1868 was going through Parliament the Screw Collier Company (a company then in existence at Portsmouth) presented a petition against it; originally as the bill was drawn there was no exemption clause (excepting the payment of dues or sums from persons holding leases); that the repetition of the exemption contained in the Act of 1839, although considered unnecessary by the promoters, was afterwards inserted as set forth in the proviso to sect. 20.

Mr. Edmund Whiting, on being sworn, stated that he was chamberlain of the borough, that a copy of the bye laws was and is now posted at the chamberlain's office, and other parts of the town quays, and that he has held the office for six years past. On cross-examination he stated he was chamberlain before the Screw Collier Company existed. He has presented bills for wharfage tolls to Mr. Frost (the respondent's master), but the same have not been paid. There is a heap of mud outside the Baltic Wharf, the existence of which prevents vessels coming alongside. Under the directions of the town clerk, he prohibited Mr. Frost interfering with the soil of the Camber. The notice was verbal, and Mr. Frost ceased from moving it. The removal of the mud would be the business of the corporation. The ship Robert was some distance from the wharf, and was approached by planks laid on tressels, which rested on the walls of Mr. Frost's wharf. The coals in question which were meted by the respondents were landed from the ship over such planks, and a small portion put in a waggon and taken away, and the remainder put into Mr. Frost's store. Vessels came in as close as they could, and were wharfed. A vessel could not get in near to the wharf because of the mud. Mr. Frost had on some occasions employed a corporation meter. Tonnage dues were payable when vessels entered the Camber. Thomas Martin, on being sworn, stated he was a corporation meter. (He produced his appointment dated the 10th March last.) On the 26th March he went to the Baltic Wharf and went on board the Robert, a schooner lying alongside there between six and seven a.m. He saw the respondent weigh certain of the coals in question, which after being weighed were carried on shore and put into Mr. Frost's stores, and witness saw a three ton waggon containing coals sent away from the store. He followed the waggon, and the coals were delivered at the union workhouse.

The facts as alleged were admitted by the solicitor for the respondent, and that the defendant was not appointed to weigh by the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Customs, and that a sufficient number of meters had been appointed as required by sect. 82 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, and all other formal matters.

For the defendant, Mr. Mark Edwin Frost stated that he was the owner of the Baltic Wharf. He had recently purchased it from the Screw Collier Company. Respondent was in his employ as a servant, and was so on the day named in the information. No tolls have been paid to the corporation on goods landed at the wharf. He never employed a corporation meter. He attempted to remove the mud outside the Baltic Wharf when the same belonged to the Screw Collier Company. There is a mud bank which prevents vessels getting to within 90 ft. of the wharf. Claims for tolls have been demanded from him (these items were produced to the witness). These bills for tolls have been asked for but had not been paid, as he had always disputed his liability, and they had not been enforced. When the Act of 1868 was passing, the Screw Collier Company petitioned against it, and the exemption clause from payment of toll by virtue of any lease or leases as contained in sect. 68 of the Act of 1839 was repeated. [Witness produced the original lease, dated the 1st June 1801, for 999 years, granted by the corporation to William Burridge, a copy of which lease is hereto annexed, and forms part of this case.]

The proviso in the said lease as to exemption from toll was read, and is as follows :—

Provided always, and it is hereby agreed and declared by and between the said parties, that all such goods, wares, and merchandise as shall be, and shall to the satisfaction of the said mayor, alderman, and burgesses, or their wharfinger for the time being, be proved to be bonâ fide the sole property of the said Wm. Burridge, his executors, administrators, or assigns, who shall be legally and beneficially entitled to the premises hereinbefore mentioned and intended to be hereby demised when such goods, wares, and merchandise shall be landed, shipped, unshipped, brought to, carried, or laden, to, upon, or from any wall, wharf, or other erection, and also to, upon, from, or under the said stage or any part thereof; shall be freed and discharged from all wharfage, cranage, pettit customs, and other duties usually paid at any time or times heretofore, or which at any times hereafter during the said respective terms shall become due or payable to the said mayor, alderman, and burgesses, their successors or assigns.

Witness, in continuation of his evidence, stated that he was the owner of the wharf, the assignment to him was completed, and the legal estate was vested in him; the estate was unincumbered, and he was legally and beneficially entitled to the property; that he does not ordinarily weigh coals when discharging from a vessel at his wharf, but accepts the quantity as specified in the invoice or bill of lading; he weighs coals at his store before they are sent out. There was a stage originally outside the wharf, and the mud which accumulated arose underneath the stage, which belonged to the corporation. Witness is a seller of coal; he never landed anything on his wharf but what was bonâ fide his own property. A corporation meter had been employed by captains of vessels discharging a cargo at the wharf, but in such cases the captains paid the meters. The ship Robert was not weighed out. Respondent weighs coal out of the store. The respondent was and is in his employ, and the cargo of coals on board the Robert belonged to witness.

We, however, being of opinion that the Baltic Wharf being now the property of Mr. Frost, under the lease referred to, he was entitled to the exemption from tolls of all description, and, being so, it carried meterage with it; meterage being, in our judgment, a toll or a rate, as set forth in the third bye law made by the corporation under the Act of 1868; that Thomas Carpenter, the respondent, was the servant of Mr. Frost; that Mr. Frost was exempt, and that the coals on board the ship Robert were his property, and that when he unshipped the coals in question upon his wharf the employment of a corporation meter to weigh was not required by him, and was therefore unnecessary; and that the respondent might meter his master's coals: gave our determination against the appellant in the manner before stated.

The question of law arising on the above statement for the opinion of the court therefore is, first, whether meterage is such a toll or rate as is contemplated in the exemption contained in the lease of 1801; secondly, whether, the wharf in question being private property held under a lease from the corporation, the employment of a corporation meter was compulsory under the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 as to coals landed from vessels berthed at such wharf, the coals not being then and there sold, but partly put into store, and partly delivered into carts.

Lopes, Q.C. (Warry with him) appeared for the appellant.—The justices below were wrong in refusing to convict; for, although the lease by the corporation of Portsmouth to the respondent granted in 1801 exempts him from wharfage, cranage, and pettit customs, he is not exempt from the payment of metage which is imposed for other purposes than those specified in the lease. The words of the lease do not include metage; the provisoes, therefore, of the Harbour, Docks, and Pier Clauses Act 1847 are in force, and the respondent was liable to be convicted as having acted as a meter without being duly appointed. Metage is not appointed for the purposes of the Corporation, but for those of the public. [LUSH, J.—At the time of the granting of the lease there was no metage; the lease, therefore, gives the respondent perfect liberty.] Metage is really not a toll at all but a remuneration. [LUSH, J.—But the respondent imports his own coal for his own use.] The object was to provide remuneration to the meters for their services. [COCKBURN, C. J.—If it were necessary that the goods should be weighed, then they must be weighed by the proper person. But where no measurement of the goods is required, it cannot be necessary to employ a meter.] Meters are to be appointed, and it is right that they should have the weighing of goods and the receipt of the metage. Metage was never a duty payable to the corporation, and it was such only that was intended to be exempted by the lease. The words of the 82nd section are certainly large enough to include this case. The Act contemplated the appointment of a number of persons who should be competent as meters, and it provided also for their remuneration.

Brown, Q.C. (Bullen with him), for the respondent, were not called upon.

COCKBURN, C.J.—It appears to me that these meters were not appointed for the purposes of the public, but were to afford their services only when required. When the statute is carefully looked at, it clearly means this, that it is only when duties are payable, that those who have the control of the harbour shall appoint meters. It is plain that the Legislature has not thought fit to make any provision with respect to harbours where dues are not collected. It is, of course, necessary where dues are to be collected that persons should be appointed to ascertain what is due. But as regards the general public, it is not necessary where no dues are payable that any such provision should exist. If any consignee of goods requires the services of such a person, he must select the one pointed out by the statute, and pay him; but if he does not require such services, it is altogether otherwise. In this case, therefore, I cannot see that the Act of Parliament intended to impose the liability contended for. The respondent here is a person who, by his lease from the corporation, is exempt from all liability for dues in respect of goods brought to his premises. Being exempt by his lease, the Act of Parliament recognises that exemption. That being so, the respondent was under no obligation to employ a corporation official.

MELLOR, J., concurred.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I may add, that I think it is clear that the employment of meters was not intended as between buyers and sellers, but as between importers and the corporation.

CASE stated by the justices of Ipswich under 20 & 21 Vict. c, 43.

The facts of the case, as far as they are material for the purposes of the present report, were as follows:—

On the 27th April 1868 the respondents served upon the appellant, an owner of property in a street within their disirict, called Purplett-street, a notice under sect. 69 of the Public Health Act 1848, requiring him to repair his part of the street, specifying the dimensions, admeasurements, and other particulars, the works to be executed in accordance with a plan and section then lying for inspection at the office of the respondents' surveyor, at the Town-hall.

Similar notices were served upon the other owners in Purplett-street, and also upon the owners in a street adjoining at right angles, called Kemp-street.

The owners failing to comply with the notices, the respondents executed the works in the two streets themselves. And the surveyor apportioning the gross costs incurred in the two streets, pro ratâ among all the owners, served the appellant with a notice requiring him to pay his proportion so ascertained to be 20*l.* 2*s.* 1½*d.* The appellant on the 4th Nov. 1868, gave notice that he intended to "dispute and resist the payment." Whereupon he was summoned to appear before the justices, and at the hearing took the following objections:

1. That the notice of the 4th Nov. 1868 required the matter in dispute to be referred to arbitration under sect. 69 of 11 & 12 Vict. 63, and that the justices had no jurisdiction.

2. That the apportionment of expenses upon which the information was founded was bad and invalid, because the gross costs of the two streets was apportioned pro ratâ among all the owners of premises in the two streets, instead of apportioning the expenses exclusively incurred in Purplett-street among the owners of premises in that street, and the expenses exclusively incurred in Kemp-street among the owners of premises in that street.

3. That the plans and sections had not been deposited in the office of the local board within the meaning of sect. 16 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 61.

As to this objection it appeared that the plans and sections were deposited at the office of the surveyor, at the Town-hall, which was a different office to that where the rest of the board's business was transacted. It also appeared that the appellant had in fact inspected them there.

4 and 5 were founded upon slight variances which appeared between the works as described in the notice, and those described by the plans and sections, and also between the works described in the plans and sections and the notice and the work actually done by the board.

6. That the board were bound to contract for the works.

The justices dismissed this summons on the second objection, and gave the appellant a certificate under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 14. The surveyor then, correcting his error, made a fresh apportionment, and on the 23rd Feb. 1869 served the appellant with a notice demanding payment of his share, amounting to 19*l.* 11*s.* 10½*d.* The appellant, on the 10th Nov. 1869, gave notice that he disputed the proportion and the amount thereof.

He was accordingly summoned again to appear before the justices on the 18th Nov. 1869; and at the hearing was stated in the case to have raised the same six objections as are above mentioned, and also to have objected:

7. That the justices had already heard and determined an information and complaint for the same matter between the same parties.

8. That the information had not been laid within nine months of the service on the appellant of the notice of the surveyor's apportionment, as provided by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 11, and 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98, s. 63.

9. That the justices were wrong in declining to inquire whether the amount of 250*l.* 9*s.* 8*d.*, which the surveyor stated had been expended in Purplett-street had been actually so expended, and in not allowing the appellant to cross-examine the surveyor as to the items forming the said sum.

The justices overruled all these objections; and having ascertained by calculation that the surveyor's apportionment of the sum of 250*l.* 9*s.* 8*d.* among the owners of premises in Purplett-street was accurately made, and that the appellant's proportion according to his frontage was 19*l.* 11*s.* 10*d.*, made an order for payment by the appellant of such sum and costs, and in case of default that the same should be levied by distress. From which order this case was an appeal.

Bulwer, Q.C. (Graham with him), for the appellant, contended that the notice of the 11th Nov. 1868, given by the appellant to the respondents was a notice of a dispute requiring to be settled by arbitration under the 69th section of the Public Health Act 1848; that the surveyor had no authority to make a fresh apportionment, and the justices no jurisdiction to make the order appealed from. [BLACKBURN, J.—The appellant in the notice only says, "I intend to dispute and resist the payment of the sum charged," which clearly does not amount to a dispute of the apportionment. And at the time of making the second apportionment there had really been no apportionment, the first being in valid.] Then the justices exceeded their jurisdiction in making this order, for the appellant, having given the notice of 18th May 1869, disputing the proportion, their only duty was quâ arbitrators under 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98, s. 64, to settle the proportion. They had no authority to act in the double capacity of arbitrators to settle the proportion, and of justices to make the order for payment. They should have settled the proportion, and then, if the appellant did not pay within three months, issue a fresh summons to compel him: (Bayley v. Wilkinson, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 543; 16 C. B., N. S., 161.) [LUSH, J.—This point is not raised in this case.] The justices were wrong in refusing to allow the appellant to cross-examine the surveyor, and to inquire whether the amount had been actually expended in the works. Bayley v. Wilkinson upon this matter only decides that they cannot inquire into the reasonableness of the actual expenditure. [BLACKBURN, J.—It would be monstrously inconvenient if any one person were allowed to insist upon having the whole matter investigated. LUSH, J.—Might not the appellant, as a person aggrieved, address the Secretary of State under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, s. 120, and 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98, s. 65? His Lordship referred to Wallington (apps.) v. Willes (resp.) (10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 785; 16 C. B., N. S., 797.)] That would not preclude our contention. The question is, what have the justices jurisdiction to do? Their jurisdiction is limited to ordering us to pay expenses that have been incurred. It turns upon the construction to be put upon the words of the Act "expenses incurred." As to the third objection, the deposit of the plans and sections is made a condition precedent to the power of the board to do the works. Reg. v. The Justices of Surrey (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 466), upon the construction of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 85. [BLACKBURN, J.—In that case the putting up the notice was clearly made a condition precedent. The words used in that section are much more stringent than those upon which you have to rely.] He then urged the fourth and fifth objections. [COCKBURN, C. J.—These are all matters for addressing the the Secretary of State under the sections already alluded to.] He then put the other objections, but the court intimating their opinion that these were clearly untenable, he abandoned them.

Bosanquet (Notcutt with him) was not called upon.

COCKBURN, C. J.—We are of opinion that the decision of the magistrates was right, and that we cannot set their order aside. [After referring to the facts of the case and the Acts of Parliament, his Lordship proceeded:] The question put to us in the first instance to decide is, whether it was competent to the magistrates, or incumbent on the magistrates, to go into the question whether the amount charged by the local board as having been expended generally was in point of fact expended. It is my opinion that in going into that question they would have gone beyond the limits of their jurisdiction. By 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98, sect. 64, they are placed in the position of arbitrators. It is quite clear that quâ arbitrators they could not have gone into any such question; their jurisdiction is limited to inquiring whether the expenses amounting to a given sum, the amount charged to a particular owner is his fair and just proportion. I think, therefore, that the justices could not have gone into the other inquiry. Then Mr. Bulwer contends that they exercised, or took upon themselves to exercise—whether rightly or wrongly is another matter — the double functions of arbitrators under that section, and of magistrates exercising summary jurisdiction to enforce the decision of the arbitrators, that is, of themselves quâ arbitrators as to the amount which the appellant should be forced to pay. The question is not raised before us whether it was competent to them to act in that double capacity, and at once to proceed to make an order for payment without allowing any interval after having in the exercise of their functions as arbitrators decided the amount the appellant was called upon to pay, and we cannot go into it now. But assuming that the necessary interval has been allowed, or taking the case where an arbitrator has fixed the amount, and then the magistrates are called upon in the exercise of their summary jurisdiction to make an order to enforce payment of the amount, the question presents itself, whether in the exercise of that summary jurisdiction they could go into any question except that of whether the proportion assessed upon the particular individual is the right proportion or not? I do not think that it is competent for them under this Act of Parliament to enter into any such question, and that they are simply exercising what may be called a ministerial office in that sense; though, of course, they must see that the individual against whom the order is made is the right person, and that there has been some assessment, and that the proportion that he is to pay has been fixed by the proper authority. I think that, although in that respect their functions may be said to be judicial, in all other respects they are simply ministerial, and that as soon as the amount apportioned which the man is to pay is ascertained, they are bound to make an order without looking into the facts of the case. The case seems to me to be quite analogous to those of rates, and matters of that kind, in which we have held again and again that it is not for the magistrates to inquire into the validity of the rate or order on which he is asked to exercise his summary jurisdiction. I think, therefore, that if this had been an application to the magistrates on the decision of an arbitrator, as to what the amount should be, it would not have been competent to them to go into the matters to which Mr. Bulwer refers. We find that the Legislature has not left the party in the hopeless condition which it is contended must result if the magistrates were not competent to go into this inquiry; because, by the 120th section of Public Health Act 1848, provision is made for an appeal of the parties aggrieved to the General Board of Health, and now by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98, s. 65, to the Secretary of State. And if a person complained that he had been made to pay his proportion of a sum which had not been expended, and that there had been gross impropriety of conduct, no doubt the Secretary of State would exercise the power with which the Legislature has invested him, and inquire into such a matter. That, therefore, is the course which a person must adopt if he feels that he has been aggrieved by a proceeding of this kind. It would be the greatest possible inconvenience if on every occasion when the justices are called upon to enforce an order of this sort, it should be a question how far the statute has been complied with by the board, how the money has been expended, or at all events the propriety of executing the works. As to the other points taken by Mr. Bulwer, I think that they were disposed of in the course of the argument. It may be that the preliminaries required by the statute have not been strictly complied with; but I do not see that the appellant has sustained any grievance therefrom, and I agree with what was thrown out by my brother Blackburn, that these matters are not conditions precedent, and that their non-observance would not vitiate the orders. It may be, a very serious question, though it is not raised before us now, whether the magistrates in at once making a summary order for payment have not exceeded their powers, and whether it would not be a wise thing that, as two of the justices have determined, in the exercise of their province and duty as arbitrators, what the amount is which the appellant is called upon to pay, application should now be made to other magistrates to make the second order enforcing payment. I merely throw it out as a matter for consideration, with a view of preventing further litigation upon the subject.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion entirely. I concur in what my Lord has last said, that before attempting to levy the distress warrant which the magistrates have ordered, those who advise the local board had better consider whether it is safe so to do, and whether it would not be amended by applying to another couple of justices to enforce the payment, the proportion having been fixed by the justices when sitting in lieu of arbitrators. However, it is not a question before us, but is simply a question that the local board had better consider before they act upon it in order to be safe. As to all the other objections, I agree entirely with my Lord, and I will say nothing on any one of them except the only one which seemed to me to be of any substance, and that was the last. The appellant wanted to investigate the matter before the justices. It is obvious that where there is a large sum expended in this way, and sought to be enforced in what I may call dribblets before a separate magistrate summarily, it would be in the highest degree inconvenient, if each time the local board were forced to prove to the satisfaction of the magistrate before whom the matter went that these expenses were properly incurred in respect to what was done. And it would also be extremely inconvenient if that question was to be decided summarily by the justices, without any appeal, as far as I can possibly conceive. Any justice might be presuming to decide against the local board in a matter where the local board would have no appeal from him; and this small matter of 19*l.* might involve the question whether they could recover the whole 250*l.* In many other cases the question might be raised on a few shillings where an obstinate litigant refused to pay. That would be most inconvenient. Nevertheless, if the Legislature had given a jurisdiction to the magistrate, you could not help it; but it is a very strong ground for thinking that the Legislature did not intend to give it to the magistrates. The 69th section, after saying that the board are to give notice to the owners of what they require to be done, and that, if the owners do not do it, the board may do it themselves, then says, "and the expenses incurred by them in so doing shall be paid by the owners in default according to the frontage of their respective premises, and in such proportion as shall be settled by the surveyor, or, in case of dispute, as shall be settled by arbitration." So that here it is laid down that the expenses incurred by the local board of health during the works shall be paid by the owners in the proportion to be settled in the manner described. Then it goes on to say, "and such expenses may be recovered from the last mentioned owners in a summary manner." In the case in the Common Pleas, of Bayley v. Wilkinson, the contention was that, when the parties came before the arbitrator to apportion the expenses, he was not merely to consider in what proportion the sum was to be divided amongst them, but it was urged strongly that the arbitrators must also inquire as to how the money had been expended; that they are not merely to say how much they are to divide among the owners, but that they must look to see if the expense has been incurred. But then the Court of Common Pleas decided very distinctly that the Legislature did not intend that at all—that, as it was explained by Erle, C. J., the Legislature, knowing that the local board of health were a public body, might trust them primâ facie, and that the arbitrator was simply to see to the apportionment. Willes, J. cities very many sections of the Act pointing out that though as against the party assessed, the local board is to be supposed to be right, nevertheless that that does not apply when the magistrate is asked to enforce payment in a summary manner. Again, it is urged that, though the arbitrator might possibly not review what the local board had done in apportioning the expenses, nevertheless the justices may in a summary manner decide it. I must say that when once it is granted that the decision of the Common Pleas is a right decision, in saying that the arbitrator cannot do it, a multo fortiori, the two justices enforcing in a summary manner the sum to be recovered cannot do it. Then Mr. Bulwer's argument endeavoured to make out this distinction. In the case of Bayley v. Wilkinson the contention seems to have been that the local board of health did the works in a wasteful manner, and expended much more than was necessary. The contention that seems to be made here is, that the local board of health have improperly charged in this account some expenses really incurred somewhere else. I cannot conceive the distinction between them: if the one would be a matter for a magistrate to inquire into, the other would be also; but I cannot see the distinction which would make the one inquirable and the other not, unless the Common Pleas are wrong. You could not make that distinction on which Mr. Bulwer mainly rested his argument. Then comes what would be the strength of his argument upon the matter, contrary to the decision of the Common Pleas no doubt, which is binding upon us. The strength of his argument, as it seemed to me, was this: It is a possible thing, no doubt, that the local board of health may either charge an utterly wasteful and erroneous and large sum, or they may have, in mistake, charged sums which they ought not to charge in estimating expenses which they say that they have incurred; and in that case it would be very hard, if there is not some remedy provided for the man who may be charged too much, and who is obliged to pay down his proportion of a sum which he ought not to have been charged. But then, as I find, comes sect. 120, which seems to me expressly to provide that, when the local board have done anything, where they are empowered to recover any expenses incurred in a summary manner, any person who shall deem himself to be aggrieved by the decision of the local board thereupon, may within seven days after the notice, address a memorial to the general board, for which is now substituted the Secretary of State, and get such relief as shall be necessary. If the fact were, whether the time has now elapsed or not, I do not know; if the fact were, that the local board had charged 1000*l.* when in truth and in fact they ought only to have charged 800*l.*, I cannot doubt that the person memorialising the Home Secretary and stating that fact, would obtain the relief he might require, and that the Home Secretary would direct the board not to charge 1000*l.* but only 800*l.* That, I think, is a sufficient remedy, without making the very inconvenient regulation that every person who chooses to dispute the matter may require this very difficult inquiry to be gone into before the magistrate, who is asked to enforce it summarily; in truth, it seems to me that the magistrate, in enforcing this demand for an apportionment of the expenses, is very much like the one who was called upon to issue a distress warrant to enforce a rate. A rate is good unless it is appealed against to the quarter sessions, and the magistrate cannot inquire into it. The expenses are to be enforced by the magistrates summarily, unless they are appealed against to the Home Secretary, and the magistrates cannot enter into the facts.

THE NORTH OF ENGLAND RAILWAY COMPANY (apps.) v. LANGBAURGH (resp.)

Railway road constructed by railway company over their railway—Liability to repair road of the bridge and the approaches—8 Vict. c. 20, s. 46.

A railway company having carried a road over the railway by a bridge, is bound to keep both bridge and road, and all the approaches thereto in repair, and such repair includes not only the structure of the bridge and the approaches, but the metalling of the road on both.

THIS was an appeal under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, from the determination of us, the undersigned, Thomas Chaloner, Esq., and George Jeffery Morehead, clerk in Holy Orders, two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the North Riding of the county of York in petty sessions assembled at Gisborough in the said riding on the 1st Nov. 1870.

By the North Yorkshire and Cleveland Railway Act 1854, and the North Yorkshire and Cleveland Railway Act 1855, the North Yorkshire and Cleveland Railway Company were empowered to construct certain railways, and to cross certain public highways by means of bridges over such highways. The Railway Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 is incorporated with both those Acts. By the North-Eastern Railway (Bedale and Leyburn and Rosedale Railways Amalgamation) Act 1859, the North Yorkshire and Cleveland Railway Company was dissolved, and the undertaking of that company was vested in the appellants' company.

The North Yorkshire and Cleveland Railway Company erected the bridges hereinafter referred to, and constructed the embankments which formed the approaches, together with the fences on each side thereof, and properly formed and put the roads over the same bridges and slopes into a proper state and condition. The appellants have maintained the roadways over two of the bridges hereinafter referred to, and the slopes thereof in a proper state of repair up to the early part of the present year, since which time no repairs whatever have been made by the appellants to the roads over those two bridges, or the slopes thereof. There was no evidence before us in respect of any repairs having been done to the roadways across the other two bridges hereinafter referred to and the slopes thereof.

The appellants have maintained, and still continue to maintain, the structures of the four bridges, and the earthwork and embankments forming the approaches thereto, as also the fences on either side thereof, respectively.

On the 18th Oct. 1870, the respondents served upon the appellants a notice in writing, under sect. 65 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, that an application would be made to us for an order upon the appellants to repair the four several bridges therein specified, and the roads over such bridges, with the immediate approaches and fences connected therewith, which were in such notice alleged to be out of repair. Upon the hearing of this application it was admitted on behalf of the respondents that the structures of all the said four bridges, and the earthworks and embankments forming the approaches thereof and the fences, were in a proper state of repair.

It was proved to our satisfaction that the roadway across and over two of the four several bridges and approaches had been repaired by the appellants up to the early part of the present year, and that the roadways over all the said four bridges and the approaches thereof, are now in a bad state of repair. The four bridges are detached from each other, and situate in four different townships, each of which townships separately maintains its own highways.

The aggregate extent of the roadways over all the said bridges, and the approaches thereof, is 1254 yards.

It was contended before us on behalf of the respondents, that under sect. 46 of the Railway Clauses Consolidaton Act 1845, and under the decisions of this court in the cases of North Staffordshire Railway Company v. Dale (8 E & B. 836); and Leach v. North Staffordshire Railway Company (29 L. J. 151, M. C.), the appellants were bound to keep in repair not only the structures of the bridges and the earthworks and embankments, but also the roadways over the bridges and the approaches thereto, including therein the metalling of such roadways and approaches.

On behalf of the appellants the cases of The Waterford and Limerick Railway Company v. Kearney (12 Ir. Com. Law Rep. 224); Foxberry v. Waterford and Limerick Railway Company (13 Ir. Com. Law Rep. 494; and London and North-Western Railway Company v. Surveyor of Highways of the Township of Skerton (33 L. J. 158, M. C.), were cited, and it was contended that sects. 46 and 65 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 were equally applicable to cases where the railway is carried over a highway by means of a bridge, and where the highway is carried over the railway by the same means, and that, therefore, the appellants were not liable to keep in repair the metalling of the roadways.

We felt bound by the authority of the cases of the Staffordshire Railway Company v. Dale, and Leach v. North Staffordshire Railway Company, and decided that the appellants were liable to keep in repair, not only the bridges, but the roadways over the bridges, and over the approaches thereto, including the metalling of the roads on the bridges and approaches. And we ordered that the appellants should, before the 1st Jan. next, put the roadways over all the said bridges, and the approaches thereto into complete repair. A copy of our order is hereunto annexed, and to be taken as part of this case.

The appellants being dissatisfied with our determination as being erroneous in point of law, have applied to us to state a case setting forth the facts and grounds of our determination for the opinion of this court.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the appellants are liable to keep in repair not only the structures of the bridges, but the roadways over the same and the approaches thereto, including therein the metalling of such roadways. If so, the order of us, the said justices, is to stand; if not it is to be quashed.

THOMAS CHALONER.
G. J. MORRHEAD.

By sect. 46 of the 8 Vict. c. 20 (Railway Clauses Consolidation Act 1845), it is enacted that—

If the line of the railway cross any turnpike road or public highway, then (except where otherwise provided by the special Act), either such road shall be carried over the railway, or the railway shall be carried over such road by means of a bridge, of the height and width, and with the ascent or descent, by this or the special Act in that behalf provided; and such bridge, with the immediate approaches, and all other necessary works connected therewith shall be executed, and at all times thereafter maintained, at the expense of the company: Provided always, that, with the consent of two or more justices in petty sessions as after mentioned, it shall be lawful for the company to carry the railway across any highway other than a public carriage road on the level.

Pollock, Q. C. appeared for the appellants.—The question is, whether, when a public road goes over a railway, the railway is liable to repair not only the bridge, but the road itself? [COCKBURN, C. J.—Were they bound to keep the structure in repair?] Yes. [COCKBURN, C. J.—And were they bound to make the road?] They were. [COCKBURN, C. J.—Then why are they not bound to keep such road in repair equally with the structure?] The highway board should keep the road itself in repair, since it is for the use of the inhabitants. The company are not liable to keep the road in repair when it passes under the railway. In The Waterford and Limerick Railway Company (appls.) v. Kearney (resp.) (12 Ir. Com. L. Rep. 224), it appeared that a railway company carried their railway over a county presentment road by means of a bridge, and in the course of the construction of their works, in order to give sufficient head room under the bridge, sloped away the road on each side of the bridge, but on the completion of their works placed the road in a state of permanent repair, and it was held that the road was not an "immediate approach" or a "necessary work connected" with the bridge within the meaning of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, and, consequently, that the company having put the road into a state of permanent repair, was not bound to keep it in repair. The same was held in Foxberry v. The Waterford and Limerick Railway Company (13 Irish Com. L. Rep. 494). In the English case of The London and North Western Railway Company (appls.) v. The Surveyor of the Highway of Skerton (resps.) (33 L. J. 158, M. C.), there it was held that where a railway is carried over a highway by means of a bridge, no liability to keep in repair the immediate approaches on each side of the bridge is cast upon the company by reason of any of the provisions in the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, even though the company have lowered the level of the old highway in making those approaches. [COCKBURN, C.J.—Those were all decided in cases where the railway went over the road.] The principle in the same, one clause governs both kinds of road. [LUSH, J. —The company are bound to execute and maintain. You admit that they must execute, why should they not also maintain?] There is no reason why, having executed the building of the bridge, they should also maintain the road. The principle is the same, whether the road goes over or under the railway. The 46th section makes no distinction.

Quain, Q.C., for the respondent, was not called upon.

COCKBURN, C.J.—You are asking us to reverse our former decisions upon this very point. In The North Staffordshire Railway Company (apps.) v. Dale and others (resps.) this court held that a railway company having carried a road over the railway by a bridge is bound to keep both bridge and road and all the approaches thereto in repair, and such repair includes not only the structure of the bridge and the approaches, but the metalling of the road on both. The same argument was used in that case which you are now using. The same question was afterwards decided in Leach (app.) v. The North Staffordshire Railway Company (resps.) (20 L. J. 150, M. C..) If you wish to question these authorities you must do so in the Exchequer Chamber. They are at present binding on us.

ATKINS (app.) v. DUTTON (resp.)

Vaccination Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 84), s. 31—Child—Parent summoned, refusing to produce—Order for vaccination.

The Vaccination Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 84), s. 31, provides that upon an information to a justice of the peace, by the appointed officer, that any child under the age of fourteen years has not been successfully vaccinated, and that notice given to the parent or person having the custody of such child to procure its being vaccinated has been disregarded, "the justice may summon such parent or person to appear with the child before him at a certain time and place, and upon the appearance if the justice shall find after such examination as he shall deem necessary that the child has not been vaccinated, nor has already had the small pox, he may, if he see fit, make an order under his hand and seal directing such child to be vaccinated within a certain time," and a penalty is imposed for disobedience of the order.

The respondent was summoned under the above section to appear with his child before a magistrate. He appeared, but refused to produce the child. The magistrate was satisfied on the evidence given before him that the child was a year and eleven months old, and had not been vaccinated, nor had had the small pox, but he thought that he had no jurisdiction, upon the appearance of the defendant without the child, to make an order for vaccination:

Held, that the production of the child before the magistrate was not a condition precedent to the making of the order, and that upon the facts stated, such order should have been made.

CASE stated under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, by the Stipendiary Justice for Wolverhampton.

1. The defendant was summoned to appear with his child before me on the 18th Jan. 1871, to show cause why an order should not be made directing his child to be vaccinated.

2. The summons was taken out under the Vaccination Act 1867, and was as follows (omitting the formal parts):

Whereas information in writing has been laid by John Dutton, an officer appointed by the Board of Guardians of the Wolverhampton Union, to prosecute persons charged with offences against the Vaccination Act 1867, that he has reason to believe that one Lydia Louisa Jane Atkins, a child under the age of fourteen years being within the said union has not been successfully vaccinated and that he has given notice to you, being the father of such child, to procure its being vaccinated, and that this notice has been disregarded, these are therefore to command you to be and appear with the said child before me on Wednesday the 18th day of Jan. instant at twelve o'clock at noon at the Police Court, Wolverhampton, to answer to the said information, and to show cause why an order should not be made directing the said child to be vaccinated.

3. By the Vaccination Act 1867, it is enacted and provided as follows:

30 & 31 Vict. c. 84, s. 31. If any registrar or any officer appointed by the guardians to enforce the provisions of this Act shall give information in writing to a justice of the peace that he has good reason to believe that any child under the age of fourteen years being within the union or parish for which the informant acts has not been successfully vaccinated, and that he has given notice to the parent or person having the custody of such child to procure its being vaccinated, and that this notice has been disregarded, the justice may summon such parent or person to appear with the child before him at a certain time and place, and upon the appearance, if the justice shall find after such examination as he shall deem necessary that the child has not been vaccinated, nor has already had the small pox, he may, if he see fit, make an order under his hand and seal directing such child to be vaccinated within a certain time; and if, at the expiration of such time, the child shall not have been vaccinated, or shall not be shown to be then unfit to be vaccinated, or to be insusceptible of vaccination, the person upon whom such an order shall have been made, shall be proceeded against summarily, and unless he can show some reasonable ground for his omission to carry the order into effect, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty shillings. . . .

The statute of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43 (except sect. 11), shall apply to all proceedings under this Act.(a)

4. The defendant, who had been previously convicted by me under sects. 16 and 29 of the Vaccination Act, appeared to the summons on the 18th Jan. 1871, and refused to produce his child unless compelled by law to do so.

5. There were several adjournments of the case, which was heard by me on the 22nd Feb. 1871, in the presence of the defendant, who appeared without his child.

6. I was satisfied on the evidence given before me, and I find that the child was about a year and eleven months old, and had not been vaccinated nor had the small pox.

7. For the defendant it was contended that under sect. 31 of the Vaccination Act 1867 I had no jurisdiction to make an order for the vaccination of the child unless she was present. That I had no power to compel the production of the child, or to enforce the appearance of a child of her age or to proceed under the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 2, ex parte to the hearing of the complaint against the defendant as though he was a party failing to appear to his summons, as in fact he had appeared.

8. I had doubt on the matter, but I was of opinion that sect, 31 of the Vaccination Act 1867 could not be construed as merely directory, but that the section in providing specially for the appearance of the child gives jurisdiction to the justice to make an order only upon the appearance of the parent or person having the custody of the child with the child before him, and after such examination as he (upon the appearance) shall deem necessary, and that I had no jurisdiction upon the appearance of the defendant without the child, and in the absence of the child, to make the order for her vaccination.

9. I was of opinion that I had no power to compel the defendant to produce the child, or to enforce the appearance of a child so young, and that it was very doubtful (even if the construction put by me on the principal Act is wrong) if I could proceed ex parte to the hearing of the complaint, as the words of the stat. 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 2, which gives power to the justices to proceed ex parte, seems to give that power only in cases where the defendant does not personally appear.

10. I therefore declined to make an order.

11. At the request of the complainant I granted a case, and the question for the opinion of the court is "Whether I was right in point of law in declining to make the order asked for."

12. If the court be of opinion that I was wrong in point of law, I respectfully request the court to remit the matter to me, with the opinion of the court thereon.

J. SPOONER.

6th March, 1871.

J. O. Griffits, for the appellant.—The question is whether the parent, when summoned, could avoid the effect of sect. 31 by not producing the child. The provisions of Jervis's Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43) are, with the exception of sect 3, incorporated with the Vaccination Act. Sect. 1 of Jervis's Act enables justices to issue a summons, and sect. 2 provides that on the non-appearance of the party summoned a warrant may be issued, or if where a summons shall be so issued as aforesaid, and upon the day and at the place appointed on and by the said summons for the appearance of the party so summoned, such party shall fail to appear accordingly in obedience to such summons, then and in every such case, if it be proved upon oath or affirmation to the justice or justices then present, that such summons was duly served upon such party a reasonable time before the time so appointed for his appearance as aforesaid, it shall be lawful for such justice or justices of the peace to proceed ex parte to the hearing of such information or complaint, and to adjudicate thereon as fully and effectually to all intents and purposes as if such party had personally appeared before him or them in obedience to the said summons." Here, however, the party summoned certainly did appear, so it is at least doubtful whether Jervis's Act is of any avail. [BLACKBURN, J.—The penalty in the Vaccination Act seems to be imposed for disobeying the order, not for frustrating the making of the order. MELLOR, J.—The magistrate seems to have read the section thus: "if the parent chooses to produce the child I can go on; if he does not, my summons is brutum fulmen, and I cannot proceed." But I think that the word "examination" means, not examination of the child, but of the evidence, and the magistrate had made "such an examination as he thought fit," although the child was not before him.] The enactment would be rendered quite useless if it might be defeated in every case by the parent not producing his child.

No counsel appeared for the respondent.

BLACKBURN, J.—The meaning of the Act of Parliament must be that the parent may be summoned before the magistrate, and he may be directed to bring the child, but his doing so is not made a condition precedent to the making of the order, and if the magistrate, after examining the child or not, is convinced on the circumstances, that the child has not been successfully vaccinated and that the notices to vaccinate have been disregarded, he may convict the parent. It would be very absurd if the Legislature had said that the appearance of the child should be a condition precedent. I think therefore the magistrate should have made the order which he has not made.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. It may be very advisable that the child should be brought but if the parent will not bring it his contumacy cannot be supposed to interfere with the magistrate proceeding, and to obstruct the operation of the Act of Parliament. It cannot be said there is not a colour for the difficulty, as the magistrate supposed that he only had power to make the order on the appearance of the party with the child. He desires that the case may be remitted if we think he ought to proceed, and I presume that if we do so he will then make the order.

TOLLET AND ANOTHER (apps.) v. THOMAS (resp.).

Gaming—Instrument of, upon a game of chance —31 & 32 Vict. c. 52, s. 3.

The appellants were convicted under sect. 3 of the 31 & 32 Vict., c. 52 (The Vagrant Act Amendment Act 1868), for having at a public place unlawfully gamed with a certain instrument of gaming at a game of chance. The instrument in question was a machine having on it numbers, beside each of which were three holes, and behind those again were figures which, by a mechanical contrivance, were made to shift by the turning of a key, so that any number from 1 to 999 could be exhibited behind these holes. On the top of the machine was the word "total," and beside it were holes in which could be exhibited in a similar manner figures shifting on the turn of the key. The appellants took this machine to a race-course, and there appropriated each of the numbers to designate the particular horse to run in a race, and any person who wished to bet on a particular horse deposited with them half-a-crown, and received a ticket with the number appropriated to the horse selected by the better; and the appellants, by a turn of the key, altered the figures, increasing the sum indicated alongside of that number by one, and, as the machine was contrived, by the same turn of the key increasing the sum indicated by the figures beside the total by one. Thus, if at the beginning when the holes were filled up by cyphers the first half-a-crown was deposited in exchange for a ticket bearing the number one, the twist of the key would change the figures exhibited beside number one from 0 0 0 to 0 0 1, and at the same time change the figures exhibited beside the total so as there also to show one. When the race was run, the holders of the tickets which had then the number appropriated to the winning horse, were entitled to divide among them the amount of the total, less 10 per cent. discount, which was to be deducted by the appellants, the proprietors of the machine: Held, that this was a wagering with an instrument of gaming on a game of chance within the meaning of sect. 3 of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 52.

THIS was a case stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, upon a conviction by two justices of Wolverhampton of the appellants, under sect. 3 of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 52 (The Vagrant Act Amendment Act 1868) for gaming in a public place with an instrument of gaming at a game of chance.

The case stated as follows:

1. At a petty sessions held at Wolverhampton, before Henry Walker and John Ford, Esqrs., two of the justices for the borough, on the 11th Aug. 1870, Charles Tollet the younger, and John Lyshon (hereinafter called the appellants), then being in custody of the borough police, were charged, at the instance of James Thomas, inspector of police for the said borough (hereinafter called the respondent), under sect. 3 of the statute 31 & 32 Vict. c. 52, for that they, the said appellants, on the 10th Aug. then instant, at the said borough, did in a certain open and public place there situate to which the public has access, (to wit), the Wolverhampton racecourse, unlawfully game with a certain article used as an instrument or means of wagering on gaming at a game of chance, contrary to the statute in that case made and provided. And upon the hearing of such charge the appellants were convicted and adjudged to be rogues and vagabonds within the intent and meaning of the 5 Geo. 4, c. 83, and were sentenced to seven days imprisonment with hard labour.

2. The following facts were either proved before us or admitted by both parties: That the respondent, James Thomas, an inspector of police for the said borough, was on duty on the said racecourse on the 10th Aug. last, and saw the appellants about one hundred yards from the grand stand; they were standing on stools, the machine which he seized and produced in court, called the "Pari Mutuel," was between them; they were both shouting, "Now, gentlemen, what will you back; what will you lay your money on?" He saw them receive money and give tickets similar to those he produced; that he saw that going on during two races; that the public had access to the racecourse; that he had seen similar machines the day before on the racecourse, and that he did not previously caution the appellants; that he saw no money paid over; that when a person paid half-a-crown he had a ticket given him, and that the machine was used as a means of registering the gross total of money received, and exhibiting such total to those persons who had been induced to bet on the race. Edward Evans, a sergeant of police for the said borough, also deposed that he was on duty on the racecourse on the 10th Aug. inst., and saw the appellants there; that they were standing on stools, and had hold of the machine produced; that they were inviting the public to lay out their money, and he saw the appellants receive money and give tickets; that the contingency for the deposit was the result of each race. It was also admitted by the appellants that they deducted a commission of 10 per cent. from the gross total of money received.

3. On the part of the appellants it was contended that there had been no offence committed within the intent and meaning of the 3rd section of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 52, inasmuch as the appellants had not been using an instrument of gaming as contemplated by the said section. That the instrument must be one upon the action of which the whole issue of the bet entirely depended, and that there was no evidence to show that the instrument used by the appellants was an instrument of that kind, inasmuch as the event to be determined did not in any way depend upon the instrument. That it was simply a betting-book upon a large scale upon which were recorded the amounts staked upon each horse. It was further contended that no offence had been committed within the intent and meaning of the said statute, inasmuch as that section only applies to playing or betting by way of wagering on gaming by the person using the instrument, and that there was no evidence to show that the appellants were playing or betting by way of wagering on gaming and further that the facts adduced did not support the charge.

4. On the part of the respondent it was contended that the evidence would fully justify a conviction, and that the appellants, by inviting the public to lay out their money, and by their receiving money to be disposed of by them according to the result of the races, and the instrument being used as a means of registering the amount of money received, and also as an advertisement of the process of betting, was essentially playing with an instrument of gaming within the intent and meaning of the said section.

5. The justices were of opinion that the machine was an advertisement to facilitate gaming, and was a means of wagering on gaming within the intent and meaning of the 3rd section of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 52, and gave the determination against the appellants in the manner before stated.

6. The questions for the opinion of the court, therefore, are, whether the appellants, using the instrument called the Pari Mutuel, on the Wolverhampton racecourse, which the justices held to be a public place within the meaning of the Act, in the manner stated in this case, was a means of playing or wagering on gaming at a game of chance and a commission of an offence against the 3rd section of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 52, which section is as follows:

> Every person playing or betting by way of wagering or gaming in any street, road, highway, or other open and public place, or in any place to which the public have, or are permitted to have access, at or with any table or instrument of gaming, or any card, coin, or token or other article used as an instrument or means of such wagering or gaming, at any game or pretended game of chance, shall be deemed a rogue and vagabond, and punished under the provisions of 5 Geo. 4. c. 83.

If the court should be of opinion that the said conviction was legally and properly made, and the appellants were in reality committing an offence within the meaning of the said statute (the Vagrant Act Amendment Act 1868), the said conviction is to stand.

But if the court should be of opinion otherwise, then the said charge against the appellants is to be dismissed; in the meantime the appellants are bound over in recognisances to appear and abide the decision of the court on the present case.

A copy of the conviction of the said appellants is annexed to the case.

Given under our hands this 27th Sept. 1870, at the borough aforesaid. HENRY WALKER.
JOHN FORD.

By the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 52, s. 3 (The Vagrant Act Amendment Act 1868), it is enacted that—

Every person playing or betting by way of wagering or gaming in any street, road, highway, or other open and public place, or in any place to which the public have or are permitted to have access, at or with any table or instrument of gaming, or any coin, card, token, or other article used as an instrument or means of such wagering on gaming at any game or pretended game of chance shall be deemed a rogue and vagabond within the true intent and meaning of the recited Act (5 Geo. 4, c. 83), and as such may be convicted and punished under the provisions of that Act

Harris appeared for the appellants. — This conviction cannot be supported. It is necessary to prove six things: First, that the appellants were playing or betting—playing under this section means gaming for money. There was no proof of this. [BLACKBURN, J.—You say that if the party himself does not play, though he allows others to play, he is not liable.] Not quite so, as in that case there would be a setting up a game. But in this case there was no evidence of any playing or betting in the proper understanding of those terms. Secondly, the betting must be by way of wagering or gaming. There was no evidence that the appellants wagered or gamed. Thirdly, the place must be a public place, and I must admit that this was such a place. Fourthly, it must be with an instrument of gaming. Both the old Vagrant Act and the present one were directed to tables and things of that sort, which were instruments of gaming, and which themselves had a particular action. The using of the instrument alone is not sufficient unless the party himself plays or bets. [BLACKBURN, J.—I take it that if he produces the instrument for others to play with, he would be using it within the meaning of the Act]. Fifthly, it must be shown that this is an instrument of gaming. This is simply an instrument for registering bets; it is in effect nothing more than a betting book, and what it does might be equally well done upon a sheet of paper. If this is an instrument of gaming, so would be anything which records a bet. Sixthly, it must be "at any game or pretended game of chance." This was a horse race, which cannot be said to be a game of chance. In Hirst v. Molesbury (L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 130; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 555) it was held that a dog race was not a game of chance. [LUSH, J.—You say it must be an instrument which in some way itself decides the game.] Yes, and the party must either bet or play. This is an instrument the object of which is merely to supply the defect of memory, and to register the bets of persons.

James, Q. C. for the respondent.—This is an instrument of gaming. It is more than a record of betting. A betting book would be merely memoranda to refresh the memory; this is of a different nature and for a different purpose. Persons bet by means of this machine. A mere record of bets would not enable a person to bet as this machine does, for no one would know who the others are who have bet upon horses. He would judge of how to bet by seeing how others have bet. [COCKBURN, C. J.—The difficulty is, that the instrument must be used with reference to a game of chance. A horse race is certainly not a game of chance.] It is a chance to the party who bets, as he takes the money of those who have betted on the horses that do not win. He runs a chance quite apart from the winning of a particular horse. The betting cannot be worked without the table.

Harris in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 23. — COCKBURN, C. J.— This is a case stated for the opinion of the court by two justices who had convicted the appellants under 31 & 32 Vict. c. 52, which enacts, "that any person playing or betting in a public place at or with any table or instrument of gaming, or any coin, card, token, or other article used as an instrument or means of such wagering 'on' gaming at any game or pretended game of chance, may be convicted and punished as a rogue and vagabond." There seems no doubt that the word "on" in this statute is, by a clerical error, substituted for "or," and that the statute is to be read as if the word was "or." The article which was actually used on this occasion is not sufficiently described in the case; but it was produced in court, and we had the opportunity of personal inspection. It was a machine having on it numbers, beside each of which were three holes, and behind those again there were figures, which, by a mechanical contrivance, were made to shift by turning a key, so that any number from 1 to 999 could be exhibited behind these holes. On the top of the machine was the word "Total," and beside it were holes which could be exhibited in a similar manner figures shifting on the turn of the key. The appellants took this machine to the racecourse, and there appropriated each of the numbers to designate the particular horse to run in a race, and any person who wished to bet on a particular horse deposited with them half a crown, and received the ticket with the number appropriated to the horse selected by the bettor; and the appellants by a turn of the key altered the figures increasing the sum indicated alongside of that number by one, and as the machine was contrived by the same turn of the key, increasing the sum indicated by the figures beside the total by one. Thus, if at the beginning, when all the holes were filled up by cyphers, the first half a crown was deposited in exchange for a ticket bearing the No. 1, the twist of the key would change the figures exhibited beside No. 1 from 0 0 0 to 0 0 1, and at the same time change the figures exhibited beside the total, so as there also to show 1. When the race was run the holders of tickets which had then the number appropriated to the winning horse were entitled to divide among them the amount of the total, less 10 per cent. discount, which was to be detained by the appellants, the proprietors of the machine. Thus, with ingenuity worthy to be employed in a better cause, it was contrived that each person who was induced to bet might see at a glance what was the amount of the odds offered him if he bet on any particular horse, but (and this is material to be observed) the state of the odds was liable to be changed before the race was run. To illustrate what is meant, let us suppose that at some particular time the figures opposite total indicated that ninety-nine half-crowns had been deposited, and those opposite No. 1 showed that for some reason or other no ticket had been taken out for that horse, anyone seeing and understanding this would know that if he deposited his half-crown and took a ticket for No. 1, thus swelling the total to a hundred, he would, if things remained unaltered till the race was run, and the horse designated by No. 1 won the race, as holder of this ticket, receive ninety half-crowns, but he would also know that the odds were liable to be altered. For example, if a hundred persons subsequently deposited half-crowns so as to swell the total to 200, and none took tickets for No. 1, he would in the event of his winning receive 180 half-crowns; but if nineteen of those new depositors took tickets for No. 1, he would, in the event of winning, only receive nine half-crowns, for the total would have to be divided between the holders of No. 1 ticket and the other nineteen. The person, therefore, who by means of this machine is induced to part with his half-crown does so on a speculation, the chance of remuneration depending upon two events, one, viz., whether his horse wins determining whether he shall get back anything; the other event, viz., how many gamblers shall deposit their half-crowns, and upon what tickets determining how much he shall receive in the event of his winning. Over neither event could he by any scheme or effort of his exercise any control. There is no doubt that the bet was made in a public place. The question for our consideration is whether the machine referred to in the case is an instrument or means of wagering or gaming at a game of chance within the meaning of the Act (31 & 32 Vict. c. 52, s. 3). This again resolves itself into two questions—first, is the machine an instrument of wagering or gaming? secondly, is the game on which wagering took place under the circumstances stated a game of chance? On the first question it was urged that the instrument was not an instrument of wagering, inasmuch as the wagering took place quite independently of it, the using of the machine being confined to the registering of the bets made, and that a book or large sheet of paper might, though, no doubt, less distinctly, have been made available for the same purpose. This argument, though at first a specious one, will not, in our opinion, hold. The machine in question is a mechanical contrivance for enabling persons willing to bet on the event of a race to ascertain the state of bets already made on the different horses about to run, and to calculate the chance of success according as they may bet upon any particular horse. There can be no doubt that it materially assists the parties resorting to it in the operation of betting, and we cannot doubt, therefore, that it is used as an instrument or means of betting. Whether some other contrivance might be resorted to which would not be an instrument or means of wagering within the statute, is a question we may have to decide hereafter, and with which we need not trouble ourselves now. It is enough to say that the instrument in question is intended to assist persons in wagering, and undoubtedly has that effect, this being enough to bring it within the words, as it certainly is within the meaning of the statute. The second question is whether the wagering thus carried on is wagering on a game of chance. It was urged upon us in the argument that the betting here being on the event of a horse race, it could not be considered as wagering on a game of chance, a horse race not properly coming within such a definition. It is unnecessary to determine whether if this instrument had been used simply for registering bets on the event of a horse race the case would have been within the statute. Whether a horse race be in itself a game of chance or not, we can entertain no doubt that if some additional element of chance be introduced the wagering on a horse race may be converted into a game of chance. Thus, to use a familiar illustration, a lottery in which each individual draws a particular horse, and on the success of which the winning the stakes depends, would, we cannot doubt, constitute—that is between the parties to such a lottery—a game of chance. In the present instance, an element of chance is introduced, which, though not having any reference to the main event, namely, the result of the race in the winning of a particular horse, is yet essential to making the wagering laid upon the winning horse profitable to the better. The winning of the horse betted upon is, of course, the primary condition of the wager being won. But whether the winning of the wager shall be productive of any profit to the winner, and more especially what the amount of that profit shall be, depends upon the state of the bet with reference to the number of bets laid on or against the winning horse, a state of things fluctuating from one minute to another throughout the duration of the betting. Now this being something wholly independent of the issue of the race, as well as of the will and judgment of the winner, depending as it does upon the will and caprice of the other persons betting, is a matter obviously of uncertainty and chance to the individual better, more especially in the earlier period. This being so, and as there can be no doubt that the racecourse on which this betting was carried on was a public place within the meaning of the statute, we are of opinion that the conviction was right, and must be affirmed.

Assault and battery—Information for—Dismissal of information—Certificate—Requiring a recognisance to keep the peace.

An information was laid against A. B. for an assault and battery, and a summons issued against him for that offence. At the hearing, the justices dismissed the information and gave him a certificate, but they ordered him in respect of the said charge to enter into his own recognisance in 50l. to keep the peace for six months:

Held, that notwithstanding the justices dismissed the information, they were legally justified in requiring a recognisance to keep the peace.

THIS was an application for a certiorari to remove a recognisance to keep the peace into this court for the purpose of being quashed.

The application was made upon an affidavit of Mr. David Davis, of Newtown, Montgomeryshire, wine and spirit merchant, which stated that on the 14th March last John Hale laid an information against him, the said David Davis, before one John

(a) This case had been previously argued in Hilary Term, in the Bail Court, before Mellor and Lush, JJ., who took time to consider their judgment, but who ultimately directed that the case should be re-argued before the full court.

Price Drew, Esq., a justice for the said county, for that he did, on the said 14th of March, unlawfully assault and beat the said John Hale; that on the 15th of the said month he was served with a summons for assaulting and beating the said John Hale; that he duly appeared at the time and place mentioned in the said summons, before the said John Price Drew, T. W. Hare, and J. C. Bayard, Esqrs., three justices, when the said summons came on for hearing; that the said justices after having heard the evidence adduced in support of the said charge, adjudicated that he was not guilty of the said charge and dismissed the said information, and thereupon they granted him a certificate of such dismissal, which said certificate was in the words and figures following: (The certificate was set out), that the only charge made against him before the said justices was the aforesaid charge of assault, and that no evidence was given against him except in support of the said charge which was dismissed. Yet the said justices upon the hearing of the said information ordered and directed him in respect of the said charge of assault, so dismissed as aforesaid, to enter into his own recognisances in the sum of 50*l.* to keep the peace for six months.

Morgan Lloyd, for the applicant.—The only charge against Mr. Davis was for an assault, which the justices dismissed, giving him a certificate which is a bar to further proceedings for the same assault. [COCKBURN, C. J.—The dismissal of the charge of assault may be said to have been sub modo. The justices may well have thought that there was no actual assault, but that there were threats which called for protection.] There was no information calling upon him to enter into any recognisance to keep the peace. [BLACKBURN, J.—I am not aware that any such information is necessary when the party is before the justices.] No threats were proved to have been uttered by the defendant. [COCKBURN, C. J.—It often occurs that the justices say no assault has been proved, but there has been such violent conduct shown that we shall require a recognisance to keep the peace. MELLOR, J.—The conduct of the party may have fallen short of an actual assault, but it may nevertheless have been sufficient to justify his being bound over to keep the peace. He may have used violent words, which though not an assault may have shown an intention to commit one.] There were two courses open to the complainant: he may have charged the defendant with the using of threats if those only had been used, and so have had him bound over; or if an actual assault had been committed, he may have laid his information for it. [COCKBURN, C. J.—There was an information of an actual assault; but in the opinion of the justices no actual assault was committed, but they may have thought that there was an intention to commit one.] By the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 44, the justices are required to give a certificate upon the dismissal of a charge of assault, which they gave in this case; and by the 45th section such certificate releases him from all further or other proceedings, civil or criminal, for the same cause; and it has been held that the effect of such certificate is a bar to all other proceedings founded upon the same cause, though in a different shape. If the justices had convicted of the assault, they may undoubtedly have required him to have entered into his recognisance to keep the peace. [COCKBURN, C.J.—There must have been something more in the case than the bare assault.] The affidavit negatives all other causes. There was no evidence of threats. [COCKBURN, C. J.—Threats need not be by words; they may consist of gestures. The justices may well have said it has not come to an actual assault, or, the assault was of too trivial a nature, and, therefore, we will not convict of that offence, but there is enough shown to warrant us in binding over the party to keep the peace.] The certi cate would in such case be a bar. [BLACKBURN, J.—As to an action or proceeding, by way of punishment. But this is only a precautionary proceeding to prevent a breach of the peace.]

COCKBURN, C. J.—We think the magistrates were justified in the course they adopted, and we ought not to grant the rule.

Rule refused.

JONES v. OWEN.

Negligence—Coupled greyhounds—High road.

Upon a reference of all matters in difference without pleadings, the arbitrator found that the defendant had been guilty of negligence in that his two greyhounds, coupled together, rushed against the plaintiff on a high road, knocked him down, and broke his leg.

Held, that this finding was good in law, although there was no evidence of scienter.

THIS was a special case stated by an arbitrator, to whom all matters in difference between the parties had been referred, without pleadings.

The plaintiff complained of the negligence of the defendant in the conduct and management of two greyhounds belonging to the defendant, whereby the plaintiff alleged that he received injury, and the arbitrator found that the following were the facts attending the occurrence.—

The plaintiff, who was a farm bailiff, and about forty-five years of age, was, in the month of Aug. 1868, about 9 o'clock in the evening, walking on a highway about fifty yards outside the town of Carnarvon. He heard the bark of a dog, and two greyhounds suddenly met him, and were in the act of passing by, one on each side of him, when he was thrown violently down in consequence of a chain or piece of rope with which the dogs were coupled together coming in contact with his legs.

The plaintiff first saw the dogs when they were about three or four yards from him; they were then running towards him as fast as they could: he had not time to avoid them, and owing to its being nearly dark he did not see the coupling-chain or rope until he found that he was laying upon it, the dogs being detained from that cause. The defendant to whom the greyhounds belonged, and who was on the occasion in question exercising them, as well as a setter dog, which also belonged to him, came up in a minute or two after the plaintiff fell, and while he was still laying on the ground. The plaintiff and defendant had not before then seen each other. It was ascertained that the plaintiff's thigh was broken, and he was incapable of moving without assistance. He is still suffering from the effect of these injuries. The plaintiff was sober, and did not in any way contribute to the accident.

Under these circumstances the arbitrator directed the judgment to be entered for the plaintiff, with 175*l.* damages, but if the Court of Common Pleas should be of opinion that upon the facts above stated there was not in point of law such negligence on the part of the defendant as to make him answerable to the plaintiff in damages, then he directed that judgment be entered for the defendant.

Cole, Q.C. (with him Morgan Lloyd) for the plaintiffs.—The arbitrator has found that the defendant was here guilty of negligence; if, therefore, any principle of law can be suggested upon which to support this finding, the judgment of the court must be for the plaintiff.

McIntyre for the defendant.—To make the defendant liable, the declaration, if there had been pleadings, must have alleged a scienter. There is nothing in the evidence to show knowledge on the defendant's part that these greyhounds had ever done such a thing as this before, nor that it was the usual tendency of such dogs to occasion such injury. Greyhounds are not naturally vicious, and the evidence merely proves that these greyhounds of the defendant did something which was unusual, and which could not render their owner legally liable: (Cox v. Burbidge, 32 L. J. 89, C. P.) Their being fastened together probably restrained their speed, and was on that account evidence of unnecessary care.

Cole, in reply, was stopped.

WILLES, J.—We cannot reverse this award. The arbitrator has found judgment for the plaintiff, and has reserved for us to enter it for the defendant, if we are of opinion that there is not, as a matter of law, upon the facts stated, evidence of negligence. We cannot come to that conclusion, unless we are prepared to lay down as law that a person is not guilty of negligence who allows his greyhounds to run about coupled together on a high road near a town without protection or restraint. I agree with Mr. McIntyre that they are animals of an ordinarily quiet nature, and a person is not bound to exercise as much care with regard to them as he would be if he possessed others of a nature known to be vicious. The law certainly is, as has been stated by a Scotch judge, that every dog may bite a person once without rendering his master liable for the injury he occasions. This, however, is not a case in which we have to deal with the acts of dogs by themselves. Here the cause of the accident was partly an act of their master as well as of these dogs. We are dealing too with a state of things, in consequence of which the dogs might injure themselves, and therefore, for their safety, they ought when in such a condition to be led. The arbitrator, having the common knowledge of the tendency of coupled greyhounds to rush, may well say they ought to be allowed on a high road only with some one to lead them, on account of the probability of injury, not only to themselves, but also the people lawfully using the high road. We have to deal here with dogs plus coupling chains, and I am not prepared to say that this was a proceeding on the defendant's part, which was not in point of law negligence. Judgment will be for the plaintiff on this special case.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. The negligence alleged is not in allowing dogs to be on the highway without restraint, but in the fact that these greyhounds coupled together were there without being led or guided. I think the arbitrator might well find as he has done.

REG. v. JOHN CHILD.

*Setting fire to goods in a house—House catching fire therefrom—Malicious intent—*24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 7.

A person maliciously set fire to goods in a house with intent to injure the owner of the goods, but he had no malicious intention to burn the house or to injure the owner of it. The house did not take fire: Held, that if the house had thereby caught fire, the setting fire to it would not have been within sect. 7 of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, as under the circumstances it would not have amounted to felony.

CASE reserved for the opinion of this court by Blackburn, J.

The prisoner was tried before me at the Norfolk Spring Circuit.

The indictment contained two counts, the first, "that the prisoner unlawfully, maliciously, and feloniously did set fire to divers goods and chattels, the property of Fanny Goldsmith then and there being in a building, to wit, a dwelling house, with intent thereby to injure."

The second count alleged that it was "under such circumstances, that if the building had been thereby set fire to, the offence would have amounted to felony."

The evidence was that the prisoner from ill will and malice against the prosecutrix broke up her chairs, tables, and other furniture, made a pile of them and her clothes on the stone floor of the kitchen of her lodgings, and lit them at the four corners so as to make a bonfire of them. The building would almost certainly have been burned in consequence, had not the police who were sent for succeeded in extinguishing the bonfire which the prisoner had kindled before the house was actually ignited.

The prisoner was not defended by counsel.

The only enactment that was cited, or that I was aware of bearing on the case, was the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 7.

I thought that the true construction of that enactment was not such as to make it felony maliciously to set fire to goods in a dwelling house per se, and consequently that the first count, though it was proved, was not good in law; and on the second count I thought that if the dwelling house in which the goods were had caught fire from the burning goods, the question whether the offence would have amounted to felony depended upon a further question, viz., whether such a setting fire to the dwelling house would have been malicious and with intent to injure, so as to bring the case within 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 3. As to this, I explained to the jury that though the prisoner's object was only to destroy the furniture and injure the owner of it, and not to destroy the house or injure the landlord; yet, if the jury thought that he was aware that what he was doing would probably set the building on fire, and so necessarily injure the owner, and was at best reckless whether it did so or not, they ought to find that if the building had caught fire from the setting fire to the goods, the offence would have been felony, otherwise not.

The jury found that the prisoner was guilty, but not so that if the house had caught fire the setting fire to the house would have been wilful and malicious.

As it seemed to me apparent from the note in Mr. Greaves' Criminal Law Consolidation and Amendment Acts, p. 213, that the framers of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 7, meant to include all cases in which if the fire had been set to the building with the same intent as it was set to the things in the building, the offence would have been felony, I reserved the case for the Court of Criminal Appeal.

The question for the court is whether on the evidence and finding of the jury the prisoner is properly convicted upon either count.

The prisoner not having been able to obtain bail remains in custody.

COLIN BLACKBURN.

No counsel appeared on either side.

The judges retired to consider the case, and on their return into court the following judgments were delivered:

BOVILL, C. J.—When the prisoner was convicted at the trial, a question was reserved by my brother Blackburn as to the effect of sect. 7 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, which enacts that, "whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously set fire to any matter or thing being in, against, or under any building, under such circumstances that if the building were thereby set fire to the offence would amount to felony, shall be guilty of felony." The prisoner had maliciously, and with intent to injure the owner of certain goods in a dwelling-house, set fire to them, and, although the house was not set on fire, it almost certainly would have been if the fire which the prisoner had kindled had not been discovered and extinguished. My brother Blackburn left it to the jury to say whether the prisoner had acted maliciously with respect to the house, and directed them that, though the prisoner's object was only to destroy the furniture and injure the owner of it, and not to destroy the house or injure the landlord, yet, if the prisoner knew that what he was doing would probably set the house on fire, and so injure the owner, and was reckless whether it did so or not, they ought to find that if the building caught fire from the setting fire to the goods the offence would have been felony. In answer to this direction of the judge, the jury negatived any malicious intention in the sense explained to them by the learned judge, but found the prisoner guilty, adding that he did not intend to injure the owner of the house nor maliciously intend to set fire to the house itself. Under these circumstances, the only fact that can be taken to have been found is that the prisoner maliciously set fire to goods in a dwelling house with intent to injure the owner of the goods. There is no clause in the Act which makes the unlawfully and maliciously setting fire to goods in a dwelling-house a felony. An offence of that kind would come within sect. 51 of the Act. If we were to hold that this case came within sect. 7 we should be rejecting the words "under such circumstances that if the building were thereby set fire to, the offence would amount to felony." We have no authority to reject those words, for it is clear that it is meant that there must be such a setting fire to the house as would amount to felony within the meaning of some of the preceding sections. If any of those sections could apply to the present case it would be sect. 3, which declares it to be a felony "unlawfully and maliciously to set fire to any house, &c., with intent thereby to injure any person;" but the jury have negatived any malicious intention to injure the house or the owner of the house, and found that there was simply an intent to injure the goods. I am clearly of opinion that that is not a felony within sect. 3, and that the conviction must therefore be quashed.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the first count is bad in law, and does not disclose any offence. As to the second count, the jury have negatived an essential element—malicious intention towards the house or its owner.

BRAMWELL, B.—I think that, even if the house had been in fact set fire to, the prisoner would be entitled to an acquittal upon this finding, for I interpret it to express an opinion not only that the prisoner did not intend to burn the house, but that they were of opinion that he thought that the house would not catch fire.

BYLES, J.—I also think that, according to the finding of the jury, the prisoner neither acted maliciously nor recklessly as regards setting fire to the house or injuring the owner of it.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. At the trial I thought that the conviction could not be supported. It seemed to me quite clear that the framer of the statute meant to include a case of this kind, and it is unfortunate that the words which have been used do not carry out that intention. The terms of the former statute (14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 8), "if any person shall wilfully and maliciously set fire to any goods or chattels being in any building, the setting fire to which is made felony by this or any other Act of Parliament, he shall be guilty of felony," would clearly have included this case, for the prisoner did maliciously set fire to goods in a building the burning of which would have been felony. It happens unfortunately that the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, repealed that enactment, and sect. 7 has the words, "under such circumstances that if the building were thereby set fire to, the offence would amount to felony," in lieu of "the burning of which would amount to felony." Mr. Greaves in his Criminal Law Consolidation Acts adds a note to this section, to the effect that these words were advisedly substituted, in consequence of Reg. v. Lyons, 1 Bell C. C. 28; 8 Cox Crim. Cas. 84, and in order to include cases where an intent to injure was necessary as well as those where it was not; and he further states that the committee of the House of Lords thought they would include every case which could arise. The object was plainly to include cases like this; but I cannot agree with his reasoning in 1 Russ. on Crimes, 742 (note), that if the setting fire to the one is malicious, the setting fire to the other would be malicious also. I think, and so directed the jury, that to make the act malicious with respect to the owner of the house, the burning of the house must not only be the natural result of the setting fire to the goods, but the prisoner must at least be reckless whether he thereby set the house on fire or not. Finding that this view was opposed to what was the intention of the Legislature as stated by Mr. Greaves, I reserved the case, but I am of opinion that the words used in sect. 7 have restricted instead of extending the liability which existed under 14 and 15 Vict. c. 10, s. 8.

Conviction quashed.

Re THE QUEEN'S BENEFIT BUILDING SOCIETY.

Building society—Winding-up—Petition by investing member—Creditor—Notice of withdrawal—Rules.

By the rules of a benefit building society it was provided that persons intending to become shareholders should be at liberty to pay in small sums, and should become shareholders when they had thus paid up the full amount of a share or shares, and that any person thus depositing his money should be at liberty, at any time before becoming a shareholder, to withdraw the amount so paid in by him.

On a petition for the winding-up of the society by a person who had made certain deposits on account of shares, and had given notice of withdrawal before the shares were issued to him:

Held, that the petitioner, being under the rules of the society entitled to repayment of his deposits, was a creditor, and as such entitled to a winding-up order.

THIS was a petition for the winding-up of the Queen's Benefit Building Society by an investing member, who had given notice of withdrawal of his deposits.

By the rules of the society, which had been duly certified, it was provided that persons intending to become shareholders should be furnished with pass-books, and should be at liberty to pay in small sums, and should become shareholders when they had thus paid up the full amount of a share or shares, and should receive scrip representing their share or shares. The rules further provided that persons thus depositing their money should be at liberty at any time before becoming shareholders to withdraw the amounts so paid in by them upon giving notice of their intention to do so.

The rules did not confer upon the society any express power to borrow money.

Mr. Gamble, the manager of the society, had paid in various sums on account of shares, but had not become a shareholder. He had given notice of his desire to withdraw the amount paid in by him, and the money not being repaid to him, he presented the present petition for the winding-up of the society under the Companies Act 1862. In the petition Mr. Gamble was described merely as a creditor of the society.

Swanston, Q. C. and Graham Hastings, in support of the petition, submitted that he was a creditor of the society, as he had deposited money with the society with the view of becoming a shareholder, but, before actually becoming a shareholder, he had given notice of withdrawal, as he was entitled to do by the rules of the society; and that as a creditor he was entitled to an order for the winding-up of the society. They referred to Re National Permanent Benefit Building Society, ex parte Williamson, 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 234; L. Rep. 5 Ch. 309.

The society, though not registered under the companies Act 1862, could be wound-up under that Act: (Re London Indiarubber Company, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 316; L. Rep. 1, Ch. 329.)

Waller for the society, and

W. F. Robinson, for certain creditors, supported the petition.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C., and J. Napier Higgins, for certain shareholders, opposed the petition. This society had no power to borrow money, and it had been decided that a benefit building society could not borrow money in the absence of an express power. The petitioner's debt was, therefore, invalid, and he was not entitled to the order asked for.

Re Victoria Benefit Permanent Building Investment and Freehold Land Society, Hill's and Jones' cases, 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 777, L. Rep. 9 Eq. 605;

Re Spence's Patent Non-conducting Composition and Cement Company, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 413; L. Rep. 9 Eq. 9.

As the petition was presented as a creditor's petition, they contended that it could not now be treated as a shareholder's petition, and an order could not be given to the petitioner as a shareholder.

Chitty, for some investing members, and Stirling, for the official liquidator of the Durham County Benefit Building Society, which was a creditor to the amount of 5000*l.*, also opposed the petition.

March 20.—Lord ROMILLY said that he was of opinion that the petitioner was entitled to the order for which he asked. It was no doubt true that a society of this kind had no power to borrow money in the absence of an express power to do so. But this society was bound by its rules to repay money deposited on account of shares, and the rules having been certified and sanctioned in the manner appointed by the statute had in fact become law. The petitioner, being therefore by the rules of the society entitled to repayment of his deposits, was a creditor, and, as such entitled to a winding-up order. One set of costs would be allowed to the respondents.

The Inclosure Acts (8 & 9 Vict. c. 118, s. 27; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 99, s. 1; 16 & 17 Vict. c. 120)—Provisional order—Condition—Right in allotted lands—Reservation to lords of manor of right of sporting.

By a provisional order for the inclosure of Knaresdale Common, the Inclosure Commissioners declared the following to be the terms and conditions on which the inclosure should be made, viz., that one-sixteenth part in value of the lands be allotted to the lords of the manor in lieu of their right and interest in the soil, exclusive of their right and interest in the game.

Acting under this order, the valuer appointed by the commissioners awarded to the lords of the manor certain specified lands, equal in value to one-sixteenth part of the residue of the lands to be inclosed, in full compensation for their right and interest in the soil thereof, exclusively of their right and interest in the game; and he further reserved and set out to the lords all game . . . . on the lands to be inclosed, with full power to hunt and take it.

Held, that the commissioners were empowered by the Inclosure Acts (8 & 9 Vict. c. 118 s. 27; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 99, s. 1) to make it a condition of inclosure that the right of sporting over the inclosed lands should be reserved to the lords of the manor, whilst the soil might be allotted to others; that the intention to reserve such right was sufficiently expressed in the provisional order, and that therefore the lords were entitled to the exclusive right of killing game upon and throughout the said lands.

Declaration: For that at the time of the committing by the defendants of the grievances hereinafter mentioned, the plaintiffs were lords of the manor of Knaresdale, in the county of Northumberland, and entitled to the exclusive right and liberty of shooting and killing game by themselves, and their servants in, upon, and throughout certain lands in the county aforesaid which formerly constituted, and were certain moors and waste lands of the said manor, called or known by the name of Knaresdale Common, and the defendants disturbed the plaintiff's right and liberty aforesaid by shooting and killing game on the said lands, and the plaintiffs also sue the defendants for that the defendants converted to their own use, or wrongfully deprived the plaintiffs of the use and possession of the goods of the plaintiffs (that is to say) dead grouse.

Pleas: First, not guilty; secondly, and for a further plea to the first count that the plaintiffs were not entitled as alleged; thirdly, and for a further plea to the said first count, that at the time of the committing of the acts complained of in that count, the said land were the lands, soil, and freehold of George Thomas Mowbray, and that the defendants committed the said acts as his servants, and by his command in that behalf; fourthly, and as to the last count of the declaration, that the said goods were not the plaintiffs as alleged.

Replication: First, joinder of issue upon each of the pleas; secondly, and for a second replication to the defendant's third plea, the plaintiffs say that the said land, before the said became the lands, soil, and freehold of the said George Thomas Mowbray, and before and up to the time of the inclosure, hereinafter mentioned, were part of the moors and waste lands of the manor of Knaresdale, called or known by the name of Knaresdale Common, and such moors and waste lands were, at the time of the inclosure thereof, as hereinafter mentioned, subject to be inclosed under and by virtue of The Acts for the Inclosure, Exchange, and Improvement of Land; and that before and up to the time of the said inclosure certain persons were lords of the said manor, and as such lords were seised in their demesne as of fee of and in the said moors and waste lands, and that after the passing of The Second Annual Inclosure Act 1853 the said moors and waste lands were duly inclosed, under and by virtue of and according to the provisions of the last-mentioned Act, and of The Acts for the Inclosure, Exchange, and Improvement of Land; and under such inclosure there was duly reserved to the said lords, according to the provisions of the said Acts, the exclusive right and liberty of shooting and killing game in, upon, and throughout the lands so inclosed as aforesaid, being the right and liberty in the declaration mentioned; and the defendants say that all things happened and existed necessary to reserve the said lords the right and liberty aforesaid, and that at, before, and at the same time, when, &c., the plaintiffs were the lords of the said manor, and, as such lords, entitled to the right and liberty aforesaid.

Rejoinder and demurrer.

Issue upon the plaintiff's second replication to the defendants' third plea.

Demurrer to the second replication to the third plea.(a)

Joinder in demurrer.

By consent of the parties the following special case, of which the above pleadings were to be considered part, was stated pursuant to a master's order and to the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act 1852.

CASE.

1. At the time of the making of the provisional order, and of the inclosure thereunder as hereinafter mentioned, Sir David Miles, Lambert Monck, Baronet, Sir George Musgrave, Baronet, Edward William Hasell, Esq., and William Nanson, gentleman (trustees under the will of the Right Hon. Lord Wallace, then deceased), were lords of the manor of Knaresdale, and as such lords were entitled to the soil of certain lands within the said manor called Knaresdale Common, such lands then being lands subject to be inclosed under the provisions of the Acts for the Inclosure, Exchange, and Improvement of Land.

2. On the 25th Aug. 1852, a provisional order(b) was made and issued by and under the seal of the Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales for and concerning the inclosure of the said lands under the provisions of the said Acts.

3. By an Act passed on the 20th Aug. 1853

(a) The matter of law intended to be argued was stated to be that the replication did not show a sufficient right and title as against the freeholder to the exclusive right to shoot over his lands.

(b) A copy of the provisional order formed part of the case. The material part thereof was as follows: "Now, therefore, in pursuance of the power given to us by the said Act, we, the Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales do by this provisional order under our seal declare the following to be the terms and conditions on which we are of opinion that the said proposed inclosure should be made, viz., that one sixteenth part in value of the said lands be allotted under the provisions of the said Act to the said lords of the said manor, in lieu of their right and interest in the soil of the said lands exclusively of their right and interest in the game, and in all mines, minerals, stone, and other substrata under the said lands.

And I further declare that I do, on the request in writing of the said lord of the manor, reserve and set out to the said lord all game, mines, minerals, stone, and other substrata under the lands to be inclosed, with full power and authority for him, his heirs, lessees, and assigns, and his and their agents, miners, and servants, at all times hereafter to enter upon all or any part of the said land, to hunt and take all game, and to search for, work, and carry away all mines, minerals, stone, and other substrata under the said lands, and to do all necessary or reasonable acts for the convenient exercise of this power and authority, he and they paying reasonable and adequate compensation to the persons entitled to the surface of such land for damage done to such surface in the exercise of the rights and easements, and adequate compensation to the persons entitled to the surface of such land for damage done to such surface in the exercise of the rights and easements intended to be hereby reserved. This power so set out and reserved to the lord of the said manor is to be subject to the power which the owner for the time being of every allotment is to have of taking and winning from such allotment any freestone, limestone, or crow coal, for his own use upon any of his allotments, or upon any of his ancient lands and tenements within the said manor, but not otherwise, nor for sale.

(16 & 17 Vict. c. 120), after reciting that the said Inclosure Commissioners had, in pursuance of the said Acts, issued their said provisional order for and concerning the inclosure of Knaresdale Common thereby proposed, and that such proposed inclosure was expedient, it was enacted that the said proposed inclosure should be proceeded with.

4. The inclosure of the said lands called Knaresdale Common was accordingly proceeded with, and an award in the matter of the said inclosure was, under the direction of the said commissioners, drawn up and engrossed on parchment, and signed by the valuer duly appointed and acting in that behalf, and was afterwards, on the 26th May 1859, confirmed by and under the hands and seals of the said commissioners, according to the provisions of the said Acts.

5. By the said award the valuer set out, allotted, and awarded unto the lords of the said manor certain lands therein specified, and then proceeded thus: "Which I adjudge and declare to be equal in value to one-sixteenth part of the residue of the lands to be inclosed, and to be in lieu and in full compensation for the right and interest of the said lords of the manor in the soil of the said lands, exclusively of their right and interest in the game, and in all mines, minerals, stone, and other substrata under the same." And after setting out and allotting and awarding the residue of the lands to be inclosed as aforesaid, the valuer, by his said award, proceeded to award and declare as follows:

6. Amongst other lands thereby set out, allotted, and awarded, the valuer by his said award set out, allotted, and awarded certain portions of the land to be inclosed unto one Thomas Mowbray, deceased, such allotment being made to him in respect of land held by him in fee simple. The said Thomas Mowbray was not one of the consenting parties mentioned in the said provisional order, and never executed the said award or assented to it except by taking possession of the said allotments.

7. On the 12th Aug. 1868 the defendants, by the authority of George Thomas Mowbray, came upon the allotments so made to the said Thomas Mowbray, deceased, and then and there shot and carried away a grouse.

8. At the time when the defendants shot and carried away a grouse as aforesaid, the said George Thomas Mowbray was the owner and in possession of the said allotments so made to the said Thomas Mowbray, deceased, and the plaintiffs were the lords of the said manor.

9. Neither the said Thomas Mowbray, deceased, nor the said George Thomas Mowbray, nor any owner of the said allotments, has in any way assented to the said award, or done anything to ratify the same except as herein appears.

10. The said award may be referred to and taken as part of this case.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the defendants, as lords of the said manor, were entitled to recover in this action.

If the court was of opinion in the affirmative, then judgment to be entered for the plaintiffs.

If the court was of opinion in the negative, then judgment of nolle prosequi to be entered up for the defendants.

Manisty, Q.C. (with him Kemplay), for the plaintiff.—The action is maintainable. The commissioners had the power of granting the game to the plaintiffs. Sect. 1 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 99, enacts that "it shall be lawful for the commissioners, in their provisional order in the matter of any inclosure, to set forth any special agreement or matter concerning or affecting the lands to be inclosed, and to make the same a condition of such inclosure." And by this section the lord has a veto and may object to the inclosure. Cooke on Inclosures (4th edit., p. 359), in a note to the above section, remarks, "Under this provision it is now very common to reserve the lord's right of sporting." Surely that is a matter affecting the land. The lord assents to the inclosure on condition that the game is reserved to him, and accepts the allotment: (Graham v. Ewart, 7 H. of L. Cas. 331). Sect. 27 of the original Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 118) (a) directs that the conditions of any proposed inclosure may be embodied in the provisional order, and that the commissioners shall specify the share of the land to be allotted to the lord in respect of his right and interest in the soil, either exclusively or inclusively, of his right to mines, pasturage, "or any other right or interest of such lord in the land to be inclosed." [LUSH, J.—Can you call the right of taking game a "right or interest in the land to be inclosed?"] Yes; it is like a right of pasture. [COCKBURN, C.J.—The game is res nullius, but they give instead of it the absolute ownership of a piece of land.] The right of sporting is highly valued, and the Lords here wished to retain it. The piece of land was allotted to them in lieu of their right and interest in the soil only.

Field, Q.C. (with him Crompton) contra.—This reservation was one beyond the power of the commissioners to make. [BLACKBURN, J.—The question is whether the commissioners had the power they assumed, or whether their act was ultra vires.] The whole aim of the statute is to give the owners of allotment the land in severance absolutely. Yet if such a right as this could exist in the lord they could not build or plant, or even make gardens. [BLACKBURN, J.—Do you think the existence of a right of sporting over an allotment in the lord would prevent the allottee building a house?] In the case of Lord Leconfield v. Dixon and others (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 18; L. Rep. 2 Ex. 202), a right of sporting had been reserved by a special clause in a Private Inclosure Act, and it was held that the lord did not take an exclusive right of sporting over the allotments. The court saying (p. 205): "In considering the statute on which the question turns, it is not to be treated as one which is for the benefit of the commoners only, nor as one which takes from the lord only. . . . But it should be remembered that the right now claimed by the plaintiff is inconsistent with the useful design of the statute. . ." The right claimed here is of the same class as that of hunting with horses and hounds; could that be exercised over allotments? The scheme of the statute is contradictory. First, the commissioners have not made it a condition that the lord shall have the right to the game exclusively; secondly, supposing they had done so, the condition would be void. The scope of sect. 27 and the object of the provisional order is to specify the share or proportion of the residue of the land which the lord is to have, either inclusively or exclusively, of certain things. [BLACKBURN, J.—No; it is the land that is to be given to him for giving up his right to the soil of the waste.] There must be an allotment made to the lord in respect of other rights than rights to mines. The words of sect. 27 do not justify the exclusion of the game at all. But nevertheless let it be assumed that they do, then the right is analogous to a right of pasturage. There are three kinds of interests specified, viz., "mines and minerals," "rights of pasturage," and "other rights and interests." All that can be done under the provisional order is to give the lord the one-sixteenth, or whatever the proportions may be, and to say what it is for, then the other rights are to be valued by the valuer. [LUSH, J.—And when he comes to value he looks at the provisional order, and on seeing the rights are excluded he makes his allotment in proportion.] The mistake here has been to try to reserve in the allotted lands this right of sporting which is inconsistent with inclosure. If sect. 1 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 99, was framed for the purpose suggested by Mr. Wingrove Cooke in his note, it was for a most delusive purpose. The interest which the statute provides for must be some interest respecting the soil. But the lord had a mere right to kill a bird, &c., which only became his property when killed. [COCKBURN, C.J., referred to Blades v. Higgs (12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 615; 10 C. B., N. S., 713; 11 H. of L. Cas. 621.] In all the private Acts on the subject were clauses either reserving to the lord the rights to the game or compensating him for them, and when a statute is found to contain no such clause there is a fair presumption that the Legislature did not wish to preserve those rights. In Townley v. Gibson (2 Term. R. 701), Kenyon, C. J., says, "The defendant's counsel has supposed that mines are a distinct right from the right to the soil; but I do not think so, where they are under the land of the lord of the manor. In cases of copyholds a lord may have a right under the soil of the copyholder, but when the soil is in the lord all is resolvable into the ownership of the soil; and a grant of the soil will pass everything under it." And see also the judgment of Buller, J., therein.

(a) By sect 27 of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118, the commissioners are to embody the conditions of any proposed inclosure or a provisional order, and take consents of parties interested, and it is enacted that, in case the lord of the manor shall be entitled to the soil of the land proposed to be inclosed, shall specify the share or proportion of the residue of the land, which, after provision for expenses, and after deducting allotments for public purposes should be allotted to the lord of the manor in respect of his right and interest in the soil, either exclusively or inclusively of his right or interest in all or any of the mines, minerals, stone, and other substrata under such land, or inclusively or exclusively of any right of pasturage which may have been usually enjoyed by such lord or his tenants, or any other right or interest of such lord in the land to be inclosed, as the case appear to the commissioners to require, or as the parties interested, with the approbation of the commissioners, may have agreed.

Manisty, Q. C., in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 26. BLACKBURN, J., read the judgment of the Court (Cockburn, C. J., Blackburn and Lush, JJ.) In this case the question raised is whether the plaintiffs, as lords of the manor of Knaresdale, are entitled to the exclusive right of shooting over lands formerly a portion of the waste of that manor but inclosed and allotted to the defendants under the award made in pursuance of a provisional order of the Inclosure Commissioners dated 25th Aug. 1852, and directed to be proceeded with by the Second Annual Inclosure Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict c. 120). The lords of the manor were before inclosure owners of the soil (subject to the rights of common), and as such they had the right to take the game, not as a special or seignorial right, but as an ordinary incident of property. But the owner of the fee can sever the right to take the game from the owner of the soil and grant it as a separate tenement to another in fee: Wickham v. Hawker (7 M. & W. 63.) The questions involved in the present case are, first, whether the Inclosure Commissioners, under the Inclosure Acts, are authorised to make it a condition of the inclosure that the right of sporting should thus be severed from the right in the soil, and the tenement thus created remain with the lord whilst the soil is allotted to others; or whether such a condition is ultra vires and void. And secondly, whether, supposing the commissioners have such a power, they have in the present case sufficiently expressed their intention to exercise it in favour of the present plaintiffs. The first question is one of general importance. The answer to it depends on the construction of the General Inclosure Act of 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 118), as extended by stat. 11 & 12 Vict. c. 99, s. 1. The General Inclosure Act of 1845, by sect. 25, provides that on an application made to the commissioners for that purpose by those who appear to him to represent at least one-third in value of the interests in the lands proposed to be inclosed, the commissioners, if on the statements made to them they think the inclosure may be found expedient, shall refer the application to an assistant commissioner who is to go down to the spot and make inquiries and hold a meeting "to hear any objections" which may be made to the proposed inclosure, and any information or evidence which may be offered in relation thereto, so that great care is taken that the terms of the proposed inclosure shall be thoroughly known and discussed in the locality. The assistant commissioner is then directed by the 26th section to report to the commissioners; and in case he thinks such inclosure expedient, "he may specify any terms or conditions which may appear to him to be proper for the protection of any public interest, and of any mineral property or peculiar rights in relation to the land proposed to be inclosed." The right of the owner of the soil to take the game is certainly not aptly described by the words "peculiar right in relation to the land." Then comes sect. 27, which is the important one. The commissioners, on the report or after any further inquiries they shall think necessary, are to determine whether in their opinion the proposed inclosure would be expedient; and, if they so think, they, by provisional order under their seal, shall set forth the terms and conditions on which they shall be of opinion that the inclosure should be made, and especially "the allotments to be made for recreation," &c., and, "in case the lord of the manor shall be entitled to the soil of the land proposed to be inclosed, shall specify "the proportion of the land that shall be allotted to him" in respect of his right and interest in the soil, either exclusively or inclusively of his right or interest in all or any of the mines, &c., or inclusively or exclusively of any right of pasturage which may have been usually enjoyed by such lord or his tenant, or any other right or interest of such lord in the land to be inclosed as the case may appear to the commissioners to require, or as the parties interested, with the approbation of the commissioners may have agreed; and in case there shall be any mineral property or rights in relation thereto not vested in the lord of the manor or other rights which shall appear to the commissioners proper to be specially provided for upon such inclosure or to be excepted from the operation thereof, shall specify the provisions or exceptions in that behalf." The section then goes on to provide that this provisional order shall be thoroughly known in the locality, and then if two-thirds in value of the parties interested assent, the commissioners are again to give notice of the intention to include the provisional order in their annual report, and then if no successful objection is made in Parliament, the inclosure on those terms and conditions is to be proceeded with. It seems from this that the general effect of this scheme was to give the commissioners a wide discretion to consider whether the inclosure on the terms proposed was expedient or not. If they think it is not expedient, they have an absolute power to refuse their assent. If they think it might be expedient, subject to terms and conditions, they may impose such terms and conditions, and then if two-thirds of those interested adopted the scheme subject to such terms and conditions, and the Legislature sanctioned it, it was to become law. The lord of the manor has, by sect. 29, an absolute veto on the inclosure of his waste. He may refuse his consent unless the parties interested agree that the right to take the game be severed from the right to the soil in the land proposed to be inclosed, and the tenement thus created reserved to the lord, the soil only being allotted. He is not bound to assent at all, and has a perfect right to make a stipulation to this effect. It might be a matter of doubt whether under the general Inclosure Act as it was originally framed, the commissioner would have power to impose such condition. The difficulty in construing the Act is, that the right of the owner of the soil to take game is a general incident to the property in the soil, a mode of enjoying that property, and is not therefore aptly described as a "peculiar right" which is the phrase in sect. 26, nor as "another right or interest in the land," which is the phrase in sect. 27, though it is in the power of the lord to sever it from the soil, and so create in another a peculiar right of this kind, and it might be said that the power of the commissioners to impose terms and conditions under the first Act is limited to imposing powers and conditions relating to rights already existing, and not to those to be created by the inclosure itself. But this difficulty seems to be completely removed by the 1st section of stat. 11 & 12 Vict. c. 99, which enacts that it shall be lawful for the commissioners in their provisional order "to set forth any special agreement or matter concerning or affecting the lands to be inclosed, and to make the same a condition of such inclosure." Those who framed this enactment seem to have discovered that the words of the former Act might be construed as restricting the power of the commissioners to impose conditions of a particular kind only, and therefore enacted that their power should be in that respect unrestricted. At all events if the lord of the manor made it a condition to his assent that the right to take the game should be severed from the right to the soil, and the persons interested agreed to this condition, and an inclosure was proposed on these terms, and the commissioners by their provisional order sanctioned the inclosure on the conditions that this was done, they would be making that a condition which was both a "special agreement," and "a matter affecting the lands, and so would be acting not only within the meaning of the Act, but within the most literal construction of the words used. The second question, whether the commissioners have so framed this particular provisional order as to make it a condition of the inclosure that the right to take the game should be severed from the right to the soil, so as to become a separate tenement, and that the lord should have the tenement so created, is one depending on the construction of the provisional order. There might easily have been words found far more apt to describe this than those actually used, but it is impossible to avoid seeing that it was meant that this should be done, and I think that we ought to proceed upon the principle laid down in Ewart v. Graham (1 H. & N. 563.) There the language of a Private Inclosure Act left no doubt that it was intended that the lord of the manor should enjoy over the land after it was inclosed, as a separate right, the same power of taking the game which he had de facto before the Inclosure, as a mode of enjoying his property in the land whilst it was his own. And the majority of the Exchequer Chamber and the House of Lords held that, though the words used were not such as would be used by a lawyer to express an intention to create a fresh right, yet they were sufficient to effect that purpose, the intention being clear. Coleridge, J., in delivering the judgment of the majority in the Exchequer Chamber, says, "When it is clear from the context of an instrument, in what sense words are used in that instrument, the sound rule of construction is to attribute to them that meaning, even though the words be technical and have technically a different meaning, for it is so only that you can effectuate the intention." This is applicable to the present case. The judgment, therefore, should be in favour of the plaintiffs.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by M. W. MCKELLAR and H. H. HOCKING, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

May 31 and June 1, 1871.

BURIAL BOARD OF ST. MARGARET'S, ROCHESTER v. THOMPSON.

Burial Acts (15 & 16 Vict. c. 85, ss. 15, 19, 30, 32, and 38; 16 & 17 Vict. c. 134, s. 7)—Right of sexton of parish to dig graves and toll the bell in cemetery, formed under Burial Acts—Right of burial board to interfere—Right of sexton to appoint a deputy.

Where a parish has, under 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85 or 16 & 17 Vict. c. 134, provided a burial ground and appointed a burial board, the sexton of the parish has a right, under sect. 32 of the former Act, to enter such ground at a reasonable time and in a reasonable manner, when the body of a parishioner requires burial, to dig a grave for such parishioner, and to select a proper spot in the cemetery for such grave, unless, in the latter instance, the burial board has itself appointed a particular spot for the purpose, and the burial board has no right to appoint servants of its own to dig such grave, or to exclude the sexton when he comes to the burial ground at the above-mentioned time and manner, and for the above-mentioned purpose; nor will trespass lie against the sexton if he enter the cemetery, as aforesaid, contrary to the orders of the burial board. The sexton has also the right, if a chapel with a bell or bells has been provided in the cemetery under 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85, s. 30, for the performance of the burial service according to the rites of the Church of England, to toll the bell at the funeral of a parishioner, at the time, and in the manner, at and in which he had the right to toll the bell of the parish church when the parish churchyard was used as a burial ground; and trespass will not lie against him for entering the chapel and tolling the bell as aforesaid, contrary to the orders of the burial board. The sexton has also the right to appoint a fit and proper person to do either of these acts for him; and trespass will not lie against such person if he enter the burial ground or chapel, for the purpose of doing such acts, any more than against the sexton himself.

Semble (per Keating, J.), it is doubtful whether the board would be justified in throwing upon the rates the expense of providing persons to do the above-mentioned work in lieu of the clerk and sexton.

THE question in this case arose upon cross-demurrers to pleas and a replication.

The declaration stated that the defendant broke and entered a certain bell tower, and also certain lands of the plaintiffs, situate and being in the parish of St. Margaret, Rochester, and which said lands were called the cemetery, and there made a great noise and disturbance therein, and stayed and continued therein making such noise and disturbance for divers long spaces of time, and then dug and excavated the earth and soil of the said land, and then made divers holes, excavations, and graves in the same, whereby and by reason of the premises, the plaintiffs were greatly annoyed and disturbed in the quiet and peaceable possession and use of the bell tower and lands, &c.

To this the defendant pleaded, first, excepting as to so much of the declaration as is hereinafter pleaded to in the last plea, not guilty; secondly, a denial that the bell tower and lands mentioned in the declaration were the bell tower or lands of the plaintiffs; thirdly, as to the alleged trespasses on the lands in the declaration mentioned (other than those to which the fourth and last pleas herein are pleaded), that the said lands are situate in the parish of St. Margaret, in the city of Rochester, and within the diocese of the Bishop of Rochester, and before the time of the said alleged trespasses on such lands the said Bishop had in due form of law consecrated such lands for the purpose of interments therein in accordance with the sacred rites and customs of the Church of England, and the said Bishop had appointed in due form of law a certain time (which before the said alleged trespasses to which this plea is pleaded had elapsed), when such consecrated portion of the said lands should be deemed to be and become, and at the time of the said alleged trespasses (in this plea pleaded to) such lands had become, the consecrated burial ground for the said parish for which the same had been provided. And the defendant says that the said parish of St. Margaret is an ancient parish, of which one Alfred Kingsford was before and at the time of the said alleged trespasses to which this plea is pleaded the clerk and sexton, and, by reason of the premises, of right at the time of such alleged trespasses was entitled as such clerk and sexton to perform and exercise all the duties and functions of right belonging to the said office of clerk and sexton in respect of the burial of the remains of the parishioners and inhabitants of the said parish in such consecrated burial ground, the same being the burial ground of the said parish as aforesaid, as he had previously performed and exercised the like functions and duties. And the defendant, as the servant and by the command of the said A. Kingsford, as such clerk and sexton as aforesaid, dug and excavated the earth and soil of the said consecrated burial ground, and made holes and excavations and graves therein for the burial therein of the remains of the parishioners and inhabitants of the said parish, and thereby performed and exercised the lawful duties and functions in respect of such burials of the remains of the parishioners and inhabitants of the said parish to be performed and executed in the said consecrated burial ground by the said clerk and sexton of the said parish, and appertaining to the office of the said Alfred Kingsford, as such clerk and sexton as aforesaid of the said parish, and the lawful duties of the defendant, as his servant, and which are the alleged trespasses in the said declaration mentioned, and to which this plea is pleaded; fourthly, and for a further plea the defendant says as to the alleged trespasses in the bell tower in the declaration mentioned, that at the time the said land in the last plea mentioned was, as therein stated, consecrated by the said Bishop of Rochester, in whose diocese the said land is situate and the same thereby became and was the consecrated burial ground of the parish of St. Margaret, for which the same was provided (as in such plea is stated) there was before and at the time of such consecration, and at the time when the same became and was the burial ground of the said parish, upon such land and forming part and parcel thereof, a certain chapel, with a bell tower attached thereto, and which is the bell tower mentioned in the said declaration and at the time of such consecration of the said land so consecrated as the burial ground of the said parish, the said Bishop did then and there, also, at the same time consecrate as part and parcel of such burial ground, the said chapel, with the said bell tower attached thereto, for the performance of the sacred services of the Church of England, and the several duties and functions to be performed therein by the said clerk and sexton of the said parish in and about the performance of the rites and ceremonies to be performed by the said clerk and sexton in the said chapel and bell tower, in respect of the interment of the dead in the said burial ground in accordance with the rights and ceremonies of the Church of England and the said chapel, with the said bell tower thereto belonging, did then become and was at the time of the alleged trespasses to which this plea is pleaded a consecrated part and parcel of the said burial ground to be used therewith, and as part thereof, and the defendant says that the said parish of St. Margaret is an ancient parish of which the said Alfred Kingsford was before and at the time of the alleged trespasses to which this plea is pleaded the clerk and sexton, and by reason of the premises in this plea stated of right at the time of the trespasses to which this plea is pleaded was entitled as such clerk and sexton to perform and exercise all the duties and functions appertaining to his said office of clerk and sexton of the said parish in the burial of the remains of the parishioners and inhabitants of the said parish in such consecrated burial ground, and the said chapel and bell tower, part of such burial ground as aforesaid, of the said parish in accordance with the rites and ceremonies of the Church of England, and the defendant, as the servant, and by the command of the said Alfred Kingsford, as such clerk and sexton as aforesaid, entered the said bell tower and remained therein for a reasonable time for the purpose of tolling the sacred bell therein, and during such time did then and there toll the said bell in the part performance and exercise of the lawful duties and functions to be performed therein and exercised as of right by the said A. Kingsford, as such clerk and sexton as aforesaid in the lawful and accustomed performance of the sacred rights and ceremonies appertaining to the burial of the of the remains of the parishioners and inhabitants of the said parish in the said consecrated burial ground of the said parish as he had previously performed and exercised the like duties and functions in accordance with the accustomed rights and ceremonies of the Church of England, and which are the alleged trespasses in the said declaration mentioned to which this plea is pleaded; fifthly, that, as to the other alleged trespasses in the declaration mentioned other than those to which the third and fourth pleas are pleaded, to wit, such trespasses as are alleged to have been committed on the unconsecrated portion of the said lands, in the declaration mentioned the defendant brings into court the sum of 1*s.*, and says that that sum is sufficient to cover all the damage thereby sustained.

The plaintiffs took and joined issue upon defendant's first, second, third, and fourth pleas respectively, and as to the defendant's fifth plea the plaintiffs accepted the said sum so brought into court by the defendant, in full satisfaction and discharge of the claim of the plaintiffs in respect of the matter to which that plea was pleaded.

And for a second replication to the defendant's third plea the plaintiffs say that the said lands in which, &c., were consecrated by the said bishop in the said plea mentioned, and after the making and passing and coming into force, and under and by virtue of 20 & 21 Vict. c. 81, and other the statutes in and by the said first-mentioned Act recited and referred to and not otherwise, and that the said lands in which, &c., became and at the time when, &c., were such burial ground as in that plea mentioned under and by virtue of the enactments and provisions in the said statutes contained and not otherwise, and the general management, regulation, and control thereof were then vested in the plaintiffs as such burial board as aforesaid under and by virtue of and in accordance with the said provisions of the said statutes; and the plaintiffs further say that the defendant committed the said trespasses to which that plea is pleaded without the leave, licence, or consent of the plaintiffs to him given or granted, and in defiance of and contrary to their express command, notice, and requirement in that behalf, of all which premises the defendant at the time of the committing of the said trespasses had notice.

And for a second replication to the defendant's fourth plea, the plaintiffs repeat the several allegations, statements, and averments in their said second replication to the defendant's third plea, substituting for the words "third plea" in that replication the words "fourth plea" in this replication, and for the words "land" in that replication, the words "bell tower" in this replication.

The plaintiffs also demurred to the third and fourth pleas.

Joinder in demurrer.

The defendants demurred to the third and fourth replications.

Sir J. Karslake, Q.C. (Barrow with him) for the plaintiff.—The question in this case turns on the construction of certain sections of the Burial Act (15 & 16 Vict. c. 85), which applied only to the metropolis, the provisions of which were extended to places beyond the metropolitan area by 16 & 17 Vict. c. 134. By sect. 38 of the former Act, the general management, regulation and control of the cemetery was vested in the burial board, which, under sect. 15 had power to appoint such officers and servants for the purposes of the burial ground as might be necessary. In the present case the board had provided servants of its own to dig the graves and toll the bell. The 32nd section indeed gives the clerk and sexton the right to perform their duties (when necessary), just as in the old parish churchyard, but these words "when necessary," introduce an important qualification, and it lies on the sexton to justify his acts by showing the necessity. Here there was no necessity for the sexton to interfere, as the board had provided servants to do the work which the sexton claimed a right to do. Moreover, it is to be observed that the 32nd section, though it imposes on the clerk and sexton the obligation to perform certain functions when necessary, does not give them the right to insist on performing these functions. In speaking of the parson, the section says, not only that he shall perform the duties, but also, that he shall have the same rights and authorities as heretofore. In place of these last words, the section, when speaking of the clerk and sexton, only says, "when necessary." Moreover, even if the sexton has the rights asserted for him, he has not the right to perform his functions by deputy, as there is a discretion to be exercised. Again, if he or his deputy has the right, his proper remedy is to assert it in the ecclesiastical courts, not by breaking and entering the cemetery. Then, as to tolling the bell, he cannot have the right, for the burial board lies under no obligation to provide a chapel, much less a bell, and it being optional with the board to provide a bell or not, the sexton can have no right to toll it if the board voluntarily set one up. He referred to Glen's Burial Acts, pp. 67 and 68, and the authorities there cited.

Prideaux, Q. C. (F. J. Smith with him) for the defendant.—Sect. 38 vests in the board the management, &c., of the burial ground, subject to the provisions of the Act, subject therefore to the 32nd section. The words "when necessary" have no such meaning as is attributed to them by the plaintiffs, they only mean "when the occasion for performing their functions arises." It was the object of the Act to leave the clerk and sexton in the same position as they respectively occupied before the Act, only transferring the sphere of their duty from the parish church and churchyard to the cemetery and the chapel built there. It was not intended to deprive the sexton of his emoluments, and his right to them depends on his doing his work: (Burdeaux v. Lancaster, 1 Salk. 332.) He could not demand the fee, unless he had done the work. If the sexton had the right, the defendant was justified, for every ministerial officer may appoint a deputy.

Sir J. Karslake, Q. C., in reply.

WILLES, J.—It is unnecessary in delivering judgment in this case to refer to the pleadings, because I take it that this is a case in which a parishioner was lying dead and requiring burial, and such being the case it was necessary that somebody should dig a grave and prepare for the burial of the parishioner according to the usages of the Church, and thereupon the sexton appointed a man to prepare a grave and ring the bell, and the person so appointed was absolutely forbidden by the burial board to do these acts on the ground that it thought proper to do the acts itself, and did not intend that the sexton should do them. The defendant being the person sent by the sexton insisted on doing these acts by order of the sexton at a reasonable time and place, and under circumstances under which the sexton had the right to do the particular acts complained of if the burial had being going to take place in the old parish burial ground, in which case the rector of the parish would have had no reason for forbidding the sexton to do the acts in question; so that, in the ordinary course of things, but for the Burial Acts, which have substituted the cemetery for the churchyard, the sexton would unquestionably have been the man to dig the grave and toll the bell. The questions raised therefore are these: first, whether the board has a right to do these acts itself, and forbid the sexton to do them; and, secondly, assuming that question to be answered in the negative, whether the sexton has a right to appoint a deputy to do the work for him. For the purposes of the case, I assume that the sexton does not claim to be entitled to come at an unreasonable time, and I think it is no doubt competent to the board to fix reasonable hours for the sexton to do his work. We are not now dealing with a case analogous to one in which the sexton selects a place for the grave which the rector thinks unreasonable, but I assume that here the place chosen for the grave was one in which a person would ordinarily be buried, and either that the board had pointed it out as the proper place, or else that the board had absolutely refused to point out any place so as to leave it to the sexton to select a reasonable place. Nor do I enter on the supposition that the sexton selected some grossly improper person to do the work; such a thing is unlikely to occur, and if it did the board might interfere to prevent it. I now come to consider what I have spoken of as the first question raised, viz., whether the board has a right to do these acts itself, and forbid the sexton to do them. At the time of the passing of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 134, extending the provisions of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85 to places beyond the limits of the metropolis, the law appears to have been clear enough. In respect of parishioners lying dead, there was a right in them, or their representatives, or the public, to have the body disposed of; whether in respect of a private right or out of consideration for public decency, or in respect of the usages of religion, the law provided that the dead body should be buried, and, in the case of the deceased having been a Christian, the burial ought to take place in the churchyard, and the ordinary burial service ought to be performed. There were several officers to conduct those proceedings. There was the clergyman, whose duty it was to perform the service. He had also the freehold of the churchyard, and, as the freeholder, might exercise a control over the selection of the place for the grave. He had also the appointment of the sexton and the right to discharge him upon proper grounds. It was the duty of the sexton to dig the grave, and he was not ordinarily interfered with by the rector in doing so, but was allowed to exercise his functions in respect of the performance of which he was entitled to receive fees. Whilst matters stood thus, no difficulty could ordinarily arise. The sexton had thus a clear right, recognised by the rector, to perform the duties in respect of which he received payment. Cases arose from time to time in which the rector interfered with the sexton's performance of his duties; but the sexton had his remedy, and the courts would grant a mandamus to compel the rector to allow the sexton to perform his duties. In this state of things 16 & 17 Vict. c. 134 was passed, and the Legislature, in passing that Act, did not intend to deal with the exceptional case of a rector wrongfully interfering with the sexton, but meant only to deal with ordinary cases of rector and sexton. Instead of giving to either compensation in respect of the formation of the cemetery, as was done in the older statutes, the Legislature gave to each the right to perform his duty in the cemetery, and the right to receive his fee in respect of such performance. That is clear from the 32nd section of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85, made applicable to the present case by sect. 7 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 134. It first speaks of the incumbent or minister, who is not only entitled to perform the service in the cemetery, but has the duty of doing so imposed upon him. He has to perform the religious service the same as before, and to accompany it by the same ceremonies and usages as in the old parish churchyard. One would expect from that some provision as to the person to dig the grave and do the other ministerial acts requisite to a funeral. We accordingly find that provided for in the next part of the section: "And the clerk and sexton of such parish . . . shall (when necessary) perform and exercise the same duties and functions in respect of the burial of the remains of parishioners or inhabitants of the parish of which he is clerk or sexton in such burial ground, or the consecrated portion thereof, and shall be entitled to receive the same fees on such burials as he had previously performed, exercised and received, as if such burial ground were the burial ground of the respective parish of such incumbent or minister, clerk, and sexton respectively." Now, what is the meaning of this provision? I am far from reading the expression "when necessary," introduced in the part of the section relating to the clerk and sexton, as distinguishing him from the incumbent, who, under the earlier part of the section, has the right rm the burial service, or from the parish-who, under the latter part of the section, ie right to be buried. I read them as ave reference not only to the right to grave, but also to the private right ing so, and it having been one of the r functions of the sexton to dig the grave ld burial ground of the parish, it follows sexton, he has a right to dig the grave in etery. Now comes the question, whether a right to toll the bell. That raises a question. There is no express provision to he shall toll the bell of the cemetery, is contended that he still has the toll the bell of the parish church, but . The question is, whether, reading sect. 30 ction with sect. 32, we ought not to con-bell put up in a chapel built under the ection as subject to the same control of the parochial officer as the bell of the parish itself. As to the latter bell, no difficulty s it was laid down in very early times that shioners were bound to find bells for the hurch, and many questions have arisen, the common law and ecclesiastical courts, use of the bells. It would be a waste of ntion that, as early as 1 Hen. 4 we find a the Year-books upon the subject, and the s that, though the rector has a general over the church, he could not interfere with s to the disadvantage of the parish. The stical law, recognised on this point by the law, is in accordance with the 67th canon, hows that, "when any is passing out of this ell shall be tolled, and the minister shall slack to do his duty. And after the party's it so fall out, there shall be rung no more ie short peal, and one other before the and one after the burial." In 1 Burn's Law, by Phillimore, 135, there is an obiter of Sir William Wynne, in Pearce, &c. v. of Clapham (3 Hagg. 16), that "a ring of nnot be provided for without expense, as s, tuning, &c. Suppose at one time the ners are willing to take upon themselves penses and at another time refuse, the could not compel the parishioners to ie bells in order, because they are in eple. There must be a bell to ring to and toll at funerals; but that is all."

That is high authority to show that the tolling of the bell at a funeral is an ordinary and necessary part of a funeral. That being so in the parish church, what is to be done in a cemetery? The 30th section provides that a chapel is to be built on a plan to be approved of by the bishop. I think it is obvious, reading this section in connection with sect. 32, that, as the incumbent is authorised by the latter section to perform the duties and have the same rights in the cemetery as he had in the old parish church, he has a right to perform the service in the chapel, if a chapel has been built, and it follows that he has a right, and is bound to perform the service according to the rites of the Church, and a chapel erected under sect. 30 was substituted, so far as the performance of the funeral service is concerned, for the old parish church. I am, therefore, unable to draw any distinction between what is necessary for the mere disposing of the body and what is necessary for the proper performance of the prescribed ceremony. Before leaving this part of the case, it is right that I should refer to one argument of Sir J. Karslake's. He said that the right of the sexton was subject to the right of the minister, who might forbid him to toll the bell. The minister might no doubt, under some circumstances (as, for instance, if the church were situate close to the house of a person dangerously ill), forbid the tolling of the bell, though we know the difficulty involved in such a proceeding. The question, however, now arises, whether the burial board is placed in the position of the minister, so as to determine whether canon 62 shall be obeyed or not. I think that, if there is any reservation of power in that respect, it would remain in the minister, and would not be transferred to the burial board. It is said that the minister might forbid the burial, but the Act only purported to deal with matters of ordinary occurrence; and I think that, unless some special circumstance of unreasonableness can be set up by the board, either in respect of the place or time selected or the deputy apppointed, the 32nd section gives the sexton the same right in the cemetery as against the burial board as he had in the churchyard as against the minister, and the sexton would, ordinarily, under the circumstances before us, have the right both to dig the grave and toll the bell. I now come to the only other question raised, viz. whether, assuming the sexton to have the right himself, he was justified in appointing a fit and proper person to do the work for him. It is said that the maxim delegatus non potest delegare applies, but I think that, as to matters purely ministerial, such as digging a grave or tolling a bell, a sexton might well appoint a deputy. It is obvious that, in a season of great mortality, it would be impossible for him to do all the work himself, so that to hold that he cannot appoint a deputy, appears highly unreasonable.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. We must take it on the pleadings that the defendant, as servant of the sexton, went to the cemetery for the purpose of doing the acts complained of under circumstances which, if the old parish churchyard still existed, would have justified and authorised him in digging in the churchyard, because it is stated that he entered at a reasonable time, and in a reasonable place and manner. The question now arises whether the burial board has a right to prevent him from discharging these functions, on the simple ground that the board is ready to perform them itself. I am clearly of opinion that the board had no such right, and in looking at the purview of the statute, I am surprised that the question could have been raised. The object of the statute was to preserve the old state of things under new circumstances, on the substitution of the consecrated cemetery for the old churchyard, and, looking at the control to be exercised by the bishop and other matters in the Act, I am satisfied that it was intended as much as possible to preserve the old state of things. As to the clerk and sexton, I am at a loss to see how words more distinct could be employed than the words of the 32nd section. It is contended that the words "when necessary" mean when there is no one else to do it. I think, however, that that is a strained interpretation, and that the words simply mean "when the necessity arises," or "when the occasion occurs." The section goes on to say that the clerk and sexton shall "perform and exercise the same duties and functions in respect of the burial of the remains of parishioners or inhabitants of the parish . . . and be entitled to receive the same fees . . . as he had previously performed, exercised, and received." I should be at a loss to suggest words which more completely express the intention of the Legislature as I have stated it. That being so, the argument of the burial board amounts to this: that, the statute having imposed upon the sexton the obligation to dig the graves and given him the right to receive fees upon so doing, nevertheless intended to relieve him of his duties, if the burial board chose to provide servants of its own to do the work. I think that that is a very strange view to take of the intention of the Legislature. For myself, it is only my opinion, I exceedingly doubt how far the board would be justified in throwing upon the rates the expense of providing persons to do work which the Legislature has expressly provided shall be done by the clerk and sexton. It is not necessary to decide this point; but that is my opinion. Under this section there is a clear right and duty in the sexton to perform the functions which he had in the old parish church. That being so, I think these pleas give a good answer to the action. Nor is there any distinction as to tolling the bell. I quite agree with my brother Willes as to the effect of sect. 30. The plan of the chapel to be erected is to be approved by the bishop, who would not consecrate it unless it was a proper building for the purpose for which it was built. The Legislature meant to make provision that the chapel should be on the same footing as the old parish church. As to the sexton having deputed the defendant to do the work for him, I quite agree in thinking he could clearly delegate his authority, the defendant being a fit and proper person to do the work.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. What the burial board is really contending for is, the power to exclude the sexton from the ground and from the performance of his functions there, provided that the board was willing to perform the duties of sexton itself. I think that such an attempt is in violation of the plain intention of the Legislature. The scheme of this legislation, which empowered the burial board to have the ground consecrated as a cemetery, was to substitute the burial-ground for the old churchyard, and to place *the newly-consecrated chapel, as nearly as possible, so far as the performance of religious rites was concerned, in the same position as the old parish church. As to the sexton, he was an officer with important duties to perform; his duty lay in the burial-ground, and it was one in the performance of which the parishioners were interested, and the performance of which gave him a right to receive fees. It is contended on behalf of the burial board, that the sexton had no duties to perform in the cemetery, if the board itself was willing to provide for the performance of the duties which he would have otherwise had to perform. The words "when necessary," which are relied on for this purpose, mean, in my opinion, simply "when the occasion shall arise." Reliance has been placed by the board on the 38th section; but by that clause the management, regulation, and control are vested in the board, only "subject to the provisions of this Act." One of the provisions of the Act preserves to the sexton his old duties and rights. No doubt the board has a general control, and, as already observed by my learned brothers, it was the duty of the sexton to conform to any reasonable rule that might be laid down by the board as to the time at which, and the place where, he was to perform his duties. If the board laid down no rules on these points, but still insisted on excluding the sexton, then the question would arise which arises here, viz., what means the sexton has to enforce his rights. It is said that he has no right to enter without the consent of the board, just as he would not have had the right to enter the churchyard against the order of the rector. It may be that the rector, who is freeholder of the churchyard as well as rector of the parish, might have the power to determine when and where a grave should be dug, and might at certain times exclude the sexton from the churchyard. The rector is limited by the Act to the performance of the religious duties. The sexton is also mentioned in the Act. The parishioners are interested in the performance of his duties. If the board forbade him to bury, it would still be the duty of the sexton to bury, and it would be monstrous if he could not enter for this purpose and were left to take proceedings at law to enforce his right to be admitted, and to do all that was necessary for the purpose of burial. As to the tolling of the bell, I will add nothing to what has fallen from my learned brothers. Tolling the bell was one of the functions of the sexton before the Act, and it is not only proper, but necessary for the burial board to provide a bell for the performance of the Church of England service, and the bell having been provided by the board, I think the sexton has the same right to toll it as he has to dig the grave. Subject to the qualifications pointed out by my brother Willes, I think the sexton has the rights asserted in the pleas, and that those pleas are not answered by the replication, that the defendant did the acts complained of without the consent of the board.

THOMPSON (app.) v. WARD (resp.)

ELLIS (app.) v. BURCH (resp.)

Parliament—Borough franchise—Dwelling-house—"Part of a house occupied as a separate dwelling and separately rated to the relief of the poor"—Representation of the People Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, ss. 3 and 61).

In each of these cases, the question was whether what the appellants occupied, was a dwelling house within the meaning of the Representation of the People Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102), s. 3, as interpreted by sect. 61.

In the first case, H. occupied one room in a house which consisted of nine rooms, and which, though originally built for one family, was now let out in six several tenements to six tenants. The house had an outer door leading into the street, but this was never closed, and now had no lock or bolt, although there were still two staples through which a bolt used to, and still might, be shot. The landlord did not reside on the premises. The passage, staircase, and conveniences (the latter consisting of a privy and an ash-pit in a yard at the back of the house), were common to all six tenants. H. and each of the other tenants, had the exclusive occupation of his respective room or rooms, all of which opened out on to the passage or staircase above-mentioned. Each tenant had a separate coal house in the yard at the back. The claimant was separately rated to the relief of the poor, his name appearing in the occupiers' column of the rate book, but all the rates were paid by the owner of the house, whose name appeared in the owners' column.

In the other case the facts were the same, except that there was an outer door which was shut by night, but left open all day, but neither tenant had the right to exclude the other from the use of this outer door, the key of which was lost. The claimant in this case had two rooms, each of which opened on to the passage or staircase; the only communication between the two rooms was the staircase.

In each case the revising barrister held that the subject of occupation was not a dwelling house within the meaning of the above Act.

Held (per Willes and Brett, JJ., dissentientibus Bovill, C. J., and Keating, J.), that the decision of the revising barrister was right.

Semble (per Bovill, C.J.,) that the subjects of occupation were not only "dwelling houses" within the meaning of the 3rd section of the Representation of the People Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102), independently of sect. 61, but that they were "houses" within the meaning of sect. 27 of the Representation of the People Act 1832 (2 Will. 4, c. 45).

THESE two appeals being almost identical as to their facts, were taken and argued together.

THOMPSON v. WARD.

This was an appeal from the decision of the revising barrister for the city of Durham.

The name of G. Herbert appeared in the list of claimants, published by the overseers of the township of Elvet.

Nature of the qualification, "house."

2. In support of the claim the following facts were proved:—

The claimant had for above a year, from and up to July 31st last, occupied as a tenant at the rent of 4*l.* 10*s.* a year, one room in a house situate in Chapel-passage, Old Elvet, in the township of Elvet, in the said city.

3. The house consists of nine rooms, and is let out in six several tenements. Of these, three tenants occupy two rooms each, and each of the other three tenants occupy one room.

4. The house was originally built for one family. The passage, and the staircase, and the conveniences, consisting of a privy and ash pit, which are situate in a yard opposite the passage, are common to all the tenants. Each of the tenants has a separate coal house in the yard. There is an outer or street door to the passage, which is never closed, and is without a lock or bolt, although it retains two staples, through which a bolt formerly was and still might be, shot.

5. Each tenant has the exclusive occupation of his or her respective room or rooms, for which they pay the following rents: (here the rents paid were set out, ranging from 5*l.* 10*s.* to 4*l.* 10*s.*)

6. The owner does not reside on the premises. The name of the claimant appears as separately rated in the occupiers' column of the rate book in all rates made between 31st July 1869 and 31st July 1870; but the landlord, whose name appears in the owners' column of the rate book, paid all the rates.

7. The claim was objected to, on the ground that the claimant was not the occupier of the dwelling house within the meaning of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, and was consequently not entitled to be registered as an elector.

8. On the other hand, it was contended that the premises occupied by the claimant constituted, under the interpretation clause of the Representation of the People Act 1867, a "dwelling house;" and that by the operation of 32 & 33 Vict. c. 41, ss. 7 and 19, the payment of the rates by the owner should be deemed a payment by the occupier for the purpose of any qualification or franchise, which, as regards rating, depends upon the payment of poor rates, and that the claimant was therefore qualified as an elector.

9. I was of opinion that the premises occupied by the claimant were not a "dwelling house" within the meaning of the Representation of the People Act 1867, and disallowed the claim.

10. If the court shall be of opinion that the premises occupied by the claimant were a "dwelling house" within the said Act, his name is to be inserted in the list of voters.

Littler (Manisty, Q. C. with him) for the appellant.

Sir J. Karslake (Pinder with him) for the respondent.

This was an appeal from the decision of the revising barrister for city of Exeter.

ELLIS v. BURCH.

AT a court, &c., Arthur Burch duly objected to the name of the said John Ellis being retained upon the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of members for the said city in respect of his said occupation of a dwelling house in Prospect-place, in the parish of St. Mary Major, within the said city. The facts proved were these: The said John Ellis was, on the 31st July 1870, and had been during the whole of the preceding twelve calendar months, the occupier of two rooms in a seven-roomed house in Prospect-place, of which a Miss Avery was the owner. He occupied these rooms as tenant to Miss Avery at an annual rent of 6*l.* 10*s.*, and the rooms were separately rated, and he was separately rated in respect of them to all rates which had been made for the relief of the poor during the aforesaid twelve months, and by his agreement with Miss Avery such rates were to be paid by her, and had been duly paid accordingly. All other rates and assessed taxes requisite to be paid in respect of the premises occupied by the said John Ellis were duly paid. The rest of the house — viz., five rooms — was occupied by John Chambers, also as tenant to Miss Avery, at an annual rent of 9*l.* 11*s.* 9*d.*, she paying all rates and taxes, and the part of the house so occupied by him was separately rated to the relief of the poor. Miss Avery did not reside on the premises. The house had a front door, which was generally kept open by day and shut by night, being fastened by an ordinary latch and bolt. The door was fastened, sometimes by Ellis and sometimes by Chambers. Neither had any right to exclude the other from the use of the front door. There was a lock, but the key had for some time been lost. Inside the front door was a passage, on the left side of which was a room occupied by John Ellis, and used by him as a sitting room and for cooking his victuals. On the right side of the passage was a sitting room, occupied by John Chambers, behind which was a kitchen, also occupied by John Chambers, and access to which was gained by a door at the back of the sitting room. At the end of the passage was a staircase, used in common by Ellis and Chambers, leading to the first floor. At the top of the staircase was a landing, on one side of which was a room occupied by J. Ellis, and used by him as his bedroom, and situate immediately over his other room on the ground floor. On the other side of the landing was another room, occupied by John Chambers, and used by him as a bedroom. From this landing there was another flight of stairs, leading to the second story, on which were two rooms in the sole occupation of Chambers. Neither Ellis nor Chambers could get from their rooms on the ground floor to their bedrooms on the first floor without going out into the passage and up the staircase above referred to. There was no privy or water closet in the house, but there was a water-closet at the end of the row of houses, common to the house in question, and three other houses. The question for my decision was whether the two rooms thus occupied by John Ellis did or did not constitute a dwelling house within the meaning of the Representation of the People Act 1867. I held that they did not, and therefore expunged the name of the said J. Ellis; except on this question or ground the appellant was found to be qualified to be registered. If the court shall be of opinion that I was wrong, the name of the said John Ellis is to be inserted in the list.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 24.—The judges being equally divided in opinion, the following judgments were given:—

BRETT, J.—In the case of Thompson v. Ward, George Herbert appeared on the list of claimants for the city of Durham as claiming in respect of "a house." The case found that the claimant had for above a year occupied as tenant at 4*l.* 10*s.* per annum, not a house, but one room in a house. The house, it was stated, consists of nine rooms, and is let out in six several tenements. Of these, three tenants occupy two rooms each, and each of the other three tenants occupies one room each. The house was originally built for one family, the passage and the staircase and the conveniences, consisting of a privy and ashpit, which latter are situated in a yard opposite, are common to all the tenants. Each of the tenants has a separate coal house in the yard; there is an outer or street door to the passage—i.e., as I understand, to the passage of the house, which is never closed, and is without lock or bolt although it retains two staples through which a bolt formerly was, and still might be, shot. Each tenant has the exclusive occupation of his or her room or rooms. The owner does not reside on the premises. The claim was objected to on the ground that the claimant was not an occupier of a dwelling house within the meaning of the statute 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102. The revising barrister was of opinion that the premises occupied by the claimant (he does not, it is to be observed, speak of the room only) were not a "dwelling house" within the meaning of the Act, and disallowed the claim. The question for the opinion of the court was left in these terms: "If the court shall be of opinion that the premises occupied by the claimant were a 'dwelling house' within the meaning of the Act, his name is to be inserted in the list of voters." It was argued on behalf of the appellant that the claimant, according to the case of Henrette v. Booth (sup.), would have been entitled to be registered under the old Act if the premises occupied by him had been of sufficient value, and was therefore entitled under the new Act; or, if he would not have been entitled under the old Act, that the new Act was intended to alter the old Act as interpreted in Cook v. Humber (sup.); that within the meaning of the new Act, every occupier must be either an occupying tenant or a lodger; that the claimant was not a lodger because the landlord did not occupy any part of the house, and was therefore an occupying and resident tenant; that the claimant's case comes within the very words of sect. 61 of the new Act, because his room, which is the tenement occupied by him is part of a house; he alone occupies the room, he therefore occupies it separately, it is therefore occupied as a separate dwelling. It was argued respondent that the premises occupied by imant, even if of sufficient value, would not iven a qualification under the old Act: that w Act does not, as to the point in dispute, he old Act; that the claimant may be con- l as a lodger, although the landlord does not any part of the premises, or because the d in this case does occupy the passage and se; that the question is not whether the nt is a lodger, but whether he occupies a ig house within the meaning of sects. 3 and he statute; that it is not sufficient to show e claimant occupies separately, for a lodger es separately in the sense in which the was used in argument: that the tenement ed by the claimant was "part of a house," but ccupied as a separate dwelling," because in to use or enjoy as a dwelling, that part of use which is said to be his separate dwelling, essarily used another part of the house in m with other persons. I am of opinion that se of Henrette v. Booth, in which the cir- nces were very peculiar, and which I ven- think trenched somewhat too closely on much considered case of Cook v. Humber, ot oblige us to hold that the tenement occu- y the claimant was a "house" within the ig of the old Act. It seems to me to be y inconsistent with the findings in this case that the tenement occupied by the claimant use within the meaning of the old Act. It re seems to me that the case, as stated and , raises the question, What is the true legal etation of sects. 3 and 61 of the Representa- the People Act 1867? Now, in the first in order to arrive at what is the exact point lecided, I think it better to point out what , in my opinion, be taken into consideration. the old Act two separate buildings could joined together to make up the value ed (Dewhurst v. Fielden, sup.; Powell v. sup.); such separate buildings as the con- ces described in this case could not have oined to the tenement, i.e., the room, or om, passage, and staircase, to make up alue, although the fact of the use of om, being more valuable by reason of the to use the conveniences might have been into account as adding to the value of m, &c. But the thing to be considered as bject matter of the occupation would have ccording to the decisions, the room alone, or om, passage, and staircase under the same so, as it seems to me, a joint occupation of eparated and external buildings as the con- ces in this case, can have no effect upon estion whether the tenement, i.e., the room, ccupied by the claimant is so separately ed by the claimant as to be a dwelling house within the meaning of the 61st section. lly, it does not seem to me to be necessary ermine whether the claimant is or is not a . It may be that a claimant occupying a nt does not occupy such a tenement as s him to be placed on the register as an tant householder, though he may not be a . Thirdly, it does not seem to me neces- consider the cases of tenements which have tructurally separated from the house of they were once a part, or of tenements as originally constructed, never were part ouse. Such tenements were held to be houses within the meaning of the old Act, and are doubtless also houses within the meaning of the third section of the present Act without reference to the interpretation clause. The cases of chambers in the Inns of Court, and probably of the flats in Victoria-street (though with regard to these latter, which have been so often quoted, as if the circumstances relating to them had been the subject of judicial decision I should prefer to reserve an opinion until the facts are ascertained) are, I apprehend, within the latter proposition, that is to say, they are tenements which as originally constructed were not parts of a house. The question as put forward in the present case is in respect of a room which is stated in the case to be a room in a house, which house was originally constructed as one house, which house is still structurally the same house as it always was, and from which the room in question has never been more structurally separated than it was in the beginning. The question, therefore, and the only question is, whether that room is a dwelling house within the new statute. Now the 27th section of the Reform Act 1832 was, after many apparently fluctuating decisions, though they have been explained to be really consistent, finally interpreted in the ruling case of Cook v. Humber. And in that case it was pointed out that under that section the qualification is made up of four elements, viz., tenement, value, occupation, and estate. There must be for tenement, it is said, a house, warehouse, &c.; there must be for value annually to 10*l.*; there must be occupation, that is, actual exercise of the rights of the owner of a house in possession during the requisite time; there must be an estate in the tenant either in fee or lease. If these four distinct elements are combined in the claimant he is qualified, but otherwise he is not. Now, although it is said they must exist in combination in order to qualify, still in inquiring into the existence of the combination, each element must be separately ascertained. First, is the claimant a tenant? secondly, is he an occupier? thirdly, is the tenement sufficient in value? fourthly, in kind? The 3rd section of the Representation of the People Act 1867 so closely follows the form and structure of the 27th section of the Reform Act 1832, and deals so entirely with a similar subject, that it seems to me impossible to deny that the qualification under it is compounded of elements which must be combined in the claimant in order to qualify him, and that in considering whether he is or is not qualified by such combination each element must be separately ascertained. The elements, then, of qualification under the 3rd section are estate, occupation, and tenement. The element of value is discarded. There must be an estate in the tenant, that is to say, a holding as owner or tenant. There must be occupation. And as to this element it seems to be useful to observe carefully how it is dealt with in the statute. It seems to me that it is completely dealt with in the third section. According to that section, without referring to the interpretation section, there must be an actual exercise of the right of inhabitancy in, and of ownership of, the house for the requisite time, and such actual exercise of rights must, by the proviso, be the separate exercise of it, and must not be a joint exercise of it with another. The question of joint or separate occupation is completely disposed of in the section whilst dealing with the element of occupation. The remaining element, the nature of which must be separately ascertained, is the tenement or thing occupied. That is described in the section as a "dwelling house." If there had been no other description of it in the statute, I apprehend the court, in accordance with Cook v. Humber (supra), must have held that it must be as much structurally a separate house as the house described in the 27th section of the former Act. I say so because the two statutes deal with a similar subject-matter, and there is an express enactment that they are to be read togegether as one. But then comes the 61st section, which enacts that "the following terms shall in this Act have the meanings hereinafter assigned to them, &c., that is to say, dwelling house shall include any part of a house occupied as a separate dwelling, and separately rated to the relief of the poor." Before attempting to interpret this clause, some things should be observed in it. It may be said to be applicable, not only to the 3rd section, but to several others. I incline, however, to think that whatever may be its interpretation, it can only be applied to the 3rd section. But, as applied to the 3rd section, I think it most material to observe that it is a definition of the tenement—that is, the thing to be occupied—of that element, and not of the element which is called occupation, that is the mode or manner of occupying the thing occupied. Subject to these observations, there arises the real and to me most difficult question what is the proper interpretation of this clause. I must repeat that to me this clause which, assuming to deal with the question of what the tenement occupied is to be, and to define only that element of qualification, is a most difficult and obscure enactment. It has been suggested that it means that the thing occupied may be part of a house, provided the occupier be not a joint occupier with some one else. If so, the words "occupied as a separate dwelling" are futile, because by reason of the proviso in the 3rd section, the same result exactly would have been arrived at if the only words in the 61st section had been "dwelling-house shall include any part of a house." This alone, as it seems to me, makes it contrary to a well-known and firmly-established canon of construction, to give to the section the suggested interpretation. But further, if that interpretation were adopted, it seems to me that the 3rd section read in that sense and applied as is suggested in this case, would describe exactly the position of a lodger. He may in that sense, equally with the present claimant, be said to occupy as tenant separately, that is to say, not jointly with another, a part of a house. That being so, a lodger might be registered under sect. 3, without reference to the element of value required by sect. 4. Such a reading seems to me to make the 3rd section inconsistent with the existence of the 4th. From these considerations I arrive at the conclusion that the suggested interpretation ought not to be accepted. Another interpretation which was suggested on behalf of the respondents was, that the part of a house described in the 61st section must be structurally separated from the rest of the house. This interpretation is open to the objection that it gives no real effect to this 61st section, because the same interpretation would without it, by reason of Cook v. Humber (sup.), have been placed upon the 3rd section itself. This objection is, I think, a valid one, and the clause cannot be so interpreted. The 61st section does, in my opinion, get rid of the necessity of a structural separation. It follows that the correct interpretation is between these two extremes. Considering always that this 61st section is dealing with the thing occupied, and not with the mode of occupying it, I think that the word "occupied" in this section has its popular meaning of "used," and is not dealing with the technical and legal idea of "occupation." The clause should be read thus: "Dwelling house shall include any part of a house used as a separate dwelling." The interpretation to which I feel forced to arrive at is that, although there need not be a structural separation, there must be a practical separation of the thing occupied from the rest of the house. The true construction seems to me to be that the part of the house occupied by the inhabitant of it, who claims to be registered, should be so situated in the house of which it is a part, and should be in such a condition as to be capable of being used, and should be in fact used as a house wholly separated from other houses and used as such by its inhabitants. If, in order to use, or in the using of the part of the house in respect of which he claims, the claimant has stipulated for, or has accepted the right of using, or does in fact use some other part of the house, as a part of a house, then besides using exclusively or separately the part of a house to which he confines his claim, he uses another part jointly with others. And the part of the house for which he claims is not the part of the house which he really uses. It is only a part of that part. The part which he really uses is composed of the part to which he improperly confines his claim, and the part jointly used by him and others. The part of the house which he really uses, is a part not used as a separate dwelling, because a part of it is used by him jointly with others. Under such circumstances, the case, in my opinion, is not within either the 3rd or the 61st section. I have said, "improperly confines his claim," because I feel certain that if the construction of the statute at which I have arrived be correct, a claimant cannot properly be allowed to evade the consequence of that interpretation by claiming in respect of a part only of that which he really uses. If a claimant could reject all the uses he makes of a house, except the use of the one room he is allowed or has a right to occupy exclusively, and could claim in respect of the exclusive use of that room, every inmate of a house, except a servant, must be taken to be the inhabitant occupier of a house within a house, though the owner of the whole house is resident in and has control over all the house but the one room. If a claimant can do this, the description of the qualification in the 3rd section becomes an idle and inapplicable phrase. The present claimant, in my opinion, fails, because the part of the house which he really uses is composed of the room to which he has improperly confined his claim, and the passage and staircase which he uses in common with the other occupiers, and which passage and staircase are by the express findings in this case not parts of a street or way, but parts of the house of which the room is a part. I think it not unworthy of notice that the interpretation of the statute thus arrived at makes the definition of a house and of a householder under the statute consistent with the definition at common law of a house and a householder, enumerated for the purpose of the franchise by the committee in the Cirencester Case (sup.):—"Neither can a person be deemed to be a householder whose habitation is composed of more apartments than one, unless he also possesses an exclusive right to the use of the staircase, doorway, or other passage that forms the means of communication between the several apartments. The original right to an exclusive use is the point of discrimination between the householder on the one hand and the inmate on the other." I am of opinion that the decision of the revising barrister was right, and ought to be affirmed.

KEATING, J.—In these cases the appellants claimed to vote under the provisions of the 3rd section of the Representation of the People Act 1867, as inhabitant occupiers of "dwelling houses" within the meaning of that Act. The facts were that they resided in parts of houses, the one in two rooms, the other in one room. In each case the residence was exclusive as to the rooms, though not as to the use of the passages or all the out-door conveniences, and there was complete control over the use of the outer door or entrance to the houses. In neither case did the owner reside upon the premises, and in each case there was a separate rating of the claimant in respect of the part of the house occupied by him. The only question in each case was whether the rooms so occupied were "dwelling houses" within the meaning of the Act referred to. Before the passing of the Representation of the People Act of 1867 the borough franchise in respect of the occupation of houses was regulated by the Reform Act of 1832, 2 Will. 4, c. 45, s. 27, which confined it to the occupation of "any house" of the value of 10*l*. Residence in the house was not necessary; it was sufficient if the residence were within seven miles of the borough in which the house was situated. Under this statute questions frequently arose as to what constituted "a house" within the meaning of the section, and it was decided early that the subject of the qualification need not be a house in the popular acceptation of the term, but that rooms in a house, if, as it was termed, "structurally severed" from the rest, might constitute "a house" so as to satisfy the statute. But the difficulty remained as to what amounted to such a "structural severance" as would be sufficient. In Cook v. Humber an attempt was made by this court to lay down certain rules, by which it was hoped the difficulty might be overcome; but I think that the subsequent case of Henrette v. Booth renders it at least doubtful how far that hope was realised. The truth seems to be that the question of "structural severance" was and continued to be one of very difficult solution, depending upon the circumstances of each case—the cases oftentimes running very closely together, of which the cases referred to furnish a complete illustration. In this state of things, which must be assumed to have been within the knowledge of the Legislature, they were pleased to create a new franchise, and to enact that an inhabitant occupier as owner or tenant of any "dwelling house," without reference to value, might vote, and, as if to get rid of the difficulty of what should amount to "structural severance," the Act provided that "any part of a house occupied as a separate dwelling and separately rated to the relief of the poor," should constitute a "dwelling house" within the meaning of the Act. Now it appears to me that the claimants here satisfy in terms the requirements of the Act. Each occupies a part of a house as a separate dwelling, and is separately rated in respect of such occupation. But it was argued on behalf of the respondents that the claimant could not be said to occupy the rooms "as a separate dwelling," unless the dwelling constituted "a house" within the meaning of the former Act 2 Will. 4, c. 45, s. 27, in other words, that the later Act made no change whatever in the nature of the subject matter of occupation for the purposes of the franchise, but only in its value, and that when the Legislature said in the one Act "a house," and in the other "any part of a house," they in effect meant one and the same thing. Now whether there was in the present case such a "structural severance" as would constitute "a house" under the former Act, I do not inquire, because I am quite unable to accept the interpretation contended for. Indeed, the only foundation for that I am aware of is the occurrence in the 61st section of the words, "occupied as a separate dwelling," the word "house" being there dropped; but inasmuch as the clear intention was that a joint occupation was not to confer the franchise, unless of sufficient value to qualify under the 27th section of the former Act, there seems to me to be nothing more unnatural in expressing that purpose in the 61st section, although it had been previously provided for in the 3rd section, than in repeating the necessity for separate rating, which had already been expressed in the same previous section. As to the exclusive use being confined to the rooms, and not extending to the passages and other means of access as well as the conveniences, the franchise even under the former Act did not exact that as a qualification, as witness the occupation of chambers, flats, and other cases of a like description; whilst, if the intention of the Legislature really was in conferring the new franchise, not in any way to alter or affect the nature of the subject of occupation, it is inconceivable to my mind why they should not have expressed themselves differently. It was also contended, as the Legislature by the 4th section of the later Act, requires that to entitle a lodger to vote, his lodgings must be of the annual letting value of 10*l*., that to give the franchise to the present claimants would in effect defeat the object of the 4th section by enabling a lodger to vote out of a lodging of less value than 10*l*. But that argument seems to me to beg the question, and to assume the claimants to be lodgers within the meaning of the Act. Now what in point of law constitutes a lodger may not always be easy to ascertain; whether the landlord residing on the premises be a test or not, or what other test may be applied, it is not, as it seems to me, necessary to determine; if at all events, a man is not a lodger who has the exclusive occupation of rooms or a room in a house, where the owner neither resides nor exercises any control whatever over the outer door, and who is separately rated for the subject of his occupation; and in my opinion, whatever the correct definition of a lodger may be, the claimants in the present cases are not in the position of lodgers as contemplated by the 4th section of the Act of Parliament. Upon the whole, therefore, I think the appellants are entitled to the judgment of the court, and that the decision of the revising barrister ought to be reversed.

WILLES, J.—I regret much the difference of opinion which exists in this case, more especially as, agreeing, as I do, with the opinion expressed by my Brother Brett, the result will be that, the court being equally divided, the decision of the revising barrister must stand against the opinion of two of the judges. We are not entertaining an appeal from that decision upon a question of fact, but upon a question of law—viz., whether a man who occupies two rooms, one downstairs and one upstairs, in a dwelling house occupied by others who have an equal use of the staircase and outer door of the house as himself, such rooms being separately rated to the relief of the poor, is a person who occupies a separate dwelling house, or whether he is a mere lodger who jointly occupies with others. We have no right to assume any material fact beyond those which the revising barrister has found, because by sect. 42 of the Registration Act (6 Vict. c. 18) he is to state in writing "the facts which, according to his judgment, shall have been established by the evidence in the case, and which shall be material to the matter in question." It was for him to decide whether in point of fact the house described in each of these cases is so divided, whether vertically or horizontally, as that the room occupied by the claimant in the city of Durham, in the one case, or the two rooms occupied by the claimant, in the city of Exeter, in the other case, may constitute a separate dwelling house. In each case he has found that the room or rooms so occupied are not separate dwelling houses. The claimant has no outer door of his own. In each case it is found that there is an outer or street door, though in one case negligently kept, and that the rooms are rooms in an ordinary house occupied by persons who to my mind, and according to the decision of this court in Cook v. Humber, are persons who, for want of control over a separate outer door, are to be dealt with as lodgers, and not as occupiers of separate dwelling houses. We are called upon to find that the room or rooms as described constitute separate dwelling houses, which, according to the ordinary interpretation of the English language, is to find the thing that is not; we are called upon to find that to be a dwelling house which the revising barrister has found not to be a dwelling house. If the matter came before me as one of fact, it is possible, though not likely, that I might arrive at a different conclusion; but, to arrive at such a conclusion as matter of law only would be expanding the facts by a construction of law which at least is doubtful; and I decline to do so. Ordinarily, at common law, and according to the common understanding of mankind, rooms in a house, the occupier of which rooms has no control over a separate outer door, do not constitute "a house." They are not "houses" within the Reform Act, neither are they "dwelling houses" within the Representation of the People Act 1867. The Act which indicates what ought to be the conclusion come to in this case is the Reform Act (2 Will. 4, c. 45). It is a mistake to suppose that the Representation of the People Act 1867 repeals, or was intended to be a substitution for, the Reform Act, except in so far as it extends the franchise, by enabling a person who in respect of the occupation of a dwelling house, would be entitled to a vote under the Reform Act, provided the subject of occupation was of the annual value of 10*l.*, to acquire a vote, even though it be not of that value, subject to certain conditions. The 27th section of the Reform Act gives the right of voting to one who occupies, as owner or tenant, "any house, warehouse, counting-house, shop, or other building," which, of course, includes a dwelling house, though not necessarily so confined. That is the main provision in the Act of Will. 4. Then comes the provision as to joint occupation, which I agree with my Brother Keating, is of the highest importance, when looking at the Representation of the People Act 1867. That is sect. 29, which enacted that, where premises shall be jointly occupied by more persons than one, as owners or tenants, each of such joint occupiers shall, subject to certain conditions, be entitled to vote in respect of the premises so jointly occupied, in case the clear yearly value of such premises shall be of an amount which, when divided by the number of such occupiers, shall give a sum of not less than 10*l.* for each and every such occupier. We have, therefore, under that Act, a general provision, including a special provision as to voting in respect of a house of the yearly value of 10*l.* There is another matter which it is important to look at when we come to construe the Act of 1867. It is that, though, upon the true construction of sect. 27 of the Reform Act, part of a building might constitute a house, if structurally separated from the rest, this court has held that no lodger, whether the landlord himself occupied any part of the premises or not, or whether the lodger had a key of the outer door or not, could acquire the franchise under the Reform Act. We start, therefore, with this, that joint occupiers, but not lodgers, had a right to vote under that Act. I cannot take the view adopted by my brother Keating, and, I believe, by my Lord also, as to lodgers. I cannot help thinking that the position of a lodger has been well defined. It was so in the masterly judgment of Chief Justice Erle, in Cook v. Humber (sup.), every word of which is applicable here. I entirely adopt it, and I think the subsequent case of Henrette v. Booth (sup), is not at all inconsistent with it. I conceive it to be a judgment as conclusive as anything can be which is not demonstrated by mathematical reasoning. In Cook v. Humber (sup.), the appellant occupied rooms in a house which are thus described: "The rooms on the ground floor have doors into the house passage or hall, which is shut off from the street by an outer door, kept closed during night and day. The rooms on the upper floor rented by him are approached by a staircase, used exclusively by him, and there is no communication between such rooms and the rooms on the other side of the passage. The rest of the house is occupied by the landlord, who resides therein with his family. The appellant has a lock and key to each of his rooms, and both he and his landlord have keys of the street door, and they are rated jointly." The question was whether the person who occupied that large portion of a house was a tenant within the meaning of the Reform Act. It was held that he was not, because there was no structural severance of the part so occupied by him from the rest of the house. All the previous decisions were there cited. The Chief Justice says, at p. 44 of 11 C. B., N. S., "We consider that the qualification fails, because the subject of occupation was not a house, but only a part of a house, without any actual severance from the residue." He then goes on to define the elements of a qualification for a borough vote: and at p. 45 of 11 C. B., N. S., he says, "As to the kind of tenement which qualifies, the statute has described two classes of buildings, viz., those used for residential, and those used for commercial purposes—house, for residence; warehouse, counting-house, shop, or other analogous building, for commerce. When the claim is in respect of a house, we consider that the Legislature did not intend to create a part of a house used for residence, and not for commerce, a tenement sufficient to qualify. A part of a house cannot truly be said to be a house, unless the word 'house' is used in two senses. In Judson v. Luckett (sup.) a part of a house in one sense was in another sense a whole house, by reason of actual severance." Then, after disposing of the argument that the appellant might have been considered to be in the occupation of "another building," and observing that it had always been held that a lodger was not qualified as a householder, he refers to Fludyer v. Lambe (sup.), where the objection to the plaintiff's vote was, that he had let part of his house in lodgings, and so was not the sole occupier; but Lord Hardwicke ruled to the contrary, and said, "A lodger was never considered by anyone as the occupier of a house; it is not the common understanding of the word; neither the house nor any part of it can be properly said to be in the tenure and occupation of the lodger." I might here add a reference to Brewer v. M'Gowen (sup.) in which the same doctrine was laid down in this court since the passing of the Representation of the People Act; and with reference to its construction his Lordship then goes on (11 C. B., N. S., 46): "Since the Reform Act the same opinion is conveyed in the decisions holding that occupation as a lodger did not qualify. The common meaning of "lodgings" is a part of a house used for residence. If the Legislature had intended to make lodgers qualified, we think it would not have been left to obscure conjecture from the words "other building." Every word of that is worth considering, because the Chief Justice is there speaking of a part of a house occupied as a separate dwelling, which is the language used in the 61st section of the Act of 1867; and I entirely agree that it should not be left to obscure conjecture who is to vote in the election of members of Parliament. His Lordship then refers to Wright v. Stockport (5 M. & G. 33; 1 Lutw. 32), where the occupation of a separate room in a cotton spinning factory was held to qualify, because each separate room was, by reason of actual severance, and the fact of its having a separate outer door, an entire building in one sense, though part of the entire building (the factory) in another sense, and adds: "Assuming this to be the correct construction of the statute, the question here is brought to the point whether the rooms occupied by the appellant are a 'house.' We think that they were correctly decided by the revising barrister not to be a house within the meaning of the statute, because they formed part of a house when they were let, and there was no actual severance of the appellants' part from the other part." Considering the great care which was taken in framing the Act of 1867, I cannot help thinking that that passage was in the minds of its framers when they introduced into sect. 61 the interpretation of "dwelling house;" and though I agree in the main with the judgment of my Brother Brett, I do not see my way to the conclusion that there need not be actual structural severance, but that any practical division will suffice. I do not see how it was possible to select words which, having regard to the former Act, and to the construction which had been put upon it, could be a clearer indication of an intention to go no further as to "dwelling-house" than the Legislature had previously gone as to "house." The Chief Justice goes on (11 C. B., N. S., 47): "No authority earlier than Score v. Huggett (sup.) and Jones v. Luckett (sup.) was cited to show that a part of a house may become a 'house' without any actual severance, by reason of some conventional arrangement in respect of the keys of the outer door, or the pernoctation of the landlord; and the authorities are uniform to show that, by actual severance, a part of a house became changed into a house, and without that severance the change would not be effected." The whole reasoning of that judgment completely dispels all doubt, and shows that the character of the subject of occupation cannot be changed by reason of the circumstance of the landlord residing or not residing upon the premises, or by the fact of the occupier of the rooms having or not having a key of the outer door. He then refers to Monks v. Dykes (sup.), where Parke, B., speaking of the doctrine of Lord Coke, that a chamber may be domus mansionalis in law (3 Inst. 65, 66), says that "it refers to a house divided into several chambers, with separate outer doors, and that neither in law nor in common sense can a man be said to be in possession of a dwelling house where he is a mere lodger." And referring to the rule as to burglary, which he says has no analogy with qualification, the Chief Justice concludes (11 C. B., N.S., 48): "The general rule is, that a part of a house, in the common understanding of the word, does not become a house in law, unless there be actual severance. In Leach's Crown Cases, 90, in the notes to Roger's case, Lord Holt's opinion is reported thus: "If inmates have several rooms in a house, of which rooms they keep the keys, and inhabit them severally, yet, if they enter into the house at one outer door with the owner, those rooms cannot be said to be the dwelling-houses of the inmates; but the indictment ought to be, for breaking the house of the owner." If the owner does not reside on the premises, the crime of feloniously breaking into the sleeping abode of a lodger in the night is precisely the same as it would be if the landlord slept there; and, in that case, it is held that the abode of the lodger may be called his domus mansionalis. This exceptional rule, depending on the reasons above assigned, is no ground whatever for holding lodgings to be a 'house' within the meaning of a statute requiring the claimant of a vote to be the occupier of a house; and yet these exceptional cases were pressed on the court in Toms v. Luckett (sup.) as authorities for holding that lodgings became a 'house,' if the owner did not sleep on the premises." That case of Cook v. Humber (sup.) appears to me to dispose of all the arguments arising out of the landlord not residing or sleeping on the premises, and of the tenants having or not having control over the outer door of the house, and show that, under the Reform Act, and upon the finding of the revising barrister in this case, the rooms in question did not constitute a "house" within the meaning of that Act. It appears to me to have laid down a clear and intelligible rule. It is said, however, that doubts have been thrown upon that decision by the subsequent case of Henrette v. Booth (sup.) But the court in that case professed to adhere to their former decision; and the principle which that case adheres to shows that these rooms do not constitute a house within the Reform Act.

The claimant there occupied the upper floor of a house, consisting of two rooms communicating with each other, one being used as a tailor's shop, and the other as a sitting and bed room, and communicating with the landing on the staircase by one outer door, over which the tenant had exclusive control. In neither of the cases now before us is there any such finding; the claimants had no outer door other than that which was common to all the inmates. In Henrette v. Booth (sup.) it was a question of fact for the revising barrister whether, looking at the nature and character of the premises, the door upon the landing was really an outer door. He came to the conclusion, that in point of fact it was so. The judgment of Erle, C.J. lays down precisely the same principle which he had laid down in Cook v. Humber (sup.), but he comes to the conclusion that, as the claimant had exclusive occupation of his rooms, and exclusive control over the outer door thereof, he was entitled to be registered. My brother Keating says (15 C. B., N. S. 511): "Looking at the facts found by the revising barrister, I have come to the conclusion, though not without difficulty, that the appellant was the occupier of a "house" within the meaning of the 27th section of the Reform Act. The only door which the revising barrister speaks of as an outer door is the door leading from the rooms in the appellant's occupation, and over which he had exclusive control. Practically, there was no other outer door. There is, it is true, at the bottom of the staircase, a thing which is in some sense a door, but which wants all the essential elements of an outer door, 'having no lock or fastening of any kind, nor any means of being so closed as to secure the premises from intrusion from the street.' It is as though the outer door were taken off its hinges and left lying at the side of the door posts. I think the revising barrister very properly abstained from calling that the outer door." If the revising barrister there had found the door at the bottom of the staircase to be the outer door of the premises, though neglected and out of repair, the learned judge would evidently have come to the opposite conclusion; and that opposite conclusion I feel bound to adopt in this case. Thus, under the Reform Act, the occupier of a house of the annual value of 10*l.* was entitled to vote. Joint occupiers also, provided the annual value of the house was enough to give each the annual value of 10*l.*, were entitled to vote. Lodgers had no vote. And part of a house might be a "house" within that Act, provided it was structurally severed from the rest of the building of which it formed part. Then came the Representation of the People Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102). That Act did not repeal the former Act, but is to be construed with it. It enlarges the franchise in respect of dwelling houses, but is not therefore to be so construed as to enlarge the species (dwelling house) to such an extent that it could not fall within the original genus (house), without express words to convey such an intention. Sect. 3 deals with two of the points I have referred to. It gives, by sub-sect. 2, the franchise to the occupier whether as owner or tenant, of any dwelling house within the borough irrespective of value; and requires by sub-sect. 3 that he shall have been rated to the relief of the poor in respect of the premises so occupied by him. Then, sub.-sect. 4 contains a proviso that no man shall under this section be entitled to be registered as a voter by reason of his being a joint occupier of any dwelling house. A lodger does not fall within that section. This is obvious, not only from Cook v. Humber (sup.) but also from sect. 4, sub-sect. 2 of which gives the franchise to one who, "as a lodger has occupied in the same borough, separately and as sole tenant, for the twelve months preceding the last day of July in any year the same lodgings, such lodgings being part of one and the same dwelling house, and of a clear yearly value, if let unfurnished, of 10*l.* or upwards." The next section to which reference may be made for the purpose of determining whether "lodger" under this and the former Act is to be differently construed, is sect. 7, sub-sect. 2 of which enacts that, "where the dwelling house or tenement shall be wholly let out in apartments or lodgings not separately rated, the owner of such dwelling house or tenement shall be rated in respect thereof to the poor rate." I do not observe upon the Sunderland case (sup.), though I collect from his judgment that one of the judges had this point in his mind, and that his opinion was the same as that which I entertain. The 7th section has no immediate bearing upon the decision in the case, but it may be usefully referred to for the purpose of showing what was the meaning of the Legislature. It dealt with a lodger where the owner did not dwell in the house in the sense contemplated by the Lord Chief Justice Erle in Cook v. Humber (sup.), and so far adopted his view. I now come to the section which is said to upset all the reasoning, and the conclusion arrived at under the previous sections of the Act, viz., the interpretation clause, sect. 61. This section is one which I find it very difficult to deal with. With great deference to the opinions of my Lord and my brother Keating, I cannot think that the Legislature, by the interpretation they put upon the word "dwelling house," meant to enlarge the franchise given by sect. 3 to such an extent that every man who occupies any portion of a dwelling house—a single room, or a cupboard, of which he is sole tenant—shall have a right to vote as the occupier of a "dwelling house" within that section, although no such franchise existed before, either at common law or under the Reform Act. That does not appear to me to be the proper office of an interpretation clause. It would be to pervert the meaning of what had before been said in plain and unambiguous words. The language is: "Dwelling house shall include any part of a house occupied as a separate dwelling, and separately rated to the relief of the poor." Everyone knows that a "dwelling house" may include several separate dwelling houses, if structurally distinct. It is clear to my mind, that by separate dwelling the Legislature meant a thing which is physically capable of being described as a dwelling house, whether the separation be practical or structural. Taking Cook v. Humber (sup.), as my guide, I adopt the latter expression. It must be something more than a mere room in a dwelling house. Take the case of a common dormitory, where the space to be occupied by each tenant is marked out on the floor: is each space to be called a separate "dwelling house?" Or suppose, instead of a common dormitory, each tenant had a separate sleeping apartment and the use of a common refectory: would they be the occupiers of separate dwelling houses within this Act? These are difficulties which the Legislature may probably think it right to remove. The conclusion I arrive at is that the claimants in these two cases are mere lodgers, and would have votes only under sect. 4, provided their holdings were of the annual value of 10*l.* and the other conditions of that section were satisfied. I think that the intention of the Legislature was that the separate dwelling house referred to in sect. 61 must be something which could properly be called a "dwelling house," and which is structurally, or at least practically, separated from the rest of the dwelling house of which it forms a part—such a dwelling house as would have been a "house" within the Reform Act, and which answers the description of a house as interpreted by this court in Cook v. Humber. I cannot conceive it to have been intended that a man should have a vote as the occupier of the "dwelling house" under this Act which would not have been a "house" under the Reform Act. In Thompson v. Ward the claimant occupied one room of a house which had been built for one family. There were several tenants, all of whom used the passage, staircase, and other conveniences in common. There was an outer door to the passage, though from neglect it was never closed, and was without any available fastening, though it might have been fastened. In Ellis v. Burch the claimant occupied two rooms under similar circumstances; the only difference between the two cases being, that in the one there was no fastening to the outer door, whereas in the other there was a bolt. In neither case had the claimant exclusive control over the outer door; nor was there in either any structural separation, as there was in Henrette v. Booth (sup.) Notwithstanding that, I feel fully impressed with the notion that these statutes for extending the franchise ought to receive a large and liberal construction to the extent of the fullest meaning. That case is fairly to be attributed to the words, and I am clearly of opinion that we should be going beyond the expressed intention of the Legislature if we held that the claimants in these cases are the occupiers of "dwelling houses" or "separate dwellings" within the true meaning of the 3rd and 61st sections of the Representation of the People Act 1867. For these reasons, I think the decision of the revising barrister should be affirmed.

BOVILL, C.J.—I cannot consider that the question raised upon this appeal is at all concluded by the revising barrister having called a door to the passage which was never closed, and was without lock or bolt, "an outer or street door," or that the decision of the case depends upon the existence of such a door. The point submitted for our judgment is whether the claimant's premises, as described (including the description of the door), constitute a dwelling house within the meaning of "The Representation of the People Act 1867." The 3rd section of that Act gives the franchise, subject to certain qualifications, to an inhabitant occupier as owner or tenant of any dwelling house, and the word "dwelling house," it is declared by the interpretation clause, sect. 61, "shall include any part of a house used as a separate dwelling and separately rated to the relief of the poor." The Legislature not having given any more precise definition of what is to be deemed a dwelling house, this court is called upon to say what is the proper construction to be placed upon that term as used in the statute, and upon the interpretation clause with reference to it. In considering this question, and endeavouring to ascertain the meaning of the Act from the language in which it is framed, it is not unimportant to bear in mind what had been the decisions upon the Reform Act of 1832, and what was considered the state of the law at the time the Act of 1867 was passed. In the Act of 1832, s. 27, the words used with reference to the borough franchise were, "every person who shall occupy as owner or tenant any house, warehouse, counting-house, shop, or other building," of a certain value, &c., and upon that enactment various questions arose as to the nature of the qualifying tenement, and also as to the character of the occupation, and there were numerous decisions upon these points, especially with reference to what was to be deemed "a house or other building," and what was an occupation as tenant, which involved the consideration of what was an occupation by a mere lodger as distinguished from a wholly independent tenant. It would be very difficult to reconcile the whole of these decisions, nor is it very material for the present purpose to attempt to do so. They were carefully considered by this court in Cook v. Humber (sup.), and will be found collected in the report of that case; and in the result, the court came to the conclusion that part of a house could not be considered as coming within the words "other building," and that it could not be considered "a house" unless it was structurally severed from the rest of the building of which it formed a part. It was also considered that the question in most of these cases resolved itself into one, as to the nature of the subject-matter of the occupation rather than of the nature of the occupation of the tenement. It is also to be borne in mind that in buildings used for commerce, part of a house—such as a counting-house or warehouse—is, by the express terms of the Act, declared to be a qualifying tenement, although it was not so with regard to a house used for residence. In Cook v. Humber (sup.), the claimant occupied as tenant one side of a house consisting of rooms on a ground floor, and rooms on the upper floor, with a separate staircase communicating between the rooms, and used exclusively by the tenant of those rooms, the entrance to the rooms being by doors to the rooms on the ground floor from the house passage or hall, which was shut off from the street by an outer door, kept closed during night and day, and the claimant had a key of the street door. There was no communication with the rooms on the other side of the house, and the landlord occupied and resided in the rest of the house, and had a key of the street door. It was decided that the rooms so occupied by the claimant were part of a house only, without any actual severance from the residue, and not a house; that the Legislature did not intend to create part of a house used for residence and not for commerce, a tenement sufficient to qualify a voter, and that the claimaint was therefore not entitled to the franchise as the occupier of a house within the meaning of that statute. The court in that case also laid down (at 11 C. B., N. S., 44) that a house might be divided by the structure into several flats constituting several houses, although there was an outer door to the whole house of which the tenants of the flats had not the key, and which was kept closed and under the sole control of a porter for the security of the tenants, and although the porter resided in one of the flats, and was the owner of all the others under the same roof. That case was followed by Wilson v. Roberts (sup.) where it was also held that two rooms occupied by the appellant as offices and being the whole of the first floor, the landlord occupying the shop and residing with his family in the rest of the house, and each having a key of the street-door, and the appellant's rooms not being structurally severed from the rest of the house, were a part of a house only, and not a house within the meaning of the Act. In the year 1863 the court had again to consider the question in the case of Henrette v. Booth (sup.) In that case the claimant occupied the whole of the upper floor of a house, consisting of two rooms communicating with each other, one being used as a tailor's shop, and the other as a sitting room and bedroom, and communicating with the landing on the staircase by one outer door, over which the tenant had exclusive control. The other floors were occupied by other tenants. There was a common staircase, and at the entrance from the street was a door, open all day, but generally allowed to swing to at night, but having no lock or fastening of any kind. The previous decisions were again carefully considered, and the court, adhering to their decision in Cook v. Humber (sup.), came to the conclusion and decided that the claimant was the occupier of a house within the meaning of the statute, the floor occupied by him being severed horizontally from the rest of the house as completely as in the case of chambers, in the Inns of Court, where there was sometimes the additional circumstance of an outer door, and sometimes not, Erle, C.J., adding, "the party has exclusive possession of the floor occupied by him and exclusive control over the outer door of the floor," and he repeated what had been previously stated, that the nature of the tenements could not depend on the presence or absence of the landlord, or the possession of a key of the outer door to the street. In this case my Brother Keating was also of opinion that the door to the street could not properly be considered an outer door, and I am of the same opinion as to the door in this case. In these cases the court found it extremely difficult to define in language what was "a house" within the meaning of the Act, or what was such an actual severance within the meaning of their own decisions as would constitute part of a house a house for the purpose of the franchise. When the Representation of the People Act 1867 was passed, the term "dwelling house" was introduced, but the Legislature equally abstained from defining what was a dwelling house except by declaring in the interpretation clause that the term "dwelling house" should include "any part of a house occupied as a separate dwelling, and separately rated to the relief of the poor." The principal difficulty under the former Act was to determine when part of a house was to be considered only part of a house, and when it was to be considered "a house," within the meaning of that Act, and that had to be determined with reference to its structure, and its severance from the other parts of the building. This was a difficulty with respect to the nature of the tenement which was the subject of occupation; and when the last Act was passed, and the Legislature enacted that a "dwelling-house" should include any part of a house, it would seem to have been with the express intention of avoiding the difficulties that had arisen as to when part of a house was to be considered a house, and with the object, so far as the subject o occupation was concerned, of making it immaterial for the future whether the part of the house was to be considered a "house" or not. The Legislature, however, at the same time, by adding the words "occupied as a separate dwelling," introduced a qualification with respect to the nature of the occupation as distinguished from the subject of occupation, thus making the part of a house a sufficient tenement, and putting it upon the same footing as an entire house, provided it was occupied in the manner and for the purpose specified—viz., as a separate dwelling, and was separately rated. Part of a house, if used as a warehouse, counting-house, or shop was a sufficient tenement for the purpose of the borough franchise under the Act of 1832, and the Act of 1867 seems to me to place part of a house occupied as a separate dwelling upon the same footing. We next have to consider the effect of the words "occupied as a separate dwelling." These words appear to me, as I have already observed, to point to the nature and purpose of the occupation; and an occupation for mere professional purposes is not sufficient: (Cuthbertson v. Butterworth, sup.). They cannot mean that there is to be an absolutely separate dwelling, consisting of what is commonly or legally considered an entire house, because the tenement to which the words refer is described as part of a house used as a separate dwelling, meaning, I apprehend, that the part must be used as a separate dwelling. The words "separate dwelling" again seem to require that the occupation as a dwelling must be separate as distinguished from a joint occupation. There must also, for the purpose of obtaining the franchise under section 2 of the Act of 1867, which in this respect corresponds with sect. 27 of the Act of 1832, be an occupation by the occupier as owner or tenant. Under the former Act a person who occupied as a lodger, though in one sense a tenant, was not considered to occupy as owner or tenant within the meaning of that Act, and the same rule must prevail under the late Act, more especially as the franchise is now by sect. 4, under certain conditions, given to lodgers in respect of their lodgings. In the case submitted to us by the revising barrister, no question is raised as to the room of the claimant being occupied by him as a tenant; and the question really turns on whether such room is to be considered "part of a house occupied as a separate dwelling." Now it is part of a house, and it is occupied by the claimant alone, and not jointly with any other persons, and for the purpose of his residence or dwelling, and as it seems to me of his separate dwelling, and as an independent tenant. It is also found, whether rightly or not we are not at liberty upon this case to inquire, to have been separately rated to the relief of the poor, and I am therefore of opinion that it must be considered a dwelling house within the meaning of the 2nd section of the Act of 1867. In this particular case it also appears to me that it may very well be contended that the room of the claimant was in contemplation of law, a dwelling house of itself, independently of the interpretation clause as well as a house within the meaning of the Act of 1832, and as this point was elaborately argued before us and may arise in other cases, I will state my views upon it. It is quite clear that part of a house, even a single room, may properly and legally be considered and described as a house or dwelling house. For instance, Lord Coke, in treating of burglary in the 3rd Inst. p. 64-5, says, "A chamber or room, be it upper or lower, wherein any person doth inhabit or dwell is domus mansionalis in law," which Parke, B., explains in Monks v. Dykes (sup.), to refer to "a chamber under certain circumstances, viz., when a house is divided into several chambers with separate outer doors." In that case Lord Abinger, C.B., also makes remark that "a room within a house may be a dwelling house or it may not." In Lee v. Gansel (sup.), where the question was as to the rights of bailiffs to break open the door of a room occupied by a lodger within the house, Lord Mansfield after referring to the case of chambers in the inns of court and in colleges, opening upon a common staircase as being clearly several houses, adds: "So if that which was one house originally comes to be divided into separate tenements, and there is a distinct outer door to each, they will be separate houses as Newcastle House." So in Reg. v. The Mayor of Eye. In Re Evans (9 A. & E. 680) Littledale, J., says: "If there be no landlord residing in a house, half a dozen different persons may be stated to have dwelling houses within it." And the other judges thought the fact of the doors opening upon a common staircase made no difference, Coleridge, J., remarking, "That the passage was no more than part of the street." The following may also be mentioned as familiar instances of parts of houses being considered houses, viz., chambers in the Albany, chambers in the inns of court, rooms in the colleges at the Universities, shops in the Burlington Arcade, flats in Victoria-street, apartments in Hampton Court Palace. The decisions in Cook v. Humber and Henrette v. Booth, and the cases there cited are also conclusive to show that a single room may be a house or dwelling house of itself for the purpose of the parliamentary franchise. They also establish that the existence of an outer street door to the house in addition to the outer door of the tenant's chamber, even although the tenant have not the key of it, and the street door is kept locked by a porter who resides on the premises, would not prevent the room being legally a house of itself, provided it be structurally severed from the other parts of the house, and provided the tenant has an outer door of his own to his room, and has the complete control over that door. It seems to me to be very difficult to distinguish this case in principle from many of those which have been referred to. In the present case the room of the claimant is his sole residence and dwelling place. Structurally it is divided from and does not communicate with, the rest of the house. There is, in my opinion, nothing which can properly be considered an outer door except the door to his own room, over which he has complete control; and though he has the use only of the staircase and some other conveniences in common with the other occupiers, if it were necessary to decide the point, I should be disposed to consider that his room was a house of itself within the Act of 1832, and a dwelling house of itself within the Act of 1867, independently of the interpretation clause in the latter Act. It is tolerably clear, however, that when a whole house is let out in apartments, as in the present case, it was not the intention of the Legislature that each of the occupiers of these apartments should acquire the franchise, because being rated was a necessary part of the qualification; and under the exception in the 7th section of the Act of 1867, in such cases unless the apartments were separately rated at the time the Act was passed, the landlord, and not the occupiers, was required to be rated. In this case the occupiers are found to have been rated, and no question is submitted to us on that point; but it may well be doubted whether they could properly be so rated unless the apartments were separately rated at the time of the passing of the Act of 1867, and whether the provisions of the Poor-rate Assessment and Collection Act 1869 at all apply to cases where the occupier was not then liable to be rated, and where consequently there could be no rating of the owner instead of the occupier under that Act. If the question of rating had been raised, it is not improbable that this case would have been found to come within our decision in the late case of Cross v. Allsopp (sup.), decided in last Michaelmas Term, so that the claimant would not be entitled to remain on the list of voters. Another question which was argued at great length, and which indirectly arises, though it is not directly raised by the case submitted to us, is whether the claimant is to be considered a mere lodger? Generally speaking, a lodger is a person whose occupation is of part of a house, and subordinate to and in some degree under the control of a landlord or his representative, who either resides in, or retains the possession of, or a dominion over, the house generally, or over the outer door; and under such circumstances that the possession of any particular part of the house held by the lodger does not prevent the house generally being in the possession of the landlord. Where a landlord resides in part of a house, and there is an outer door from the street, and he by himself or his servants has the control of this outer door, and undertakes the care or control of rooms let to other persons, and the access to them, and those rooms themselves have not anything in the nature of an outer door, and are not structurally severed from the rest of the house, there could be little hesitation in saying that an occupier of those rooms, being part of the house, is only a lodger. On the other hand, if there be no real outer door to the street, and neither the landlord nor his servants, nor anyone representing him occupies any part of the premises, or exercises any control over any part of them, and the rooms occupied by another person are structurally severed from the rest of the house, and have an outer door to the general landing or staircase, and no one but such tenant has or exercises any care or control over the room, or that outer door, as a general proposition the person so occupying those rooms could not properly be said to be a lodger. It is always important in determining whether a man is a lodger to see whether the owner of the house retains his character of master of the house, and whether he occupies a part of it by himself or his servants, and, at the same time, retains the general control and dominion over the whole house, and this he may do, though he do not personally reside on the premises. These views are borne out by the judgment of Maule, J., in Toms v. Luckett (sup.), which was confirmed by my brother Willes in the recent case of Smith v. Lancaster (sup.). They are also in accordance with many authorities where the occupation by a lodger of part of a house or premises has been held not to deprive the landlord of the general possession of the whole house: (See generally Lord Hardwicke in Fludyer v. Lambe (sup.), per Lord Mansfield in Lee v. Gansel (sup.); also Reg. v. Mayor of Eye (sup.), and the recent cases of Brewer v. McGowen (sup.), and Smith v. Lancaster (sup.) In Stamper v. The Overseers of Sunderland (sup.), the court decided that where a house was wholly let out in apartments as in the present case, and the several occupiers were not separately rated at the time the Act passed, the owner was by the express terms of the 7th section of the Representation of the People Act 1869 the proper party to be rated, and that the occupiers of the several rooms could not properly after the passing of that Act be rated in respect of their separate occupations. I was of opinion in that case as each tenant of a room had the sole and exclusive occupation and control over it, although he had the use of the staircase and some other parts of the house in common with the other tenants, and as neither the owner nor landlord nor any person representing him resided in or occupied any part of the house, that these tenants of the rooms must be considered as occupiers of separate tenements for rating purposes, and that each room must be considered a separate and independent dwelling-house or tenement, and I see no reason to change that opinion. My brothers Byles and Montagu Smith were also of opinion that the tenants would, under the Statute of Elizabeth, have been liable to be rated if no other legislation had intervened. My brother Smith no doubt intimated an opinion that such persons might be lodgers and their rooms lodgings within the meaning of the 7th section of the late Act, and a similar argument was urged before us in this case, but the 4th section, on which the lodger franchise depends was not then under consideration, and the 7th section being only a rating clause, and its language apparently taken from Sturges Bourne's Act (59 Geo. 3, c. 12, s. 19), I think the language of that section has little effect upon the construction to be placed on the franchise clauses of the Act. Some stress was laid upon the words "wholly let out in apartments or lodgings" in the exception to the 7th section, including cases where the landlord did not reside upon the premises; but I do not think this argument is entitled to much weight, because "apartments" is a proper term to apply to rooms in a house constituting separate houses in themselves, as was said by Mr. Justice Maule in the case of Score v. Huggett (sup.), and rooms may also be lodgings where, although the landlord does not reside upon the premises, he retains the general control over the house and the outer door. In this case the landlord has no control or dominion over the house or over the outer door; he is not, I think, in any sense the occupier of the house, nor can the possession of the occupiers of the rooms be deemed his possession or occupation of the house generally. I think it cannot properly be said that there is any occupier of the whole house, no one tenant having any control over the house generally beyond the others, nor can the whole of the tenants in any sense be considered as joint occupiers of the house. And I am of opinion that each tenant is the occupier of his own room only, in the independent position of a tenant, and that his occupation is not subordinate to that of any other person, and is not the occupation of a mere lodger. As I have already intimated, I think it was not the intention of the Legislature in the Act of 1867, that the persons occupying separate rooms in a house, when the whole was let out in separate apartments, should have votes, because, under that Act, rating was made an essential test of the qualification, and by the same Act such persons could not be rated unless they were separately rated at the time the Act was passed. The general question of the right of such persons to the franchise is not, however, raised by this case, upon which the only question submitted for our determination, and which we have to decide, is whether the premises occupied by the claimant were a dwelling house within the meaning of the Act. Upon that question it seems to me that the Legislature intended to constitute "any part of a house" (as distinguished from a whole house, in the sense in which the term "house" had been previously interpreted by the cases) a sufficient subject of occupation, provided it was occupied for the purpose of a dwelling, and as a separate dwelling, in the sense of the occupation not being a joint occupation with others of that particular part of the house, and provided there was a wholly independent occupation, as distinguished from that of a mere lodger, and the part of the house was separately rated. The room of the claimant was part of a house, and the nature of his occupation in this case seems to me to fulfil the other conditions, and, it being found that he was separately rated, I am of opinion that he must, for the purposes of this appeal, be considered the occupier of a dwelling house, and that his premises will be considered as a dwelling house within the meaning of the Act of Parliament, and that the decision of the revising barrister disallowing the claim ought upon this point to be reversed. The court, however, I regret, is equally divided in opinion as to the proper interpretation of the words "any part of a dwelling house occupied as a separate dwelling" in the interpretation clause, and the result will be that the decision of the revising barrister in this case must stand. It is very unfortunate that there should be this difference of opinion as to what was intended to be a sufficient subject of occupation under the Act; and as we have been unable to determine the meaning of the words in the statute, it may be for Parliament to consider whether it will pass a declaratory Act in order to define more clearly what was intended to be included under the term "dwelling-house," and who is to be considered a "lodger." The difference of opinion that unfortunately exists upon this subject is practically of less importance than it otherwise might have been, in this and other similar cases, as affecting the franchise generally, because, according to the decision in Stamper v. The Overseers of Sunderland, unless their apartments were separately rated when the Act was passed, these occupiers could not properly under the Act of 1867 be rated to the relief of the poor; and the Act of 1869, which dispenses with the necessity of rating in certain cases would therefore probably be found to have no operation upon their cases according to the decision in Cross v. Alsop, and if so, then, upon an objection being raised to the votes on the point of rating, the claim of those persons to be upon the register ought to be disallowed.

ELLIS v. BURCH.

BOVILL, C.J.—This case differs in its circumstances in some respects from that upon which we have just delivered our opinions, and if the decision had depended upon the nature of the tenement occupied and the necessity of there being a structural severance of the part of the house used as a separate dwellings, I should have been of opinion that there was no such structural severance in this case, but in the view which I take of the construction of the present statute that point does not arise. Although these rooms would not, in my opinion, according to the authorities constitute a house of themselves, yet they are, I think, part of a house, and with regard to the nature and purpose of the occupation they are, as it seems to me, used and occupied as a dwelling and a separate dwelling within the interpretation clause of the Act of 1867; and being found to have been separately rated (whether rightly or otherwise is not now in question), they are in my opinion a dwelling house within the meaning of the 2nd section of the Act of 1867. I think, therefore, upon this case, and upon the point submitted to us, that the decision of the revising barrister ought to be reversed. I may add that in this case also it appears to me that the claimant was the occupier of the rooms in question as an independent tenant, that his occupation was not subordinate to that of any other person, and that no other person had the general occupation or control of the house or outer door, or any dominion over him or the rooms which he occupied, or the outer door of those rooms; and that the claimant under these circumstances occupied as a tenant and not as a lodger, and that his rooms were not lodgings within the meaning of the franchise clause of the Act of 1867. As the same difference of opinion, however, exists upon the bench in this case as in the last, the decision of the revising barrister will stand.

(The result, therefore, was, that in accordance with the decision in Reg. v. Millis (10 Cl. & F. 534, 907), the decision of the revising barrister was in each case affirmed.)

Judgment accordingly.

WOODHOUSE (app.) v. ETHERIDGE (resp.)

Fence season for river fish—Eels—Thames bye-laws—27 & 28 Vict. c. 113.

By 27 & 28 Vict. c. 113, s. 65, the Conservators of the Thames may make bye-laws for any of the purposes mentioned; amongst them, for the protecting, preserving, and regulating of the fisheries in the river Thames, and the preservation of the fish therein; and for determining the times during which the taking of any particular or specified kinds of fish shall not be practised. By the 8*th bye-law made by the conservators, the fence season shall be for pike, jack, perch, roach, rudd, barbel, bream, chubb, carp, tench, grayling, gudgeon, pope, dace, crayfish, bleak, minnow, and every kind of fish known as river fish (except salmon, salmon trout, and trout), the period between the* 14*th Feb. in each year, and the* 31*st May following, both inclusive. By the* 9*th bye-law, a person taking fish within the fence season for the same is liable to a penalty not exceeding* 5*l.*

The appellant was convicted for taking eels within the fence season for river fish; the justices, however, found as facts that all the fish mentioned by name in the bye-law, spawn, and are out of season, and unfit for human food during the fence period; and that there was no sufficient evidence how eels are propagated, nor when they spawn, nor whether they are at any time unfit for food.

Held, that the conviction was right.

APPEAL from a conviction by justices.

At a petty sessions holden at the Town Hall, New Windsor, in the county of Berks, before two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace, in and for the said county of Berks, on Saturday, 25th June 1870, the matter of a certain information and complaint by Henry Whitbread Etheridge, hereinafter called the respondent, against William Woodhouse, the younger, hereinafter called the appellant, whereby the appellant was charged with having unlawfully, in the upper river of the river Thames, taken and attempted to take, and had in his possession, certain kinds of fish, known as river fish—to wit, eels—within the fence season, to wit, between the 14th Feb. and the 31st May, contrary to Upper Thames Bye Laws of 1869, and contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, came on to be heard and determined in due form of law. Upon the hearing of the said information and complaint, the justices convicted the appellant in a penalty of 1*l.* and costs 19*s.*, and the appellant, being dissatisfied with this determination, as being erroneous in point of law, duly applied to the justices according to the form of the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, to state and sign a case, setting forth the points and grounds of such determination for the opinion thereon of this honourable court. In compliance with such application, the following case was stated:

1. The appellant claimed under a lease (which was put in evidence) to be the lessee of a several fishery comprising certain eel bucks in the river of the Upper Thames, under a lease from one Cater, dated 15th Sept. 1868, for the term of seven years from 25th March 1868, at the yearly rent of 50*l.* No question as to the appellant's right or title to such several fishery by virtue of the said lease was raised at the hearing before us.

2. The eels comprised in such fishery form a valuable part of the produce thereof.

3. The respondent is the superintendent of the Upper Thames navigation, duly appointed by the Conservators.

4. The 8th of the Upper Thames Bye Laws of 1869, which purport to be made in exercise of the powers conferred by the Thames Conservancy Act 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. cxlvii., Loc. and Pers.); the Thames Conservancy Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 113), ss. 31, 65; the Thames Navigation Act 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 89), ss. 41, 42; and the Thames Conservancy Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 101). s. 12, is as follows:

Fence seasons.—8. The following respective periods shall be deemed to be the fence season in the upper river, that is to say: (a) For salmon, salmon trout, and trout, the period between the 10th Sept. in each year and the 31st March following, both inclusive. (b) For pike, jack, perch, roach, rudd, barbel, bream, chubb, carp, tench, grayling, gudgeon, pope, dace, crayfish, bleak, minnow, and every kind of fish known as river fish (except salmon, salmon trout, and trout), the period between the 14th Feb. in each year and the 31st May following, both inclusive.

5. By the 9th of the said bye-laws it is declared that it shall not be lawful for any person, as regards the upper river (inter alia), to fish for or take, or attempt to take, or to have in his possession any fish, within the fence season for the same; and that if any person does anything in contravention of this byelaw, he shall, for every such offence, be liable to a penalty not exceeding 5*l*.

6. It was admitted by the appellant, for the purpose of raising the question for decision in this case, that he had, within the limits of the said several fishery, and between the 14th Feb. and the 31st May in the present year, taken eels by means of traps or engines called grig weels.

7. Such grig weels are wicker baskets sunk in the river by means of weights. They contain a chamber into which there is an entrance narrowing inwards nearly to a point, and formed at the end of converging willow rods. These rods diverge easily upon pressure externally, and so admit the long thin body of the eel into the chambers, when they close again and prevent his regress; these engines are intended only to be used for the catching of eels, but other fish may be caught therein.

8. Salmon and salmon trout and trout spawn between the 10th Sept. and the 31st March, and during that period are out of season and unfit for human food, and the taking of them during that period would be a wanton hindrance to their propagation.

9. All the different species of fish specifically named in paragraph (b) of the said 8th bye law, set out in paragraph 4, except salmon and salmon trout and trout, spawn during the period between 14th Feb. and the 31st May, and during that period are out of season and unfit for human food, and the taking of them during that period would be a wanton hindrance to their propagation.

10. Statements were made and quotations read from different works upon natural history by the advocates of appellant and respondent as to the nature and habits of the eel, but no sufficient evidence was given before us to enable us to find as a fact how eels are propagated, whether they are oviparous or viviparous, or whether they do or do not spawn or propagate their young between the 14th Feb. and the 31st May, or at any other particular time. It was alleged by the appellant but disputed by the respondent that eels are never known to be out of season or unfit for human food at any time when it is possible to take them.

11. Eels can only be taken by the means employed by the appellant or otherwise by use of baits during the period between the beginning of March and the end of October. They are taken in the months of October, November, and December by means of large fixed engines called eel bucks, which interrupt them in their passage down the river towards the sea.

12. Upon these facts it was contended before us, on the part of the appellant, that it had not been proved that eels are fish known as river fish, but that it had been proved that they were not ejusdem generis with the several kinds of fish specified by name in sub-sect. (b) of the said 8th bye-law, so as to be included in the description "every kind of fish known as river fish" in the said bye-law mentioned; that they were not within the mischief intended to be provided against by the said bye-law; and that therefore, according to the true and reasonable intent and construction of the said bye-law, the appellant had not committed any offence against the same; but the respondent alleged to the contrary thereof.

13. We, however, being of opinion that the said 8th bye-law included eels in the expression "every other fish known as river fish," considered that we must convict the appellant.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether, upon the facts above stated, we were bound to convict the appellant of an offence against the above-mentioned 9th bye-law if read together with the exception in the 13th bye-law? If we were so bound, the conviction is to be affirmed, if otherwise, it is to be quashed.

The 13th, which was the last byelaw, was as follows:

Nothing in these byelaws, except the provisions relative to the fence season shall take away or abridge any right of the owner or occupier of a private fishery, or any person having a private right of fishing or having authority in writing in this behalf from any such owner, occupier, or person to fish for, or to take, or attempt to take fish by means of nets, commonly called cast nets and cray fish nets, or by grig or ground weels for eels, or by night lines, or by means of eel bucks or stages, so far as the same can be legally used, or with a special licence from the conservators in writing, under their common seal, but not otherwise, by means of a net commonly called a hoop net, having a mesh of not less than 2 inches from knot to knot when wet, or 8 inches all round, and not being more than 6 yards long, or with the like special licence as aforesaid, but not otherwise, by means of a net commonly called a drag net, having a mesh of not less than 2 inches from knot to knot when wet, or 8 inches all round.

Harington, for appellants.—I do not dispute that eels are a river fish, but the framers of these bye-laws, taking into consideration, as appears by the 13th bye-law, that eels were to be found in the river, must have advisedly omitted them from the list of fish to be protected. The case finds as a fact that this fence season is not necessary for eels, and it would be unreasonable to deprive the appellant of a very valuable part of his private property without doing any benefit to the public, whose food these fishery laws were intended to improve. Eels do not belong to either of the species of fish particularly named, and therefore could not be included in the general words which follow. Moreover, these bye-laws are authorised by 27 & 28 Vict. c. 113, and by the 65th section "the conservators may from time to time make bye-laws for the following purposes or any of them;" inter alia, "For the protection, preserving, and regulating of the Fisheries in the river Thames, and the preservation of the fish therein;" and "for determining the times during which the taking of any particular or specified kind of fish shall not be practised." The expression "Every kind of fish known as river fish" cannot therefore come within the authority given by the Act to the conservators to restrain the taking of any particular or specified kinds of fish. And if this be so, the 67th section applies to this case; "This Act or any power conferred by this Act or any bye-law made or other thing done under any such power, except any bye-law made for any of the purposes following [there are excepted those purposes for which the conservators are authorised by the 65th section to make bye-laws] shall not extend to take away, alter, or abridge any right, claim, privilege franchise, exemption, or immunity, to which any owner or occupier of any private fishery in the river Thames is entitled, or to empower the conservators to interfere with the exercise of the rights of such owner or occupier, but the same shall remain and continue as if this Act had never been made."

Bosanquet for the respondent.—The validity of this bye-law with respect to "river fish" was not questioned before the justices, and therefore cannot be disputed now. This is really a matter of fact, and the justices having found that eels are river fish, the conviction was right.

Harington in reply.—The court will not put such a construction upon this bye-law as to make it illegal, even although this objection was not suggested before the tribunal whose decision is appealed against.

WILLES, J.—This is a question raised apparently by agreement for the purpose of determining whether the 8th of these bye-laws applies to eels. There can be no doubt that taking the expression, "every kind of fish known as river fish" by itself, it would include an eel bred in the river. Lord Coke mentions eels as an example of fish, and cites a passage from Domesday (Co. Litt. 5, b); they have always been considered fish, and that passage is authority for saying they are river fish. It appears also to be a fact that the commissioners who drew up these bye-laws imagined eels to be fish; for they allude to them in the 13th bye-law, and provide that nothing in the other bye-laws shall interfere with the legal use by owners of private rights of grig or ground weels for eels, or eel bucks. The commissioners therefore knew they were dealing with eels. Mr. Harington has argued that we ought not to construe this 8th bye-law to apply to eels, because it is found in the case that there was no sufficient evidence whether eels spawn or propagate their young during this fence season. Without venturing upon a decision concerning the points considered doubtful by the justices, it is enough that the law regards the order of nature, and it may be that eels at some time of the year should be protected, at least in this particular river. There is therefore nothing unreasonable in the commissioners making this particular time the fence season for eels, and at all events, it devolves upon any person, who asserts that this protection is unreasonable, to establish it clearly. Passing over then the argument based upon the reason of this bye-law, we come to the consideration of its words. No doubt eels are fish of importance, and are of more importance for the food of man than most of the fish mentioned by name; and it is a rule of law, as well as of grammar, that when specific and general words are used together, the general words must relate to the species as well as to the genus referred to by the specific words. It is said that we ought to construe "every kind of fish known as river fish," to include only those which are of the species mentioned before. The names are given of fish of various species thrown together, and in no order, and then are added the words, "every kind of fish known as river fish." These are words which, in my opinion, under the circumstances of their position do not come within the rule of grammar. Further, when all the genus is exhausted, we find that no river fish is omitted except flounders, eels, and lampreys, and I cannot help thinking that the words must mean the universal inclusion of all fish, or are limited, if at all, to fish of use for food. Upon the best and closest analysis of this clause, I think it was meant by its framers to include eels. Then with respect to sects. 65 and 67 of the Act (27 & 28 Vict. c. 113) which authorises the bye-laws; it is said that, even if the framers intended to include eels in the expression "river fish," the bye-law does not sufficiently specify them under the 65th section, and that the 67th section expressly protects the appellant and his rights in a case like this, not particularly specified in sect. 65. But this bye-law was certainly made for the purpose first described in sect. 65—viz., for the preservation of the fish in the Thames, and the question clearly is, whether, assuming the expression to include eels, it is sufficient that they should be specified as river fish. I think the Act did not mean to prohibit a bye-law of this kind. It did not intend to impose upon the conservators the necessity of describing the fish more specifically than with ordinary language, and it appears to me that eels are sufficiently described as river fish. If eels had been mentioned in the bye-law, the conservators would certainly have been right in applying this fence season to them, and it is only for us to say whether the language they have used is sufficiently explicit. If the conservators or the Fishery Commissioners did not mean to forbid the taking of eels during this period, they can, under the 65th section, alter the bye-law. I am not, however, myself inclined to believe that we are in error as to their intention. The decision of the justices will be affirmed.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is a safe rule to suppose that framers of such regulations as these mean what they say, and I do not see why eels should not be included under the expression "every kind of fish known as river fish." I cannot say from the context that the commissioners who framed the bye-laws did not mean to include eels, and if I am mistaken, and it was not intended to apply the fence season to them, the commissioners can now alter the bye-law. My brother Willes is learned in fish, as he is in law, and I am happy to concur in all that he has said.

Upon application by respondent's counsel, Willes, J. thought the commissioners ought not to ask for costs under the circumstances.

BOTHAMLEY v. DANBY.

57 Geo. 3, c. lxix.; 27 & 28 Vict. c. 101. s. 25 (Highway Act 1864)—Right of pasturage—Sheep on highway.

By 57 Geo. 3, c. lxix., a certain barrier bank, made for drainage purposes in Lincolnshire, together with a road thereon, is vested in trustees who are, by sect. 58, directed and required from time to time to let the herbage of the bank to be grazed with sheep only, at such yearly rent as can be reasonably had for the same.

The road which runs along the top of the bank is an open public highway.

The 27 & 28 Vict. c. 101 (The Highway Act 1864), s. 25, enacts that "if any . . . sheep . . . is found straying on, or lying about any highway, or across any part thereof, or by the sides thereof (except on such parts of any highway as pass over any common or waste, or uninclosed ground), the owner or owners thereof shall, for every animal so found straying or lying, be liable to a penalty, . . . provided . . . that nothing in this Act shall be deemed to extend to take away any right of pasturage which may exist on the sides of any highway."

Sheep owned by a renter of the herbage, and depastured on the sides of the above-mentioned barrier bank, were found upon the metalled part of the highway, and the owner was convicted and fined under sect. 25 of the Highway Act 1864.

Held, that the conviction was right.

CASE stated by justices under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

Parts of Holland, Lincolnshire, to wit: This was an information and complaint preferred under the statute 27 & 28 Vict. c. 107, s. 25 (a) by Thomas Danby, an inspector of police, against Frederick Bothamley, of Long Sutton, in the said parts and county, farmer, for that he the said Frederick Bothamley, on the 25th Nov. 1870, at the parish of Long Sutton in the said parts and county, was then the owner of twelve sheep unlawfully then found straying on a certain highway there situate, called Sutton Gate, the said part of the said highway not being such part thereof as did lead or pass through or over any common or waste or uninclosed ground, and he the said Frederick Bothamley not having any right of pasturage on the sides of the said highway; and after hearing the parties and the evidence adduced by them, we the undersigned, being two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the said parts of Holland in the said county of Lincoln, did thereupon adjudicate the said Frederick Bothamley to be the owner of four sheep so found straying on the said highway as aforesaid, and did convict him thereof and adjudge him to forfeit and pay for such offence the penalty or sum of 6*d.* per head for each of the same four sheep, and the further sum of 13*s.* 6*d.*, the complainant's costs incurred in that behalf.

And the said Frederick Bothamley, alleging that he is dissatisfied with the said determination, as being erroneous in point of law, did, within three days thereafter, apply to us the said justices, to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and grounds of such determination for the opinion thereon of the Court of Queen's Bench at Westminster. Wherefore, in pursuance of the statute in such case made and provided, we hereby state and sign the following case: The defendant having appeared upon summons before us, the undersigned, to answer to the said complaint, it was thereupon proved on the part of the said complainant, and admitted by the defendant's attorney on his behalf, that there was a public highway which has been of late years formed of hard materials, and maintained and kept up in such state by and at the expense of the parish of Long Sutton aforesaid, along the top of an artificial embankment, which forms the defence to one side of a large or main drain, constructed and running through the district for the purposes of carrying away and discharging the water of upwards of 30,000 acres of land, and which also formed the highway in question, and that the defendant was the owner of the twelve sheep so found straying as aforesaid, but that four of them only were straying actually on the land or metalled part of the highway, the other eight sheep being found depasturing or lying on the sides or at the bottom of the aforesaid embankment; and on the part of the defendant it was proved and admitted by the complainant that the embankment in question, and the sides thereof are the property of, and vested by the Act 57 Geo. 3, c. 69, (a) in a body of proprietors of land therein specified, and commonly called the South Holland drainage trustees; and it was also admitted and proved that the said highway is not inclosed by any gate or otherwise, but is an open road, and the only public road running from Sutton St. James (which is a hamlet to Long Sutton aforesaid) to such last-mentioned town or place, and that previous to the formation of the said present embankment a highway had existed on the original embankment, referred to in the next following paragraph or statement.

It was also admitted and proved that some fifteen or seventeen years back the South Holland drainage trustees, under the powers conferred upon them by their various Acts of Parliament, considerably widened their main drain, and for that purpose purchased land on the further or inland side of their then embankment, upon which the road then was, cut away a large portion of their then bank, formed an almost entirely new bank on part of the land so purchased, and diverted the road on to such new bank. That a considerable portion of the land (on the further or inland side of the bank) which was so purchased as aforesaid has never been inclosed, and now lies open, and that grass grows on such land and on the sides of a cess or foreshore of the bank next the drain, and that the trustees have from the time their drain was formed been in the habit of cleansing the same, and casting the earth taken out therefrom upon the sides of the said bank, and the land on the further or inland side thereof.

The defendant's attorney, however, contended that such substituted road on the surface or top of the present embankment must be taken to have had only a limited dedication as to the public use thereof, for that not merely the property of and in the bank itself had been vested by the 8th section of the above quoted Act (which accompanies and forms part of this case) in the drainage trustees, but that by the 58th section (b) of the same

(a) 27 & 28 Vict. c. 101 (The Highway Act 1864) s. 25. The 74th section of the Highway Act 1835 shall be repealed, and instead thereof it is enacted, if any . . . . sheep, &c., is at any time found straying on or lying about any highway or across any part thereof, or by the side thereof (except on such parts of any highway as pass over any common or waste or unenclosed ground), the owner or owners thereof shall, for every animal so found straying or lying, be liable to a penalty not exceeding 5*s.* . . . . Provided that nothing in this Act shall be deemed to extend to take away any right of pasturage which may exist on the sides of any highway.

(a) 57 Geo. 3, c. 69: An Act for amending an Act (33 Geo. 3, c. 109) for draining lands in South Holland, and for continuing and amending another Act (35 Geo. 3, c. 166) for maintaining and repairing a certain bank, and the road thereon, from Spalding High Bridge to Brother House, all in the county of Lincoln. (10th July 1817.)

(b) Sect. 58 enacts that it shall be lawful for the committee men for the time being, and they are hereby directed and required, from time to time to let or demise from year to year the herbage of the . . . barrier bank and of the forelands thereof, and of the banks of the . . . Lord's drain, and of the . . . main cut or drain, and

Act, the trustees were directed and required from time to time to let or demise from year to year the herbage of, amongst others, the above-mentioned bank to any person or persons, to be grazed with sheep only, at such yearly rent or rents as can be reasonably had for the same, and that the said drainage trustees have ever since let, and still continue to let, all such herbages.

It was further proved to us that the defendant is the hirer or renter from the said trustees for the present year of the herbage of the said bank in question, for the purpose of being grazed with sheep at the point where his sheep were so found as aforesaid, and for some considerable distance on either side thereof, for the sum of 8*s*., but that the surveyor of the trustees had not measured the top of the bank, because he considered it of no value.

It was further contended by the defendant's attorney that the limited dedication was shown from the fact that the class of animals with which the bank was to be grazed was specified, and lastly that defendant could not be convicted, as it was shewn that he had a right of pasturage for sheep on the sides of the highway in question.

We, however, being of opinion that the substituted road was one set out or allowed only in lieu of one previously existing, and that the surveyors of the highways of Long Sutton have immemorially repaired, and do at the present time keep such road in repair, and that it is an open public highway, and used by the public as such without any interruption or hindrance whatsoever, did adjudicate the defendant to be guilty of the offence of allowing four of his sheep (namely the four proved and admitted to have been found on the metalled road itself) to be straying on the highway as alleged in the aforesaid information and complaint, and did further adjudge and order him to pay in respect of such offence a fine or penalty of 6*d*. per head for each of the same four sheep, and the additional sum of 13*s*. 6*d*. for the complainant's costs incurred in such behalf.

If the court shall be of opinion that our said adjudication and conviction is valid and correct in point of law, then the said conviction shall be confirmed, but if the court shall be of a contrary opinion, then the said conviction shall be quashed.

EDWARD LEIGH BENNETT.
J. HURTON BARKER.

Manisty, Q.C. (with him R. E. Webster) for the appellant.—The penalty in sect. 25 of The Highway Act 1864 is imposed on the owner of cattle straying on any highway or by the sides thereof, except on such parts of any highway as pass over any common or waste or uninclosed land. Now it is clear that the owner in this case had a right to depasture sheep on the sides of the highway. That right, given to him by virtue of 57 Geo. 3, c. 69, s. 58, is preserved by the proviso at the end of sect. 25 of the first-mentioned statute. Then this highway passes over uninclosed land, within the exception in sect. 25 of the Highway Act 1864. It is found to be an open road. Golding v. Stocking and Freestone v. Caswell (20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 479, 918; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 516, 519) are authorites upon the above section. In the latter case Cockburn, C. J., although affirming the conviction of the owner of a right of a pasturage on the sides of a highway, whose horses strayed on the metalled road, yet says expressly, "This was not a case of a highway passing over uninclosed ground." Nor can it be said that the 57 Geo. 3, c. 69, s. 58 is repealed by the Highway Act 1864. Thorpe v. Adams (L. Rep. 6 C. P. 125) decides that the general principle to be applied to the construction of Acts of Parliament is, that a general Act is not to be construed to repeal a previous particular Act, unless there is some express reference to the previous legislation on the subject, or unless the two Acts are necessarily inconsistent. There is an express statutory direction that the sides of the bank shall be let for grazing purposes. Sheep must be nat rally expected to occasionally go upon the adjoining road, and the Highway Act 1864 must not be construed so as to restrict the right given by the previous legislation, and thereby reduce the rental of the pasturage, which is to aid the rates. The dedication of this highway to the public was a limited one, it was a dedication of the highway subject to sheep straying sometimes upon it. A footpath may be dedicated subject to the right of the owner of the soil to plough across it at certain seasons (Mercer v. Woodgate, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 458; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 26), which is a right more inconvenient to passengers than the one now in question.

Foot, contra.—The point as to this road passing through uninclosed land was never raised at all before the justices. It was not for the prosecutor to prove that the highway did not pass through uninclosed land, and thereby to negative the exception in sect. 25 of the Highway Act 1864, but for the defendant to prove the affirmative thereof in his defence if he would have advantage of the same: (Jervis's Act, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 14.) The findings in the case dispose of the point as to a limited dedication. This was a conviction for trespassing on the highway, not on the sides of it. The proviso at the end of sect. 25 might doubtless save the owner from the penalty imposed in the first part of the section for having sheep straying "by the sides" of the highway, yet he is nevertheless liable if they stray on or lie about the highway.

Manisty, Q.C., in reply.

BLACKBURN, J.—I think the conviction was right, on the points as they come before us. The facts seem to be these, viz., that a road runs along the top of this bank made to protect the drainage of a large tract of land, and is a highway. On this bank there are places covered with grass, which the trustees are directed to let as depasturage for sheep, but for no other animals. It appears that sheep left to graze at the sides are found straying on the highway. Then comes the question whether they are within the provisions of the Highway Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 101), s. 25, which impose a penalty on the owner of any horse . . . sheep, &c., "found straying on or lying about any highway or across any part thereof, or by the side thereof (except on such parts of any highway as pass over any common or waste or uninclosed ground), . . . provided . . . that nothing in this Act shall be deemed to extend to take away any right of pasturage which may exist on the sides of

of any other cut or drain made or to be made as aforesaid, and the forelands thereof respectively, or any other lands or grounds which have been covered by the said commissioners, or may be covered under the authority of this Act, to any person or persons, to be grazed with sheep only, at such yearly rent or rents as can be reasonably had for the same.

By sect. 68 all cattle, except sheep, found on the banks or forelands may be impounded.

Sect. 69 prescribes a penalty for keeping rabbits on the banks.

any highway." Now, in all cases where a highway runs through a common or waste or uninclosed ground, the Legislature seem to have thought that the cattle which were depastured on that open common or uninclosed ground must sometimes naturally come on to the road, and that it would be wrong to impose a penalty on the owner in such cases; but where the road is not one passing over any common or waste or uninclosed ground, although there may be a right of pasturage on the sides, they thought fit to leave the enactment, providing that cattle are not to stray, unqualified. Then how is that consistent with a right of pasturage? It does not take it away, but the effect of the section is, that though the owners of animals may depasture them, they must somehow take precautions for herding them—their right is clogged with that condition, but is not taken away. Mr. Manisty argued that, as the trustees are directed to depasture these banks with sheep only for the benefit of the reduction of the rates, the Act of Parliament clogging the right of pasturage with this condition, and possibly reducing the value of it, is inconsistent with the former legislation. I do not think that is so, but I think that, while the trustees have this right, and have to apply the profits to the reduction of rates, it is difficult to see what there is in that to give them a greater right than the owners of private property. In neither case has the Legislature taken away the right of pasturage. In each the right is to be so far affected as that the animals must be prevented from straying on the highway. Here sheep are found on the highway, and therefore the conviction of the owner of them is correct, unless it were clear that the spot where the animals were straying passes through the uninclosed ground, so as to be within the exception in sect. 25. That is a question of degree. Every road where a right of pasturage is on either side is, in one extreme sense of the word, uninclosed, because of the plot of ground at the sides of the actual roadway; but that is not what is meant. I think where the highway runs through an extent of ground of some magnitude, then it is within the exception; and when it does not, but the quantity of ground is of so small an acreage compared with the highway as to be merely accessory to the road, then it would be otherwise. If that was a point taken before the magistrates, they certainly have not stated it in such a way as to bring it before us. I cannot help suspecting that was not brought before the justices, because it was well known that the extent of ground near the road bore but a small proportion to the road. If the fact was not so the point may perhaps be raised in another case the next time the justices convict an owner of straying sheep. There was only one other point taken below—viz., that it must be considered that this highway was dedicated to the public with the right of depasturing sheep on the sides attached to the right of way, so that the sheep might lawfully stray on to the road, a proposition which seems to me quite untenable. No such limited dedication as that suggested manifestly ever takes place, and the words of the Highway Act 1864 would take away the immunity claimed by the owner of sheep straying on to the road, if such ever existed.

MELLOR, J.—I cannot help thinking there is no foundation for the suggestion as to the limited dedication when we consider the object and purpose of this Act of Parliament, and the power given to the trustees of letting the herbage by sect. 25. All the words in that section point to works done for the purpose of forming banks and protecting the drains. The herbage is let to be grazed with sheep only, at such yearly rent or rents as can be reasonably had for the same. The object evidently was to obtain from the letting of the banks a certain profit. The money so derived was directed by the following section (a) to be applied in reduction of the rates. Now clearly that was the extent of the right which the trustees could let to the appellant in this case. No doubt if the spot where these sheep were straying was a portion of the road going through open and uninclosed ground, then the exception in sect. 25 would apply. Now, when reading the words "uninclosed ground," we must look also at the preceding words, viz., "common or waste," and then it is obvious that by "uninclosed ground" is meant ground of the nature or character of waste, and, of course, the question as to what is such uninclosed ground must be very much one of degree. The extent of the ground must be ascertained. As to that matter I have now satisfied myself, although I thought at first that it might be better to remit the case for a further finding. But I think there is a very high probability that the point was not taken by the defendant before the magistrate, because it could not be made out in fact, and the appellant can raise the question hereafter if the facts should be changed. I think we should confine ourselves to answering the question put to us by the justices, as to whether they were right in convicting. In my opinion they were.

Conviction affirmed.

ROBERTS v. THE MAYOR, ALDERMEN, AND BURGESSES OF SHEFFIELD.

Town council—Borough fund—Unlawful application of—Order for payment of costs of legal proceedings—Certiorari.

By sect. 92 of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76 (Municipal Corporation Act), the income of the town council is to be paid into the borough fund, which income is to be applied in payment of various salaries, and the expenses, &c., of borough elections, the prosecution, &c., of offenders, the maintenance of corporate buildings, "and of all other expenses not herein otherwise provided for which shall be necessarily incurred in carrying into effect the provisions of this Act;" and the section proceeds to provide that "in case the borough fund shall be more than sufficient for the purposes aforesaid, the surplus thereof shall be applied under the direction of the council for the public benefit of the inhabitants and improvement of the borough." In the event of the borough fund not being sufficient for the above purposes, the town council are authorised to levy a borough rate in the nature of a county rate.

In the borough of Sheffield, a water company was established under an Act of Parliament for supplying the town with water, and it was provided that upon a requisition from the town council, such company should afford a constant supply. The town council having made such requisition, the company applied to two justices (as provided for by their Act), for their sanction to certain rules and regulations applicable to such constant supply. The town council believing that these rules and regulations would operate injuriously upon the inhabitants of the borough, they opposed their being sanctioned by the justices with success, and in doing so, incurred a large amount of costs. These costs they ordered should be paid out of the borough fund. The water company then promoted a Bill in Parliament to relieve themselves of the obligation to afford a constant supply of water. The town council opposed this Bill, and it was withdrawn. In the opposition, the town council again incurred a large amount of costs, which they also ordered to be paid out of the borough fund. The town council had no other funds but those they derived from rates:

Held, that as there was no surplus, these costs could not be lawfully paid out of the borough fund, they not coming within any of the instances of expenditure mentioned in the said 92nd section.

Semble, that where an application for a certiorari is not made under the provisions of the 13 Geo. 2, c. 18, s. 5, the parties applying are not limited to six months, but may apply at any more lengthened period, as the court under the circumstances may think reasonable.

THIS was a rule calling upon the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Sheffield to show cause why two orders for the payment of the sums of 1000*l.* and 1526*l.* respectively, made by the town council of Sheffield, to be paid out of the borough fund, should not be removed into this court by certiorari, with the view to their being quashed for illegality. It appeared that in Sheffield there is a water company, established under an Act of Parliament, for the purpose of supplying the town with water, and under its provisions the company are bound, upon a requisition from the town council, to provide a constant supply, and bye-laws for regulating such supply are to be made with the sanction of two justices. Such requisition having been received, the company applied to two justices for their sanction to a code of bye-laws and regulations. The town council conceiving many of these bye-laws to be oppressive upon the inhabitants, opposed their being sanctioned by the justices. Each party appeared by several counsel, and many of the intended bye-laws and regulations were disallowed, and several were modified. The inquiry lasted for thirteen days, and the town council incurred costs amounting to the sum of 1526*l.* The water company then promoted a Bill in Parliament, the principal object of which was to relieve themselves of the obligation to give a constant supply of water.

The town council opposed this Bill, and it was withdrawn by the water company. In this opposition the town council incurred costs amounting to the sum of 1000*l.* The town council subsequently made two orders for the payment, out of the borough fund, of these costs respectively, one order being made on the 9th March 1870, and the other order on the 8th June in the same year. The present rule was moved for on the 30th Jan. 1861.

By sect. 92 of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76 (The Municipal Corporation Act), it is enacted—

That after the election of treasurer in any borough, the rents and profits of all hereditaments, and the interest, dividends, and annual proceeds of all moneys, dues, chattels, and valuable securities belonging or payable to any body corporate named in conjunction with the said borough in the schedules A and B, or to any member or officer thereof in his corporate capacity, and every fine or penalty for any offence against this Act (the application of which has not already been provided for) shall be paid to the treasurer of such borough; and all the moneys which he shall so receive shall be carried by him to the account of a fund to be called "The Borough Fund," and such fund, subject to the payment of any lawful debt due from such corporate body . . . . shall be applied towards the payment of the salary of the mayor, and of the recorder, and of the police magistrate, and of the respective salaries of the town clerk and treasurer, and of every other officer whom the council shall appoint, and also towards the payment of the expenses incurred from time to time in preparing and printing burgess lists, ward lists, and notices, and in other matters attending such elections as are herein mentioned, and in boroughs which a separate court of sessions of the peace as hereinafter provided towards the expenses of the prosecution, maintenance, and punishment of offenders, and towards such other sum to be paid by such borough by the treasurer of such county as is hereinafter provided, and towards the expense of maintaining the borough gaol, house of correction, and corporate buildings, and towards the payment of the constables, and of all other expenses not herein otherwise provided for, which shall be necessarily incurred in carrying into effect the provisions of this Act, and in case the borough fund shall be more than sufficient for the purposes aforesaid, the surplus thereof shall be applied, under the direction of the council, for the public benefit of the inhabitants and improvement of the borough. . . . and in case the borough fund shall not be sufficient for the purposes aforesaid, the council of the borough is hereby authorised and required from time to time to estimate as correctly as may be what amount in addition to such fund will be sufficient for the payment of the expenses to be incurred in carrying into effect the provisions of this Act; and, in order to raise the amount so estimated, the said council is hereby authorised and required from time to time to order a borough rate, in the nature of a county rate, to be made within their borough, &c.

The town council have no borough property, and the expenses incurred under the Act are wholly defrayed by a borough rate.

Manisty, Q. C., Lloyd, Q. C., Shield, and Barber, now appeared to show cause, and took a preliminary objection that the application for the writ had not been made within six months of the order being made. [LUSH, J.—This application is not made within the operation of the 13 Geo. 2, c. 18, s. 5, limiting it to within six months, that Act applying only to convictions, judgments, orders, and other proceedings before justices of the peace.] That is so; but by analogy, the practice of this court should be the same in other cases of applications for the writ of certiorari. [Pollock, Q. C.—There has been a long correspondence upon the subject, and the town council were always aware of this objection. BLACKBURN, J.—Is there any rule of practice in this court upon the subject?] There is none; but it is exceedingly inconvenient to have a rule of this sort after a very long time has elapsed, and the money under the order has been paid.

COCKBURN, C. J.—As there is no fixed rule of practice upon the subject, we must be guided by the particular circumstances of the case, and the rule had better be argued upon the merits.

Pollock, Q. C., Quain, Q. C., and Kemplay appeared in support of the rule.

The following cases were cited:

The Attorney-General v. Wilson, Cary's Rep. 260; 5 De G. M. & G. 568;

Reg. v. The Corporation of Tamworth, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 403;

The Attorney-General v. The Corporation of Norwich, 2 M. & C. 406;
Reg. v. Prest, 20 L. J. 17, Q. B.;
Reg. v. The Highway Board of Kingsbridge, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 554;
Reg. v. Thompson, 5 Q. B. 477.

The facts and arguments are so very fully referred to in the judgments of the learned judges, that is unnecessary here further to refer to them.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I am of opinion that this rule must be made absolute. The question turns entirely upon the effect of the 92nd section of the Municipal Corporation Act. It appears that the expenditure in the present instance to meet which the orders in question were made was of a two-fold character, partly for going to Parliament to oppose a bill of the water company, and partly in respect of expenses incurred in opposing certain rules and regulations, in regard to which the water company —in point of fact, the parties now applying to this court—sought to obtain the approval of two of the local magistrates with the view of regulating the constant supply of water which they were bound to give to the town. With regard to the expenses incurred by the corporation in going to Parliament to oppose the Water Company's Bill, I think it is abundantly clear that it is an expenditure not provided for by the language of the section of the Act of Parliament to which I have referred. It was I think altogether beyond the scope of the Municipal Corporation Act or of anything to be done under that Act for the benefit of the borough, and, therefore, there being no surplus fund which could be made use of by the corporation, the borough fund could not be applied to suit such a purpose. The language of the Act of Parliament is this: certain payments are specified, such as the prosecution, maintenance, and punishment of offenders, the payment of constables, and so on, "and of all other expenses not herein otherwise provided for which shall be necessarily incurred in carrying into effect the provisions of this Act; and in case the borough fund shall be more than sufficient for the purposes aforesaid, the surplus thereof shall be applied under the direction of the council for the public benefit of the inhabitants and improvement of the borough." Up to that point, in dealing with the borough fund, independently of any surplus which the corporation might have from its property, they were dealing with matters necessarily incurred in carrying into effect the provisions of the Act. But in going to Parliament to oppose an Act of Parliament, it appears to me that the expenditure could not be said to be anything necessarily incurred in carrying the Act into execution. Then we come to the expenses incurred in the opposition to the water company's rules and regulations. It appears that the water company, according to the Act of Parliament by which they were established, were under an obligation to furnish what was called a "constant supply," the meaning of which term was well understood as distinct from the supply under a different form—upon a requisition by the corporation to substitute this constant supply for the supply which up to that time had been given. In order to carry this constant supply into effect, or the works necessary for its execution, the company applied, as they were entitled to do, to have certain rules and regulations to assist them in affording such constant supply, sanctioned by two justices. The question upon this point is, what powers had the corporation for coming forward to oppose the rules and regulations, which would entitle them to have their expenses, thereby occasioned, paid out of the borough fund? Looking at the rules and regulations as they are now before the court; looking also at the objections taken by the corporation against them, and to the result in the shape of actual disallowance of some of the proposed regulations, and the important modifications which were introduced into others, it seems to me that the opposition of the corporation was a meritorious one, and one in the real interests of the inhabitants of the borough. It appears that the mode in which the company, by their proposed rules and regulations, desired to give effect to their obligation to afford a constant supply, would have been attended with considerable expense to the inhabitants—with so much expense, indeed, as would frustrate to a considerable extent the very purpose of the obligation to furnish a constant supply. Therefore, in deciding that the rule must be made absolute, and consequently that the expenses incurred in opposing the rules and regulations were not chargeable to the borough fund, it must not be taken that the court intend to blame the corporation for the part they have taken in the opposition. The whole question is: can the 92nd section be got over so as to render applicable the borough fund to such an expenditure as this? I have already referred to the words of the section, from which it is plain that it is only in case of a surplus that such a matter as this can possibly come within the powers of the corporation. The borough fund is applicable to certain purposes mentioned in the Act, and then comes this provision: "And in case the borough fund shall be more than sufficient for the purposes aforesaid, the surplus thereof shall be applied under the direction of the council for the public benefit of the inhabitants, and the improvement of the borough." But in the present instance there was no surplus, and consequently the corporation could not have the benefit of that provision. Assuming, therefore, for the present purpose, that it was for the public benefit that the water company should be compelled to furnish them with a constant supply, which constant supply they were under an obligation to furnish, and that the rules and regulations would have destroyed, or at all events very materially limited, the advantage to the inhabitants—granted all this, if there had been a surplus, the expenses of the corporation's opposition would have come within that part of the section which I have just quoted; but there being no surplus, of course the corporation could not make an order for payment of those expenses out of the borough fund. The case of The Attorney General v. The Corporation of Wigan, is one somewhat in point. The corporation of that town had applied a portion of the borough fund to a purpose, which at first appeared not to be within the scope of the section, and an injunction was asked for to restrain them from so applying the fund. It was held, however, by the present Lord Chancellor, then a Vice-Chancellor, not to be a matter for an injunction. Upon looking at the judgment in that case, I find that the ground upon which the Vice-Chancellor refused to grant the injunction was, that inasmuch as the expenditure was for the prevention of what would be a nuisance, or would have led to the creation of a nuisance, that as the corporation had within its powers of local government the duty of preventing nuisances, what they did came within the scope of those powers, and was therefore a thing done in furtherance of the good government of the town, and in the execution of the powers of the Act. Without making any further observations upon that case, it is enough for me to say that it was decided upon a ground very different from that which exists in the present one. There is nothing in the Municipal Corporation Act which makes it incumbent upon a corporation to interfere in the matter of a supply of water. It, therefore, cannot be said that what the corporation did in opposing the rules and regulations of the water company was anything done within the scope of the Act, or in the execution of the powers of the Act. The words of the statute are too strong to be got over. What the corporation have done was not a matter of government in the sense of the execution of the provisions of the Act; it was not a carrying out of any of the powers vested by the Act in the municipal corporation as a corporate body. Therefore, however much I may regret the conclusion to which the court has come, believing as I do that the corporation were actuated by a laudable desire to protect the true interests of the borough, I cannot strain the words of the Act of Parliament and consider that what the town council has done comes within the term, "carrying into effect the provisions of the Act." The rule must, therefore, be made absolute.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. One point which we must consider is this: Orders for the payment of money have been made and acted upon by the treasurer, and the charges paid, and it was argued that the court cannot quash the orders after they have been acted upon. But it distinctly appears as to both of the orders, that the one was acted upon before it was drawn up, and that the other was acted upon with the perfect knowledge that it was objected to. It would be baffling the intention of the Legislature if an order made by the town council was not to be reviewed after it had been acted upon. That seemed to have been the argument in the case of Reg. v. Thompson, and if the court wanted an authority, that case supplies it, for Lord Denman held that although the order had been acted upon it must be quashed. In saying this I desire to guard against being thought to say that if an order has been bonâ fide acted upon, and without the least knowledge of its being disputed, it may not be a very proper and important thing for the court to consider whether they would grant a rule to quash it if brought before them. In the present case, we cannot say that this is so. The real question comes to this, were the orders made for a lawful purpose? Had the corporation of Sheffield the power to do what they have done, and to charge the expenses to the borough fund? The town council it seems have no estate or surplus fund, but its funds are produced alone by rates. The question therefore is, can they lawfully charge the expenses they have incurred upon that particular fund? The terms of the Municipal Act are really what we must look to and understand. We must remember why the Act was passed. Before it became law, municipal corporations which were the owners of estates might spend them without control, and great waste and jobbery were the result. One of the chief objects of the Act was to restrain town councils from so doing, and accordingly in the 92nd section it was specially enacted that all corporate property should be brought within the borough fund. The statute then enacts how the money is to be applied. It is first to be applied to the payment of debts which had been contracted before the passing of the Act, then to the payment of the salaries of the borough officials, the cost of prosecutions, the maintenance of the borough gaol, and the payment of constables; and the statute goes on to say, "and of all other expenses not herein otherwise provided for which shall be necessarily incurred in carrying into effect the provisions of this Act; and in case the borough fund shall be more than sufficient for the purposes aforesaid, the surplus thereof shall be applied, under the direction of the council, for the public benefit of the inhabitants and improvement of the borough." Then, if the borough fund was not sufficient, there is to be a borough rate in the nature of a county rate to supply the deficiency. In Sheffield a borough rate was required, inasmuch as there was no surplus to defray the deficiency; and then came the question—could the purposes for which these two orders had been made be said to be "expenses not herein otherwise provided for and necessarily incurred in carrying into effect the provisions of this Act?" To answer that question it was necessary to see what those purposes were. This much is clear: there was a water company in Sheffield which supplied a large portion of the town—not the whole of it—with water. That company, under various Acts of Parliament, had come into this position: that they were bound, at the request of the Town Council, to give a constant supply; and they had obtained a power in one of their Acts by which they were entitled to make reasonable rules and regulations. That was a power very commonly given to water companies, and obviously it was a very reasonable power. In the same Act a stipulation was made to the effect that the regulations were not to come into force until they were approved of by two of the borough justices. That being the state of things, the company wished to pass certain rules and regulations, and for that purpose they went before the justices to have them approved. The town council opposed the regulations. Whether or not the opposition of the town council was conducted so as to be extravagant, I say nothing. But putting it simply that the town council thought that the regulations were such as would be oppressive to the inhabitants, I feel that it is quite impossible to say that they were making an impertinent—in the legal sense of the word—intrusion, or that they were doing a thing which they ought to have nothing whatever to do with. It appears to me that they might very reasonably say, "this is a matter in which the inhabitants of the town are concerned." Then comes the question—could they for the purpose of opposing the regulations, do so upon the credit of the borough rate? That is one point. The second point arises out of the Bill promoted by the water company. It seems that whilst the corporation were opposing the regulations, the water company, fearing that the justices might refuse the regulations altogether, promoted a Bill, in which they proposed to have powers to make certain regulations, and also proposed to do certain other things which would have an effect upon the inhabitants of the town. Therefore I would again say that in what the town council had done they could not be looked upon as interlopers and meddlers. But in opposing the Bill, could they place their expenses to the credit of the borough fund? The council it seemed proposed to promote a Bill of their own, but an injunction was obtained against them, and they never attempted to charge any portion of their expenses under that head to the borough fund. Can we say that these two matters—the opposition to the Bill, and the opposition to the rules and regulations—which very much concerned the interest of the inhabitants, and in which I do not think that the corporation can at all be considered as meddlers—can we say that they were matters coming within the terms of the 92nd section of the Municipal Corporation Act? In other words, that they were "expenses necessarily incurred in carrying into effect the provisions of the Act?" Undoubtedly there are some things not distinctly specified in the Act that are such. The court has more than once decided that if a municipal corporation are the owners of property, and someone attempts to take it away, the expenses incurred by them in litigation in defending their property would become expenses necessarily incurred in the carrying out of the object of the Act. But in the present case there is no pretence for saying that the corporation incurred the expenses to which the two orders relate in protecting and defending their property. It is true that it was alleged that they were the owners of house property, to which the company's water was supplied, and that consequently, in carrying on the opposition, they were protecting their own property, but that wholly failed. In fact it was perfectly obvious that the council acted as they did, on the ground that they were protecting the interests of a large portion of the inhabitants, and that it was within the scope of the Municipal Corporation Act. I have looked into the Act to see if I can find anything which will enable the corporation to do as they have done, but I have been unable to find anything which will justify them. There are several cases in equity which have some reference to the present one, as, for instance, The Attorney-General v. Norwich, but they were cases where there was a surplus. The only authority in favour of a borough fund being trenched upon is the opinion of the present Lord Chancellor when he was Vice-Chancellor in the case of The Attorney-General v. Wigan. The corporation of that town had become liable to a considerable sum for the expenses of opposing a Bill by which the corporation of Liverpool endeavoured to take away a river which flowed through Wigan, and which was in the nature of a common sewer. What was done by the Vice-Chancellor and the Lords Justices afterwards was to say that it was not so clear a case as would justify them in granting an injunction, so that what they did was in no way an authority binding upon us; in fact, what the Lords Justices said could not be taken as an opinion one way or the other. I cannot, therefore, but come to the conclusion that, though it might be a legitimate purpose for which the Town Council lent their names and the prestige of their authority—and they would have been right in spending any other money or moneys subscribed for that particular purpose—they could not pledge the credit of the borough rate. That is the question before the court, and, taking that view of it, I think the rule ought to be made absolute.

MELLOR, J.—I have come to the same conclusion. When the facts of the case are clearly understood the question lies in a very narrow compass. It is whether or not the opposition to a Bill in Parliament, and the opposition to certain regulations, are matters which could be charged to the borough fund? I think that the words of the section upon which the question turns contemplate two different things. When a borough rate must necessarily be made in order to pay the expenses of a borough, the payments must be limited to kindred expenses to those which are specifically named; and for fear that some such kindred expenses should be omitted, the Legislature added the words, "and of all other expenses not herein otherwise provided for which shall be necessarily incurred in carrying into effect the provisions of this Act." It appears to me that these words must have a limit, and I think they are limited by the character of the words which precede them, and which show what were the objects which were necessary to be dealt with in carrying into effect the provisions of the Act. I quite concur that where there is a surplus it is necessary to make some appropriation of it, and where that exists it is to be appropriated under the direction of the council, "for the public benefit of the inhabitants and improvement of the borough." Whether that was limited to the public benefit of the inhabitants, in the sense in which a recreation ground or some object of that sort, or matters which went strictly to the improvement of the borough, it is not necessary now to decide, because, in the present case there is no surplus, and I am not required to give a construction to words until a case shall arise. Primâ facie it does not appear to me that under that section these expenses could well have been paid; but as there was no surplus we are confined to the words of the section. I think that we are not warranted in saying that these expenses were properly chargeable to a borough rate. I am far from saying that the interference of the council was an officious interference. On the contrary, in all probability, and certainly with regard to some of the opposition, it was properly done—morally properly, I mean; but at the same time it does not come within the section, and therefore the court cannot say that the orders for the payment of the money were properly made. Under these circumstances, the rule must be made absolute.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I concur in the regret expressed by my Lord in being constrained to come to the conclusion that the two orders cannot be maintained. If the Sheffield corporation had been possessed of a surplus sufficient to bear that outlay—a surplus arising from property which might belong to them, or from fines and penalties, or other sources of income apart from the borough rate—I should rule that the way in which they had spent the money was a proper application of it as being for the public benefit of the inhabitants and improvement of the borough. I cannot help thinking that the corporation have acted with perfect bonâ fides in opposing the water company's bill, and also in opposing the rules of the water company, having a genuine belief that they were thus acting for the benefit of the inhabitants; and the result showed that they were so acting. Therefore, if they had any funds properly applicable to such a purpose, I should hold that it was a very proper application of them. But I have no doubt at all in a case like this, where a corporation has no property, and no surplus, and where they have to make a borough rate in order to levy funds necessary to carry into effect the provisions of the Act, that they could not incur such expenses. The items of expenses which a corporation is justified in incurring, have been already sufficiently referred to, and I need not, therefore, go into a list of them. The section uses the words "and all other expenses not herein otherwise provided for which shall be necessarily incurred in carrying into effect the provisions of this Act." Whatever the expenses might be, they must correspond to the general purposes of the Act, namely, maintaining the good rule and government of the borough. That is what a corporation are justified in incurring expenses for, and of paying them out of the borough rate; but, in the event of there being no surplus, they are not justified in incurring expenses upon what may be considered to be for the public benefit and improvement of the borough. With reference to the case of the Corporation of Wigan, it appears to me there is a material distinction between that and the case now before the court. A corporation could expend the borough rate not only in maintaining the good rule and government of their borough, but for the suppression and prevention of all nuisances; and it was upon the clause giving them that power that the present Lord Chancellor has based his decision. The duty of preventing nuisances is imposed upon corporations specifically, and the corporation of Wigan were therefore justified in incurring expenses in putting down what the Lord Chancellor said would be a gigantic nuisance. That case, however, was very different from the present. Nothing could justify the outlay that has been incurred in the absence of a surplus fund; but if the corporation had possesssd a surplus, the money would have been properly applied for the general benefit of the inhabitants and improvement of the borough. Under these circum- I think that both orders are bad.

Rule absolute.

Re DODD'S ESTATE;

Re THE LANDS CLAUSES CONSOLIDATION ACT 1845; Re THE HOLBORN VALLEY IMPROVEMENT ACT 1864.

Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, s. 80—Land taken by a company—Purchase money paid into court—Reinvestment—Costs.

Land which was devised to trustees upon certain trusts, was taken by a company under their compulsory powers, and the purchase money paid into court and invested in consols. Upon an application by the trustees for permission to reinvest the money in the purchase of property to be settled upon the trusts of the will:

Held, that the company must pay the costs of such reinvestment.

THIS was a petition for the reinvestment of certain purchase money which had been paid into court by the Corporation of London under the following circumstances.

By the will of a testator in a partition suit a freehold messuage situated in Snow-hill, in the City of London, was vested in trustees in trust for Samuel Pedley Dodd, then an infant, subject to an annual rentcharge of 150*l.* in favour of Jane Dodds, also an infant, and her children in remainder. The Corporation of London, in the course of their construction of the Holborn Viaduct, had, under their compulsory powers, taken this messuage and paid the purchase money (3700*l.*) into court, which money had afterwards been invested in a sum of 3951*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.* Reduced Annuities. In March 1870, Samuel Pedley Dodds became absolutely entitled to the purchase money, subject to the charge in favour of Jane Dodds, and in the following year he entered into a contract for the purchase of a house and premises in Norfolk for 1100*l.*

The trustees under the will accordingly presented this petition, praying that the purchase might be approved as a proper investment; that a conveyance of the property in fee, subject to the annuity of 150*l.*, might be made to S. P. Dodds; that the 1100*l.* might be raised out of the 3951*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.* Reduced Annuities; that the dividends accruing due on the residue might be paid to S. P. Dodds, and that the costs of and consequent upon the petition, including all costs, charges, and expenses of the reinvestment of the purchase money might be borne by the corporation, under the 80th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845.

Druce appeared in support of the petition. He cited Re De Beauvoir, 2 De G. F. & J. 5; Re Pick's Settlement 31 L. J., N. S., 495, Ch.

Alexander Miller, for the corporation, submitted that the question of reinvestment was an optional one. The court had power to order part of the fund to be applied towards purchasing an annuity, and the balance to be paid to the person absolutely entitled. If this course were adopted, the corporation would not have to pay the costs of the reinvestment.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I have no doubt that the petitioners are entitled to an order for the reinvestment of the purchase money. I have no jurisdiction to apply part of the fund in the purchase of an annuity, and then to pay the residue to the person absolutely entitled; but even if I had, the Act gives an option of reinvestment to someone—either to the court, or the persons beneficially entitled. If the option is in the court, I can exercise it in favour of the petitioners; and if it is in the persons beneficially interested, the petitioners are entitled to the order asked. There will therefore be an order for reinvestment according to the prayer of the petition, with costs to be paid by the corporation.

School board election—Corrupt practices—Treating —33 & 34 Vict. c. 75.

An election for a school board was about to take place, and the appellant and a friend attended at a public-house in the district, and there met several inhabitants, many of whom were voters. His friend, after discussing various local matters, suggested the appellant as a fit and proper person to be elected to the school board. The appellant then addressed those present upon the subject of a school board and of his candidature. He was then proposed by one of those present as a fit and proper person to be elected, and his health and success were drunk. Glasses round for those present were then ordered by four different persons in succession, the appellant having given and paid for one of such orders. The appellant was afterwards a candidate, and went to the poll. An information having been laid against him under sect. 91 of 33 & 34 Vict. c. 75 (Elementary Schools Act 1870) for corrupt practices, and being convicted thereof by the justices:

Held, that the conviction was correct.

AT a petty sessions holden at the police court, in the borough of Tynemouth, on the 6th Feb. 1871, before Geo. Bell and Edward Shotten, Esqrs., two of Her Majesty's Justices of the Peace, an information preferred by James Barker Wheldon (hereinafter called the respondent), against Ralph Turnbull (hereinafter called the appellant), charging him for that he the said appellant on the 10th Jan. 1871, at the township of Cullercoats, in the said borough of Tynemouth, at an election for members of the school board for the said borough, was unlawfully guilty of certain corrupt practices, contrary to the Elementary Education Act 1870, was heard and determined, and the appellant was duly convicted of the said offence, and was adjudged for the said offence to forfeit and pay the sum of 5*s.* to be paid and applied according to law, and also to pay to the said respondent, the sum of 1*l.* 11*s.* 6*d.* for his costs in that behalf, and if the said several sums should not be paid forthwith, was adjudged to be imprisoned in the house of correction at Morpeth, in the county of Northumberland, for the space of seven days, unless the said several sums should be sooner paid.

The appellant wishing to appeal, the following case was stated:

At the hearing of the said information, the respondent was supported by Mr. Duncan, his attorney, and the appellant by Mr. Meynell, barrister-at-law, instructed by Messrs. Finley, Adamson, and Adamson, his attorneys, when the following evidence was given by and on behalf of the respondent:

Robert Pearson:

I am a fisherman and pilot at Cullercoats. On the 10th Jan. 1871 I attended a meeting at Mrs. Bailey's, the Newcastle Arms, at Cullercoats. Defendant and Mr. Scott were there, and between twenty and thirty more. The meeting was about the school board. Mr. Scott first introduced the school board. He said Mr. Turnbull would be a fit and proper man for the place, and he would give Mr. Turnbull his undivided support. He also said that he and Mr. Turnbull had had many a contest, and he always found Mr. Turnbull a man of the right stamp, and he could assure them that they could not put a better man into the school board. I had not known Mr. Turnbull before that night, and Mr. Scott introduced him as a candidate for the school board. When Mr. Scott sat down Mr. Turnbull began to speak about the school board. He sat the first time, and the second time he stood up, and addressed the meeting about the school board and about reading and its benefits, and so on. He said that if they returned him he would do the best he could to keep down the rates and the expense of the new schools. I remained at the meeting about one hour or one hour and a half; when I left, it had been intimated to Mr. Turnbull and Mr. Scott that their cab was waiting. I left about a quarter to ten o'clock, I think. When I went in a Mr. Bailey invited me to have something to drink; I declined. The company were just about drinking their glasses off when I went in. Mr. Scott told them to hold up their hands for the different kinds of drink they wanted, viz., rum, brandy, whisky, &c., so many for the rum, and the same for whisky, &c. The glasses were brought in, and Mr. Scott paid for the first round—6*s.* 6*d.* I think was the money. There was a second round ordered in the same way by Mr. Turnbull, and Mr. Turnbull paid for the second round. There was smoking going on also. I did not see any more rounds. Bailey asked me twice or thrice. Mr. Turnbull said to Lisle, "You can have rum or brandy, wine, lemonade, or what you please." This was as soon as I went in. When I left the room, the most of the people were drunk.

Cross-examined:

Lisle asked me to go in. Mr. Scott was talking when I went in about municipal matters and the school board wearing them in. Mr. Scott talked about ten minutes or a quarter of an hour, and during his speech he stated that he had been a candidate and had given up. It was then he said Mr. Turnbull was a fit and proper person. One-half in the room were voters, I think, ten or twelve at least. The non-voters drank also. Mr. Scott spoke a good deal about the fish quay and also the free library. I did not hear anything about a memorial. I have often been at meetings with Mr. Scott before upon municipal matters. William Robinson was there, he said Turnbull was a fit and proper man, and he proposed him, and nobody seconded. There was more drink after this. I was merely told there was a meeting. Mr. Scott used to give drink at all other municipal meetings. I have had drink there myself. Neither Mr. Turnbull or Mr. Scott asked for votes.

Re-examined:

Mr. Turnbull was never at those meetings. The company after Mr. Robinson proposed Mr. Turnbull, drank his health. Both Mr. Scott and Mr. Turnbull's healths were frequently proposed.

William Lisle:

I am a fisherman, and reside at Cullercoats. I am a burgess for the borough of Tynemouth. On the 10th Jan. 1871 I went to a meeting with the last witness at Mrs. Bailey's. It was either Scott or Turnbull's meeting. They were both present. The discussion was principally about local matters, the fish quay, roads, and about the school boards too. I did not know Mr. Turnbull before that night. When Mr. Scott was speaking about the school board, he said Mr Turnbull was the right man in the right place, and he would give him his undivided support. He also said Mr. Turnbull was a good financier, and advocated Mr. Turnbull's claims. There were between twenty and thirty people when I went in. Mr. Bailey, in Mr Turnbull's presence, asked me what I would take, a bottle of pop, or a glass of wine. Mr. Turnbull said I might have brandy if I liked. I declined. The company all had glasses before them, and were drinking. Those who wished rum held up their hands, and the order was taken. There were two rounds when I was present. Mr. Scott ordered and paid for the first round, and Mr. Turnbull ordered and paid for the second. Mr. Scott's came to something between 5*s.* and 6*s.*; and Mr. Turnbull's, 6*s.* 6*d*, I think. A glass was missed, and 3*d.* more was paid by Mr. Turnbull. He put it on the tray, which the waiting girl had in her hand. When I first went in Mr. Turnbull had just concluded speaking about the fish quay. Mr. Scott told them to drink off their ringtails and they would get their glasses replenished. This was the first round I saw. Mr. Scott then got up and addressed the meeting about municipal matters, &c., and about the school board. Mr Turnbull asked them the second time to drink off their glasses. I think he asked them to drink off; at any rate he paid for the glasses. Not one of the men paid for their own drink—smoking as well as drinking. Some of them were nearly drunk. One man beside me fell on the floor drunk. I don't think Mr. Turnbull was much better. Some were voters and some were not. Ten or a dozen were voters.

Cross-examined:

I did not vote for Mr. Turnbull; I was not asked to vote for him at the meeting; I did not hear anybody asked to vote for Mr. Turnbull; I never heard Mr. Scott say I am going to vote for Mr. Turnbull, you can do as you please. It was about a quarter past eight o'clock and I left a little before ten o'clock.

William Storey:

I am a fisherman at Cullercoats. On the 10th Jan. I was at a meeting at Mr. Bailey's. Mr. Turnbull, I think was there, but I had no previous acquaintance with him. Mr Scott was with him; Mr. Scott said he had resigned as a candidate for the school board, through family affliction. Mr. Scott, I think, said he would give Mr. Turnbull his vote; I did not hear him say anything further about Mr. Turnbull; I think not; I think he said Mr. Turnbull would be a fit and proper person for the situation. Mr. Scott was nearly done when I went into the meeting; I was only there a short time, and those were about his last words. After Mr. Scott was done Mr. Turnbull addressed the meeting about the Fish-quay, and different municipal matters. He also mentioned the school board, and said he was a candidate for the board, and I don't know anything further. There might be about twenty-five people when I went into the meeting; they each had a glass of grog or ale, whatever they were drinking. I had two glasses of rum; I did not pay for them; Mr. Bailey gave me the first glass, the second, I think, I got from Mr Scott. I did not hear anything said about replenishing the glasses, the glasses were only replenished once, and I think by Mr. Scott. The company held up their hands for the different kinds of spirits they wanted; I don't know who asked the company to hold up their hands. I was there about half an hour or over. There was a Francis Storey there. I am not a voter; I think there would be seven voters, I recollect about seven.

Cross-examined:

I heard nobody asked for their votes. I have been at meetings when Mr. Scott was there. He has had a few, and always talked about municipal matters, and gave an account of how he had voted. Generally about the same number of people, and he sometimes gave them glasses round, voters and non-voters. I have had glasses from Mr Scott at those meetings. There were none drunk when I left.

Re-examined:

I used to be a voter about a year and a half ago.

In addition to this evidence Mr. Meynell admitted the proof of all the necessary notices and documents, &c., relating to the formation of the Tynemouth School Board and the election of members thereof, and that the appellant was a candidate at such election which took place on the 16th Jan. 1871, and also on behalf of the appellant, admitted that the appellant had ordered and paid for one round of drink at the public house at Cullercoats, but with no guilty intention of influencing his election, and contended that there was no corrupt practice within the meaning of the Act of Parliament and in support of the defence adduced the following evidence:

James Bailey:

I am overseer of the poor at Cullercoats; on the 10th Jan. I went to the Newcastle Arms, Cullercoats; Mr. Turnbull and Mr. Scott were there; they were talking about ordinary matters. I said to Mr. Scott and Mr. Turnbull, "Go to Mr. Featherstone's meeting;" Mr. Scott said, "That is not what I have come about." He said he wanted to see the fishermen about the fish quay question; some fishermen were sent for; Mr. Turnbull was with him at the time. I have several times seen Mr. Scott and Mr. Turnbull there; several meetings had been held. They often came together; Mr. Turnbull was at one time a guardian for Cullercoats; Mr Scott addressed the company about the fish quay and the free library. A gentleman got up and asked Mr. Scott if he intended to continue to be a candidate for the school board. The school board had not been mentioned before, and I had been there for a hour and a-half. Mr. Scott said he had retired from the candidature owing to family affliction, and any gentleman was left to vote for whom he chosed. He said Mr. Turnbull was a candidate, and he meant to vote for him, and all the electors were at liberty to vote as they liked. Before this, Mr. Turnbull had addressed the company about the fish quay and free library. Mr. Turnbull never said anything about the school board before Mr. Scott was asked the question. A memorial was mentioned about the fish quay; I think Mr. Scott mentioned this; Mr. Turnbull got up and addressed the company, and told them what he had done, and it was best to put the best man in the right place; I did not vote. Mr. Turnbull did not in my hearing ask anyone to vote for him, neither did Mr. Scott. I paid the second time round, and I think the last, which I believe is standing to my account. I cannot say whether Mr. Scott or Mr. Turnbull paid anything.

Cross-examined:

My sister-in-law keeps this house. There were four or six in the room when I went in; they had glasses before them; I cannot say whether I paid for the second round; I don't know who ordered the third round; I cannot say who paid for it; from half to three-quarters of an hour might elapse; I would order the fourth round. I was there when the meeting broke up. I was not there when Mr. Turnbull ordered the glasses. I won't say that I did not get a glass at Mr. Turnbull's expense. I remember the second round Mr. Turnbull placed some money on the table to pay for the glasses; that was the second round. I told Mr. Turnbull, "It is not often you come, and I'll pay for them," and did so. Mr. Turnbull took his money back again. I did not see Mr. Turnbull pay for anything. It is about three years since Mr. Turnbull was a guardian. Mr. Turnbull almost regularly came with Mr. Scott. I did not know of the meeting that night. I know two persons of the names of Bolan and Forster at Cullercoats. I did not meet those gentlemen and tell them that Turnbull and Scott were coming out to Cullercoats that night. I cannot remember whether I saw Mr. Bolan that night at Cullercoats. I might have said to Mr Bolan and Forster that I expected Scott and Turnbull coming that night. I don't recollect I got a sort of an inkling that they were coming out. I got a notice that day that they were coming out. It was from half-past seven to eight o'clock. I went to the meeting; I left about ten o'clock; there were four rounds. There was a cab for Mr. Scott and Mr. Turnbull; they came and returned in one.

Re-examined:

After the fishermen came in, and Mr. Featherstone's meeting was broken up, there might be twenty to twenty-five. There might also be four or five voters in the room. I got no notice of any meeting by Mr. Scott.

William Bell:

I am a joiner at Cullercoats. On the 10th Jan. I was at the Newcastle Arms, at Cullercoats. I went about a quarter past seven, and Mr. Crosby came in afterwards. Mr. Scott and Mr. Turnbull were there. Seven when I first went in, and then about ten. Mr. Scott was speaking about the fish quay when I went in, the free library, roads, rating. Mr. Scott was asked by a party in the room if he had retired from the school board on account of a family affliction. The school board election was not mentioned before this. Mr. Scott said Mr. Turnbull was a candidate. I had a glass of ale first, which I paid for. Mr. Scott gave me a glass of whisky. Mr. Turnbull ordered a glass of whisky for me, which was not then paid for by him. I am not a voter. I did not hear anybody asked to vote for Mr. Turnbull. I did not see Mr. Turnbull pay for anything.

Cross-examined:

Mr. Turnbull asked the company what they would partake of—whisky, gin, and rum. The amount, I think, was 5s. 9d. The room was pretty full, but not crammed. I was there from a quarter past seven till eleven o'clock. When Mr. Scott was asked about the school board, Mr. Turnbull addressed them upon the topic of the school board. He spoke about twenty minutes. I got three glasses of whisky, two at Mr. Scott's and one at Mr. Bailey's expense. Mr. Turnbull said on the third round, "Drink off your ringtails. Mr. Scott has mentioned ringtails. Have my ringtails, too." A drunken man came in and was refused drink.

Re-examined:

The twenty minutes was the whole length of his speech.

Francis Crosby:

I am a bellhanger at Newcastle and Cullercoats. On the 10th Jan. 1871 I went to the Newcastle Arms, at half-past seven o'clock. Mr. Scott, Mr. Bailey, Mr. Turnbull, and three other men were there. Mr. Scott was speaking about the fish quay and municipal matters.

After some time, about two hours, Mr. Scott was asked if he had retired, or if it was his intention to retire from his candidature for the school board. He said yes, and gave his reasons. He said nothing about Mr. Turnbull that I heard. The school board was not mentioned by Mr. Scott or Mr. Turnbull. I did not hear Mr. Scott say how he was going to vote. I did not hear Mr. Turnbull canvas for voters. I had a glass of beer, which I paid for, and I had three glasses of rum the whole night. Mr. Scott paid for the first and second, and James Bailey for the third. I did not see Mr. Turnbull pay for any.

Re-examined:

It was half-past seven when I went. I left after ten. I am in the habit of going to this house. I had not seen Mr. Turnbull before. I have been at Cullercoats since last May. I went, as usual, of my own accord. Other parties came in after me; about twenty-two or twenty-three would be the largest number present that night. The room was full. The glasses were replenished by order. Mr. Turnbull asked the company to drink off the ringtails for the purpose of having the glasses replenished. I was there for two hours before the school board was mentioned. I don't remember Mr. Scott mentioning Mr. Turnbull's name. Mr. Turnbull did address the company upon the subject of the school board at the latter part of the meeting. Mr. Turnbull was proposed as a fit and proper person to sit at the school board, and his health and success were drunk. Mr. Scott said nothing whatever how he should vote.

Re-examined:

It was Robinson, the tailor, who proposed Mr. Turnbull as a fit and proper person, and it was ten minutes before we left. I did not see any drunken people.

William Robinson:

I am a tailor, and a voter at Cullercoats. I gave Mr. Turnbull four votes. On the 10th Jan. I was at the Newcastle Arms, I went into the room, Mr. Scott and Mr. Turnbull were there. Mr Bailey came in. I was drinking my own ale. Mr. Bailey and Mr. Scott told me to go out and get some fishermen to see Mr. Scott. Some men came in and Mr. Scott addressed them about the fish-quay, &c. I asked Mr. Scott if he had retired from the school board. He said "Yes." Nothing was said about the school board until I asked the question. I was there about two hours, out and in. I did not hear anybody asked for their votes for Mr. Turnbull. There might be five or six voters. When I came back a glass of whisky was standing on the table. Mr. Bailey gave me another. I did not see Mr. Turnbull pay for any whisky.

Cross-examined:

Mr. Scott and Mr. Turnbull were the only two in the room when I went in. I did not hear anything said about ringtails.

By the Bench:

It was well on the evening when Mr. Scott was asked the question. I think it would be about nine o'clock.

After hearing the case we were of opinion that the case did come within the meaning of the Act of Parliament, and we therefore convicted the appellant as before stated.

Whereupon the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench is asked whether or not we, the said justices, were correct in point of law in our determination as aforesaid upon the circumstances disclosed in the foregoing case.

Given under our hands this 31st March, 1871, at the police court in the said borough of Tynemouth.

GEORGE BELL.
EDW. SHOTTEN.

By the 91st section of the 33 & 34 Vict. c. 75 (The Elementary Schools Act 1870), it is enacted that "any person who at the election of any member of a school board, or any officer appointed for the purpose of such election, is guilty of corrupt practices, shall, on conviction for each offence, be liable to a penalty not exceeding 2*l.*, and be disqualified for the term of six years after such election, from exercising any franchise at any election under this Act, or at any municipal or parliamentary election. The term corrupt practices in this section includes all bribery, treating, and undue influence, which, under any Act relating to a parliamentary election, renders such election void."(a)

Quain, Q.C. (Herschell with him) appeared for the appellant.—This statute must be construed very strictly, for the penalty is most severe, the party not only being liable to a fine, but to a disability from exercising any municipal or Parliamentary franchise for six years. [COCKBURN, C. J.—The object of the Legislature was to produce the desired effect through the medium of a severe penalty.] The evidence does not show the existence of any corrupt motive, only one of the voters voted for him. This was nothing more than a mere jollification. [COCKBURN, C. J.—The sooner they are put an end to on such occasions the better.] The object must be a corrupt one. The occasion should be looked to. Here there was a proposition for glasses round, and Mr. Turnbull only took his turn. [MELLOR, J.—His success was proposed.] But that was not the object of the meeting. The having a glass with a voter is certainly not treating. [COCKBURN, C. J.—If that was done to influence the voters, it was corruptly done.] There was evidently no intention to influence the voters; it was a mere act of jollity, each party paid for the glasses round in turn. We must look at the common usages of society in such a matter. [MELLOR, J.—The people were strangers to him. COCKBURN, C. J.—The man who treats others in a public house is no doubt deemed by them to be the right man in the right place.] But there was nothing corrupt about it.

Holker, Q. C. (Edge with him) for the respondent, was not called upon.

COCKBURN, C. J.—It is not in accordance with the usages of society for a gentleman in the position of Mr. Turnbull to go into a public house and treat others in this way. I think that the justices were quite right in the conclusion to which they came.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. There was evidence certainly upon which the justices could act. Mr. Turnbull was proposed as a candidate for the school board, and his health was drunk.

LUSH, J.—If this had arisen before me upon a Parliamentary petition, I should certainly have had no doubt, and I agree that the Act should be strictly carried out.

(a) By the 17 and 18 Vict. c. 102, s. 4, it is enacted as to treating, that "Every candidate at an election who shall corruptly by himself, or by or with any person, or by any other ways or means on his behalf, at any time, either before, during, or after any election, directly or indirectly, give or provide, or cause to be given or provided, or shall be accessory to the giving or providing, or shall pay, wholly or in part, any expenses incurred for any meat, drink, entertainment, or provision, to or for any person in order to be elected, or for being elected, or for the purpose of corruptly influencing such person, or any other person, to give or refrain from giving his vote at such election, or on account of such person having voted, or refrained from voting, or being about to vote, or refrain from voting at such election, shall be deemed guilty of the offence of treating, &c.

VIGAR v. DUDMAN.

Land converted into tillage—Tithe—Modus—Replevin.

Before the Tithe Commutation Act 1836, an award was made under certain Inclosure Acts, by which the tithes of the parish in which the plaintiff was a landowner, and defendant the rector, were commuted; by this award a yearly modus payable for hay and agistment tithe payments, and also larger sums to be paid for the same lands when converted into tillage were fixed by the commissioner.

A house had since been built upon a portion of a field of the plaintiff mentioned in the award, and a further portion, to the extent of 22 perches, was converted into garden ground; the remaining portion of the field had been made into an orchard.

The defendant put in a distress for the larger sum fixed by the award to be paid for this field, on the ground that part of it had been converted into tillage:

Held, in an action of replevin to try defendant's right, that the garden ground was accessory to the house, and that no part of the field was converted into tillage.

Upon the hearing of a special case stated in replevin, the plaintiff has the right to begin.

THIS was an action of replevin brought by the plaintiff, who is a farmer and landowner, residing at Pitney, in the county of Somerset, against the defendant, who is the rector of the parish of Pitney, to recover damages for a distress levied on the goods of the plaintiff for the sum of 3*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.*, being six years' arrears of a corn rentcharge, alleged to be due to the defendant as for a broken modus.

The action was originally brought in the County Court of Somersetshire, holden at Langport, but had been removed by writ of certiorari into this court at the instance of the defendant, and by the consent of the parties and by order the following case without pleadings was stated for the opinion of the court.

The tithes of the parish of Pitney, otherwise Pitney Lortie, in the county of Somerset, were commuted before the passing of the Tithe Commutation Act 1836 for a corn rentcharge by an award made under the provisions of the General Enclosure Act (41 Geo. 3, c. 109) and the Pitney Enclosure Act (42 Geo. 3, c. xv.) from which award the following is an extract.

And it was by the said now reciting Act further enacted, That nothing therein contained should extend or be construed to extend to affect any estates, lands, or grounds, within the parish of Pitney then exempted from the payment of tithes in kind by any valid modus or moduses or customary payments in lieu of tithes, but that all such estates, lands, and grounds should thereafter, notwithstanding anything therein contained, remain and continue exempted from the payment of such tithes for which such modus or moduses or customary payments had been paid, and such estates, lands, and grounds should not be charged with the said yearly rents or sums of money in lieu of tithes before mentioned in respect of any of the titheable matters or things in lieu of which such modus or moduses or customary payments had been paid, but that such several modus or moduses or customary payments should continue payable as if the said now reciting Act had not been made.

And in order to ascertain in future what estates, lands, and grounds were so claimed to be exempt from the payment of such tithes, I have caused a schedule of the same to be made, and annex to this my award, entitled "The Pitney modus schedule," wherein I have distinctly ascertained and set forth the said estates, lands, and grounds, with the amount of the moduses or customary payments payable thereout respectively in lieu of such tithes; but as such claims respectively extended only to the said lands when occupied by the owners thereof, or by persons residing within the said parish of Pitney Lortie aforesaid, and such lands were subject to the payment of tithes in kind to the rector of Pitney Lortie when occupied by any person or persons not residing within the said parish of Pitney Lortie, or shall be converted into tillage, I have inserted in the said schedule opposite to such lands the tithe money payment to be hereafter payable thereout respectively in the event of and during the time when the same lands or any part thereof may be occupied by any person or persons not residing within the said parish of Pitney Lortie, or shall be converted into tillage as aforesaid. And it was by the now reciting Act further enacted that, in order to prevent any difficulty to the rector of the said rectory of Pitney and to the owner of the said parsonage of Huish Episcopi for the time being by the division of any estate by sale or otherwise, and to facilitate the future regulating the said yearly rents or sums of money, I the said commissioner should, and I was thereby required to, make three complete schedules or descriptions of each allotment, &c., to be made under the now reciting Act, with the names of the owners thereof, the exact measure, &c., &c., and the rate by the acre by which the said yearly rents or sums of money should be charged.

The following is an extract from the modus schedule referred to in the award:

No. 422 above mentioned is occupied by the plaintiff, who is also the owner thereof. About forty years ago a house was built upon a portion of the field, and a further portion (to the extent of 22 perches) was converted into garden ground by the then owner thereof, who fenced off the house and garden from the rest of the field, the remaining portion being orchard. Although the house has been built and the garden made for nearly forty years past, no claim has ever been made upon the plaintiff for payment of any other sum than the modus payment of a penny mentioned in the second column of the schedule, which sum he has annually and regularly paid until the last tithe audit in Oct. 1869, when the collection of the tithe having been recently placed in the hands of new agents, they called upon the plaintiff for payment of 3*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.*, being six years arrears of the corn rent (12*s.* 8½*d.*), charged under column 7 of the schedule, on the ground that by reason of the said 22 perches of the field having been converted into garden, the whole sum of 12*s.* 8½*d.* was payable as if the whole field had been converted into tillage, and also that the planting of the ground as an orchard was a breach of the modus. The plaintiff refused to pay the sum claimed, but subsequently tendered to the defendant the sum of 9*s.*, being six years' arrears in respect of the 22 perches actually converted into garden, at the rate of 10*s.* per acre (see column 10).

In order to try the question, it was arranged between the parties that the defendant, the rector, should distrain the arrears claimed by him; and accordingly, on the 12th April 1870 (a day previously settled with the plaintiff's solicitor) the said defendant, the rector, distrained the plaintiff's cattle, goods, and chattels for the said six years' arrears of the corn rent in respect of the land numbered 422 in the said schedule, up to and including the half-year due 29th Sept. 1869. The plaintiff thereupon replevied the said goods, and having deposited in court a sum of money by way of security for costs, commenced this action in the Somersetshire County Court.

It is agreed that the court may draw all necessary inferences of fact.

Copies of the General Inclosure Act (41 Geo. 3, c. 109) and the Pitney Inclosure Act (42 Geo. 3, c. xv.), and of the said award, form part of this case, or of so much of the said award as is material.

The question for the opinion of the court is whether, under the above-mentioned circumstances, the plaintiff is entitled to recover against the defendant damages in respect of the said distraint.

If the court shall be of opinion in the affirmative, then judgment shall be entered for the plaintiff for such sum as the court shall direct, and such costs of the suit as the court shall direct. If the court shall be of opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled so to recover against the defendant, then judgment is to be entered for the defendant for the amount of the defendant's claim, 3*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.*, and costs.

Plaintiff's points: First, that the plaintiff is not, on the facts stated, liable to the defendant for the increased yearly rent claimed; secondly, that neither the planting of the orchard, nor the building of the house, is a breach of the modus; thirdly, that neither the planting of the orchard, nor the building of the house, is a conversion of the land into tillage; fourthly, that the conversion of twenty-two perches of land out of the allotment into garden ground, does not render the plaintiff liable to the increased rent upon the whole allotment as if the whole allotment had been converted into tillage.

Defendant's points: First, that the building of a house upon a portion of the modus land, the conversion of other portion of the same land into a garden, and the planting of the fruit trees in the remainder of the land, and converting the same into an orchard, were a conversion into tillage, or in any event a breaking of the modus within the meaning of the award, and entitled the defendant to the yearly rent of 12*s.* 8*d.*, mentioned in column 7; secondly, that the last mentioned Acts by changing the nature of the land out of which the modus was payable operated as a discharge of the modus; thirdly, that by the conversion of any portion of the modus land into tillage, the modus was discharged as to the whole of the land.

The right to be heard first was claimed by both plaintiff's and defendant's counsel.

WILLES, J.—In this court the plaintiff in replevin, as well as in other actions, begins the arguments upon a special case.

Charles for plaintiff.—There was no conversion of any part of this land into tillage. The word, according to Dr. Johnson's Dictionary, means "Husbandry; the act or practice of plowing or culture." It is to be found in some of the early statutes, where it is generally contrasted with pasture:

14 & 15 Hen. 8, c. 1;
27 Hen. 8, c. 22;
5 & 6 Edw. 6, c. 5.

It is always used to express the result of ploughing, or work of that nature:

Mascall v. Price, 1 Eagle & Younge's Tithe Cases; 225; Bedingfield v. Feak, Cro. Eliz. 467;
Rolle's Abridgment, 651;
2 Co. Inst. 490.

Philbrick (with him Edwyn Jones) for defendant—The question here is as to the meaning of tillage as used by the commissioner in this award:

Com. Dig., tit. "Dismes," E. 30.

Charles, in reply, not heard.

WILLES, J.—In my opinion our judgment ought to be in favour of the plaintiff. The award, as framed by the commissioner, made the plaintiff's land liable to the payment of 1*d.* a year, except when occupied by non-residents, or converted into tillage, in which latter case it would become liable to a payment of 12*s.* 8½*d.* a year. It appears that a house has been built upon it some forty years ago; and I apprehend the building of the house had no effect on the question. At the time the house was built a garden of 22 perches had been made—a very moderate garden if the house was of any extent, and the rest of the plot of land was devoted to an orchard. These were the ordinary accompaniments of a residence in the country; and until a year or two ago the ordinary 1*d.* modus only had been paid by the tenant. The garden and orchard were nothing more than reasonable accessories to the house, and did not fall within the description of agriculture, nor were they like a market garden. As the modus was, primâ facie, 1*d.*, the onus would be on the rector to satisfy the court that the garden or the orchard amounted to tillage of the land. In the absence of such proof, it would appear that they were accessory to the house. Making such a garden did not amount to converting the land into tillage, but rather to con-

; the land into residence. If asked what meant, I should take the word as used in nary sense, and especially as used in ancient when the modus came to be expressed in and as used in the award. I should refer, the best authority, to Lord Coke's note to 7 of Littleton on Tenure in Soeage, 85 b., there are some strong and quaint expresaction for false imprisonment in a County t, the judge told the jury that, under the 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 103, any person might, out a warrant, apprehend any person found nitting theft, and if acting in the bona fide f that he had authority so to apprehend him, ugh no theft had in fact been committed, was led to notice of action, provided he had rea- ble ground for believing that the person hended was committing a theft. The jury d a verdict for the plaintiff:

upon appeal ,that there must be a new trial, he defendant's right to protection under the te was not subject to the opinion of the jury the reasonableness of his belief.

as an appeal from the County Court of Kent, at Sheerness.

plaintiff is a waterman residing in Bull- Rochester, and the defendant is a second and adjutant in the Royal Artillery, sta- in garrison at Sheerness.

action, which was brought for false im- ment, came on for trial at the Sheerness Court on the 22nd July 1870, before James onsdale, Esq., judge of the said court, and of five persons.

plaintiff stated in his evidence, that on the une 1870, he saw a buoy in the river Med- hich appeared to him to be nearly sunk; and been previously told by the coxswain of the ess garrison boat, that if he found any buoys gets belonging to the War Department he should get salvage for bringing them , he pulled the anchor to which the buoy tached on board his boat, and towed the shore.

defendant stated in his evidence, that look- t of the mess-room through a powerful pe, he saw the plaintiff in a boat approach the buoy, and, after being occupied several minutes, remove the buoy and the anchor, which were the property of the War Department, and that in the bonâ fide belief that the plaintiff was stealing the same, he gave him into custody the same evening for stealing property of the War Department; also that the coxswain of the garrison boat had no authority to give any such orders as the plaintiff stated he had given with regard to the buoys and targets, or to promise salvage for bringing them ashore, and that the plaintiff must have known this from the length of time he had been a waterman at Sheerness.

On the 22nd June the plaintiff was brought before the stipendiary magistrate at Sheerness, when the defendant stated that he did not wish to prosecute him, but that he hoped the arrest would prevent such things happening in future, as numerous complaints had been made to the defendant of the removal of the buoys belonging to the War Department.

It was contended on behalf of the defendant that he had, in giving the plaintiff into custody, acted under the provisions of the Consolidated Larceny Act (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96), and that he was entitled to notice of action under that statute, and sects. 103 and 113 were especially relied on in support of the above contention.

It was contended on the part of the plaintiff that under the authority of Downing v. Capel (36 L. J. 97, M. C.), as the plaintiff was not forthwith taken before a neighbouring justice of the peace, but was locked up for three days when there was no necessity for his being so, the defendant was not entitled to any notice of action.

It was further contended on behalf of the defendant that the right of the defendant to notice was a question for the judge and not for the jury, and was not affected by the duration of the imprisonment; and that the question whether there was reasonable and probable cause for the arrest was also a question for the judge and not for the jury, and that there was, in fact, under the circumstances, reasonable and probable cause for the arrest.

The judge told the jury that under the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 103, any person might, without a warrant, apprehend any person found committing theft, and, if acting in the bonâ fide belief that he had authority so to apprehend him, although no theft had been in fact committed, was entitled to notice of action before the commencement of any action against him for so doing, provided he had reasonable ground for believing that the person apprehended was committing a theft. That the first questions they would have to consider were, whether the defendant acted bonâ fide, and whether, from what he saw the plaintiff doing, he might not reasonably suppose the plaintiff was stealing the buoy and anchor. If their conclusions upon these questions were in the affirmative, then the defendant was entitled to notice of action, and the plaintiff must be nonsuited. If, however, they should be of opinion that the defendant did not act bonâ fide, or that from what the plaintiff was seen doing he could not be reasonably supposed to be stealing the buoy and anchor, then the plaintiff would be entitled to a verdict for some amount, as the defendant had not complied with the provisions of the 103rd section of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, by taking the plaintiff forthwith before some neighbouring justice of the peace, previously to which enactment a private person could not justify apprehending a person without warrant upon a mere suspicion of felony, unless it turned out that a felony had been actually committed.

The jury found that the defendant did not act bonâ fide, and that from what he saw the plaintiff doing he could not reasonably suppose the plaintiff was stealing the buoy and anchor; and assessed the damages at 15*l*., whereupon a verdict for that amount was entered for the plaintiff.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the judge rightly directed the jury?

If the court shall be of opinion that his direction was right, then the verdict for the plaintiff is to stand.

If the court shall be of opinion to the contrary, then either a verdict is to be entered for the defendant, or a new trial or a nonsuit ordered, as the court may direct.

Archibald for defendant, the appellant.—The last case on this subject of false imprisonment is Lister v. Perryman (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 269; L. Rep. 4 E. & I. App. 521; 39 L. J. Ex. 177.) [Stopped by the court.]

F. J. Smith, for plaintiff, the respondent.—The authorities upon all the points raised in this case are very conflicting, but the majority of them are in accordance with the judge's direction:

Rudd v. Scott, 2 Scott N. R. 631;
Hughes v. Buckland, 15 M. & W. 346;
Hazledine v. Grove, 3 Q. B. 1007;
Wedge v. Berkeley, 6 A. & E. 663;
Leete v. Hart, L. Rep. 3 C. P. 322;
Panton v. Williams, 2 Q. B. 169;
Turner v. Ambler, 10 Q. B. 252.

WILLES, J.—The decision in this case must be set aside, but I think we ought not to enter a nonsuit. There must be a new trial. The County Court judge had considerable difficulties to grapple with, for the cases seem to mix up the grounds upon which notice of action may be required with the question of what was reasonable cause for the prosecution of the offender. Even Mr. Archibald seemed to think, from his reference to the case of Lister v. Perryman (L. Rep. 4 E. & I. App. 521), that notice of action must depend to some extent upon reasonable and probable cause for an arrest. The cases cited by Mr. Smith show the same confusion; and even in Hughes v. Buckland (15 M. & W. 346), Lord Wensleydale recognised reasonable belief as a ground for the protection of the statute. There the jury found for the defendants, but it seems that reasonableness for their belief was mixed up with the ground of their finding. Here the judge seemed to think that to entitle the defendant to a verdict, he must have had reasonable ground for thinking that the plaintiff was committing a theft. He laid it down that if the defendant were acting in the bona fide belief that he had authority to apprehend the plaintiff, although no theft had in fact been committed, he was entitled to notice of action, but he added subject to the proviso that he had reasonable ground for so believing. The question for us is whether the inference which might have been drawn from this direction is law, viz., whether if a person sees another doing something which he honestly believes to be a felony, and immediately apprehends him, he is to be deprived of the protection of the statute because the jury choose to find that there was no ground which they thought reasonable for his belief and for the apprehension. The jury found that the defendant could not reasonably suppose that the plaintiff was stealing the buoy and anchor; but that finding is not sufficient to establish that the defendant did not bonâ fide believe so. The buoy was fastened by an anchor, and the defendant, looking through a telescope, saw the plaintiff remove it; there were therefore some grounds for believing the plaintiff to be committing a felony, and according to the evidence the defendant seems to have so believed. Sect. 113 of the Larceny Act 1861 gives protection to any person for anything done in pursuance of this Act. In Herrman v. Seneschal (13 C. B., N. S., 392), it was held that, in order to entitle a party to a notice of action for a thing done in pursuance of the Act with respect to coining offences, it is enough that he honestly and bonâ fide believes he is acting in pursuance of the Act, whether there be reasonable ground for such belief or not. That case was acted upon in Roberts v. Orchard (2 H. & C. 769), which was a bill of exceptions upon this very statute. Williams, J., in delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, said, where the question is whether a defendant is entitled to notice of action under an Act of Parliament of this nature, the proper way of leaving the question to the jury is this: "Did the defendant honestly believe in the existence of those facts which, if they had existed, would have afforded a justification under the statute?" In the case of Leete v. Hart (L. Rep. 3 C. P. 322), there is a semble contained in the headnote which must be taken with the facts of the case; if with those facts it goes further than the two cases to which I have alluded it is wrong. The true question is whether the defendant's evidence is to be believed, for upon what he said he was clearly entitled to notice of action. Mr. Smith contends that there are other points on which our judgment should be in his favour, one being that the protection of the 113th section does not apply to the defendant because he was not doing anything in pursuance of this Act. By sect. 103, "Any person found committing any offence punishable either by indictment or upon summary conviction by virtue of this Act . . . may be immediately apprehended without a warrant;" here he says the removal of the buoy was no larceny; but this is no absolute protection against an action being brought, and it would be sufficient to entitle the defendant to notice if, as he says, he believed the plaintiff was stealing the buoy and anchor. Then Mr. Smith argued upon another footing, and assuming that the other necessary things were complied with, the plaintiff, he said, was not "forthwith taken" before some neighbouring justice of the peace to be dealt with according to law. This contention is open to the answer that it does not appear but that the time taken was reasonable and convenient for doing what was done. The defendant's proper course was to give the plaintiff over to the police; this he seems to have done forthwith, and it was no fault of his if the stipendiary magistrate did not sit in the neighbourhood for three days afterwards. The meaning of the word "forthwith" is discussed in Thompson v. Gibson (8 M. & W. 281), and in the cases there cited. These collateral points fail, and the real contention between the parties comes round to the direct question whether the defendant's right to protection under the statute is subject to the opinion of the jury as to the reasonableness of his belief. I think his right is not so subject, and on that account there must be a new trial.

Smith, J.—The only question for us is, Did the judge rightly direct the jury? It does not appear that he did, according to the cases of Hermann v. Seneschal, and Roberts v. Orchard. It has been said that Leete v. Hart to some extent qualifies those cases; but I took part in that decision, and I remember, as well as observe from the report, that every judge declined to infringe those cases, and the head note must be read with the facts of the case.

Reg. v. King.

Embezzlement—Receipt of the money.

A conductor of a tramway car was charged with embezzling 3s. It was proved that on a certain journey there were fifteen threepenny fares, and twenty-five twopenny fares, and the conductor was seen to give tickets to each fare and to receive money from each, but what sum did not appear. He made out a way bill for the journey debiting himself with only nine threepenny fares and sixteen twopenny fares. The mode of accounting was to deliver the way bills for each journey to a clerk, and to hand him all the money received during each day on the following morning. The prisoner's money should have been 3l. 1s. 9d. according to his way bill for the day, but he paid in only 3l. 0s. 6d.:

Held that there was sufficient evidence of the receipt of 7s. 11d. the total amount of fares of the particular journey, and of the embezzlement of 3s. part thereof.

Case reserved for the opinion of this Court from the Surrey Sessions.

At the general quarter sessions of the peace, holden by adjournment at St. Mary, Newington, in and for the county of Surrey, on Monday, the 6th March 1871, Thomas King was tried and convicted upon an indictment charging him with feloniously and fraudulently embezzling on the 10th Feb. 1871, 3s. of the moneys of the London Tramways Company (Limited), his masters.

At the trial the following evidence was given:—

George Mellish, P.C. 50 W., said:

On Friday, 10th Feb. I made a journey in car 10, of which prisoner was the conductor, at 5.40. Robinson and I sat in different parts of the car. I am acquainted with the distances for which the fares are 2d. and 3d. Fifteen who got out were 3d. fares. Each paid money. Prisoner gave each a ticket. Twenty-five were 2d. I did not see each pay, nor see prisoner give to each a ticket. For a 3d. fare I put a bean in my left pocket, and for a 2d. fare I put a bean in my right. The number of beans in my pockets and in those of Robinson's corresponded. I saw prisoner make out a way bill at the end of the journey, at Brixton church. There is an interval of five or ten minutes before they start again. The car holds twenty-two.

Cross-examined:

The fifteen got in at starting at Westminster-bridge. They got out after they had passed Kennington. Prisoner received two fares, and gave no tickets. Two 2d. fares. We saw money pass.

By jury:

Both tickets were blue. 3d. were blue, and 2d. a shade lighter.

John Robinson, 252 W.:

I travelled by the same car. I know the 2d. and 3d. distances. Between Westminster and Kennington there were eight outside and seven inside. Fifteen at 2d. each. They got down before they came to Kennington church. I saw them all pay, but I do not know how much. All received tickets except two ladies, and no tickets were offered to them. Ten got in at Kennington church, and rode to Brixton church; all 2d. fares, making twenty-five 2d. fares. These ten all paid, and had tickets. There were fifteen 3d. fares, and they all paid, and had tickets. Some of the tickets were thrown on the floor of the car. I saw King make out his way bill; he had plenty of time to do it. I took prisoner into custody on Monday the 13th Feb., and charged him with embezzling 3s., and told him it would be explained to him at the station. He made no answer. I searched him, and found eight old 1d. workmen's tickets. No counterfoils were found upon him. I asked him what he had the tickets in his possession for, and he said, "It is very probable I might have more, for I often put them in my pocket." I compared the beans in my pockets with the other police constable, and they corresponded.

John Bemister, clerk to the Metropolitan Tramways Company, said:

Conductors have to send their way bills to me. This way bill, dated 10th Feb., is signed by the prisoner for the 5.40 journey. It is the duty of conductors to give tickets to each passenger. The items are nine 3d. tickets and sixteen 2d. tickets. The way bill does not state the time of the journey, but states eighth journey, 10th car, and it would be about the time. On the following morning he should pay in a bag the money he received. I make out a statement and send the way bills and bags to the chief office. No one can tamper with them. The whole amount paid for this day would be 3l. 1s., and for this one journey from Westminster to Brixton on this occasion was 4s. 11d. Prisoner had no business to have these old workmen's tickets in his possession.

Cross-examined:

Mistakes have been made in numbering the tickets consecutively. The practice now is to count the money brought in by the conductors; this plan was commenced about a fortnight since. The conductors have to find their own change.

William Meloy, traffic manager to the Metropolitan Tramways Company, said:

Prisoner was a conductor at 23s., and a bonus of 2s. 6d. per week. On Monday, the 13th Feb., I gave prisoner into custody at the thirteenth journey. The car No. 10, on the eighth journey, leaves Westminster Bridge about five, or sometimes after five.

Thomas Henry Cox, clerk to the Tramways Company at their office in Parliament-street, said:

The bags and sheets are sent to me. On the 11th Feb. I received returns of King, the prisoner. The account was for 3l. 1s. 9d., but the money in the bag was 3l. 0s. 6d. This deficiency would be deducted from his wages. Turner brings money and bags.

Charles Turner said:

I fetched the bags from Bemister on the morning of the 11th Feb. I took them as they were given to me to Mr. Cox.

The prisoner's statement before the police magistrate was read, which was as follows:

At 5.40 there is generally a great number of passengers, and I begin to take their fares and give them tickets when the car is nearly full, which is generally after we pass the Hercules, and if two or three get in after that I take their fares and give them tickets as they come out, and each passenger had a ticket. The constable has made an error in saying I said it was a usual thing for me to carry tickets. I said nothing of the kind. I had a few old penny tickets in my pocket rolled up, but I never used any, and those are the only tickets found on me. The constable never told me I was charged with embezzling 3s.; he never mentioned the amount. They could not tell whether they were 2d. or 3d tickets that I delivered.

At the conclusion of the above-mentioned evidence the prisoner's counsel submitted that there was not sufficient evidence to go to the jury.

The court, however, left the case to the jury, who returned a verdict of guilty, and the court thereupon reserved the following points for the decision of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved:

First, was it necessary to prove the actual payment to the prisoner of the money charged as being embezzled, or were the jury at liberty to infer such payment from the whole of the circumstances proved in evidence.

Secondly, was there any evidence to show that the prisoner received more money than he accounted for, or sufficient evidence to go to the jury on the whole case.

The court respited judgment, and admitted the prisoner to bail until the decision of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved shall be known.

E. Richard Adams, Chairman.

Oppenheim for the prisoner.—The conviction was wrong, for the evidence was insufficient. It was necessary to prove that the prisoner actually received 7s. 11d., the aggregate amount of fifteen 3d. fares and twenty-five 2d. fares. The witnesses cannot say what sum each or any of the passengers paid, only that each paid money. It is not to be inferred that each paid the right fare simply because they ought to have done so. [Blackburn, J.—It is not an unreasonable inference that each passenger paid the right fare, and that the prisoner received it.] There cannot be embezzlement until it is proved that the money alleged to be embezzled has been actually received. [Byles, J.—There was evidence of the receipt, for that would be the reasonable and probable result from what was seen by the witnesses. Bovill, C. J.—The prisoner's own statement that each passenger had a ticket is as good evidence that he received all the fares as well could be.] In Rex v. Chapman (1 Car. & K. 119), where it was the duty of a clerk to receive money, pay wages out of it, and make entries of all moneys received and paid in a book, and enter the weekly totals of receipts and payments in another book, upon which last book he paid over his balances, the clerk having entered weekly payments in the first book 25*l*., he entered them in the second book as 35*l*., and two months after, in accounting with his employer, made his balance 10*l*. too little, and paid it over accordingly, it was held that he could not be convicted of embezzlement without proof that he had received some particular sum and had converted the whole or part of that sum to his own use; secondly, there was no evidence to shew that the prisoner received more money than he accounted for. The evidence was that the prisoner made out a way-bill for each journey, and on the following morning he paid in a bag the money he received—a lump sum of 3*l*. 0s. 8d.—to a clerk, who sent it and the way bills over, with a statement, to the chief office. There was only one way bill put in evidence relating to the journey in respect of which the money was alleged to have been embezzled. The other way bills for that day should have been produced:

Rex v. Jones, Car. & P. 834.

Bovill, C. J.—I think there was sufficient evidence on both points. It was the prisoner's duty to receive the fares when he issued the tickets, and the evidence was that fifteen of the passengers were 3d. fares, and twenty-five 2d. fares, and that each paid money to the prisoner, and the prisoner gave to each a ticket. The amount of these fares would be 7s. 11d., and it was the prisoner's duty to have received that money. The witnesses saw them all pay money to the prisoner. The evidence is almost conclusive that the prisoner received 7s. 11d. Then did he embezzle any part of that sum? He did; for he made out a false account of the number of passengers, and paid over only 4s. 11d. The conviction will therefore be affirmed.

Martin, B.—There was clear evidence on both points. It was not absolutely conclusive—it was circumstantial evidence; and I should have drawn the same conclusion as the jury, that the prisoner received 7s. 11d. and paid over only 4s. 11d., and embezzled the remainder.

The other Judges concurred.

Conviction affirmed.

Reg. v. Fletcher.

Perjury—Affiliation summons—Jurisdiction to hear—7 & 8 Vict. c. 101—8 & 9 Vict. c. 10.

The 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 2, in the case of an application by a woman before the birth of a bastard child against the putative father for a maintenance summons requires that "the woman shall make a deposition upon oath stating who is the father of the child." A summons having issued in such a case, the defendant appeared thereto, made no objection to the summons, and was examined, and committed perjury:

Held, that the magistrate had jurisdiction to hear the summons, the defendant by appearing having waived any objection thereto on the ground that there was no written deposition of the woman made upon the application for the summons.

Case reserved for the opinion of this court by Cleasby, B.

The prisoner was tried before me at the spring assizes for the county of Derby for perjury alleged to have been committed by him at the hearing of an affiliation summons.

The following is a copy of the summons:

Derbyshire to wit.—To Thomas Fletcher, of Heanor, in the county of Derby. Whereas, application hath this day been made to me, the undersigned, one of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the county of Derby, by Jane Bestwick, single woman, residing at Heanor, in the petty sessional division of the said county for which I act, now with child, of which child she hath this day duly sworn on oath before me, the said justice, that you are the father, for a summons to be served on you to appear at a petty sessions of the peace, according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

These are, therefore, to require you to appear at the petty sessions of the justices, holden at the Justice-room in Heanor, in the said county, being the petty session for the division in which I usually act, on Monday, the 1st Aug. 1870, at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, to answer any complaint which she shall then and there make against you touching the premises. Herein fail you not.

Given under my hand, at Heanor, in the said county of Derby, this 25th April 1870. M. Mundy.

Note.—If you neglect to appear at the petty sessions, as above stated, the justices, upon proof that this summons has been duly served upon you, or left at your last place of abode, may proceed, if they think fit, at the petty sessions therein named, to make an order upon you, as the putative father of the child above referred to, to pay a sum to the said mother for its maintenance, and

. Bristowe, for the prisoner.—The conviction her of the child. The 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 2, nay, before the birth of such child, make tion to a justice of the peace for a summons child to appear at, &c. And by sect. 3, on pearance of the person so summoned, the [BOVILL, C.J.—In Richardson's Dictionary "depose" is said to mean "to give evidence or bear testimony."] There is a difference in the way of proceeding between applications before and after the birth of the child. Where the application is after the birth the form commences, "The information and application of," whereas in the case of an application before birth, it is "Application and deposition of." [BLACKBURN, J.—It would seem that a deposition is a record of what is said on oath before the magistrate. This form is a direction to the magistrate to make a record of the deposition of the applicant, but it is not a condition precedent to his jurisdiction to issue the summons that this should be done. I do not think that neglect by the magistrate to do that would make an order upon a summons so issued not enforceable, and a fortiori would not prevent a person from being indicted for perjury committed upon the hearing of the summons. BRAMWELL, B.—Was the magistrate acting without jurisdiction in hearing the summons for not having taken down the woman's evidence in writing?] In Reg. v. Berry (8 Cox C. C. 121; Bell's C. C. 46) and Reg. v. Shaw (L. & C. 579; 34 L. J. 169, M. C.) the objection was the non-production of the summons, which was held to be cured by the appearance of the man at the hearing of the summons; but here the doctrine of waiver cannot apply, for the statute requires the deposition on which the summons is to issue to be in writing. The following cases were then referred to:

Reg. v. Simmons, 8 Cox C. C. 190;
Reg. v. Smith, 37 L. J. 6, M. C.; 11 Cox C. C. 10;
Reg. v. Pearce, 32 L. J. 75, M. C.; 9 Cox C. C. 258;
Reg. v. Hughes, 7 Cox C. C. 286; D. & B. 188;
Reg. v. Millard, 6 Cox C. C. 150.

BOVILL, C. J.—Mr. Bristowe has argued this case extremely well, and urged everything that could be said in favour of the objection. The jurisdiction of the magistrate in this case to hear the summons, and which was exercised when the false oath was taken, depends upon the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 3, which enacts that after the birth of the child, on the appearance of the person summoned, or on proof that the summons was duly served, &c., the justices in petty sessions shall hear the evidence of the woman, and shall also hear any evidence tendered by the person alleged to be the father. A hearing of the summons did take place, and on that hearing the defendant was examined, and gave false evidence, for which he was afterwards indicted and convicted of perjury. On the trial of the indictment it was objected that the defendant was not regularly summoned before the magistrate, because the woman had not made a deposition on oath before the summons was issued. There was, in fact, a summons, and the defendant appeared to it. Mr. Bristowe contended that the statute meant that the woman should make a deposition in writing before the summons was issued. The statute does not say that the deposition is to be in writing, and I should have thought it meant an ordinary deposition. Ordinarily a deposition in proceedings before magistrates is understood to imply that the maker of it shall be sworn and examined, and his testimony taken down by the magistrates' clerk, and usually signed by the deponent. But so far as depositions before magistrates are concerned, they are taken down and signed under the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, s. 17, so that they may be used in evidence in cases where the witnesses may become unable to attend at the trial. But that statute does not apply to cases like the present. No doubt the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 10, enacts that if the proceedings are in the form of or to the like tenor and effect as the forms in the schedule to that Act, they shall be taken to be valid and sufficient; but the statute does not require them to be in such form. And the section applies as well to proceedings taken before that Act as to future proceedings. Now, in this case it seems to me to be immaterial to determine whether the statute requires the deposition to be in writing or not, for if the woman is simply to depose orally, and the magistrate is to make some record of her evidence, there is in this case a written statement in the summons that the woman was with child, and had sworn that the defendant was the father, and had applied for a summons against him. That is a document to the like tenor and effect as the one in the schedule. Even if there had been no record at all of the deposition of the woman on the application for the summons, it is impossible to distinguish this case from Reg v. Berry (6 Cox C. C. 121.) That decision is the more important, because it was upon this very statute. The application in that case was more than twelve months after the birth of the child, and before the summons was issued there was no evidence on oath as required by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 2, that the putative father had paid money for the maintenance of the child within twelve months next after its birth. The objection was that the magistrates had no jurisdiction to hear the summons, upon the hearing of which the perjury had been committed. This case and that seems to me to be identical. In that case the question was whether the proof on oath of the payment of money by the putative father. and in this whether a deposition in writing was a condition precedent to the issuing of the summons. The court held that the defendant's appearance to the summons was conclusive, he having made no objection to the summons on the hearing, but denied the paternity only. Lord Campbell, C.J., said: "The proceeding against the putative father of a bastard child to obtain an order of maintenance is not a proceeding in pœnam to punish for a crime, but merely to enforce a pecuniary obligation, and is a suit within the meaning of the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, ss. 2 and 3, for which reason the defendant was admitted as a witness on his own behalf. Then, what is the summons which we have to consider? The process to bring the defendant into court in a civil suit. I incline to think that, according to strict regularity, before the summons issued there ought to have been evidence on oath of the payment of the money, although it is not expressly required by the statute to be on oath, as in the case where the complaint is made before the birth of the child." Here there was a summons which stated that evidence had been given that the woman was with child and the defendant was the putative father, as required by the statute; and even if it had not so stated, yet the defendant, having appeared, the magistrate had jurisdiction to hear the summons. The case is not distinguishable from Reg. v. Berry, and the conviction must be affirmed.

Martin, B.—I am of the same opinion. I agree that the word "deposition" in sect. 2 means something in writing. The definition of the word in Webster's Dictionary gives the ordinary understanding of it. The two Acts (7 & 8 Vict. c. 101 and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 10) are to be read together, and so reading them they satisfy me that that is the meaning of it. The 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 2, contains a positive enactment that if the application be made before the birth of the child, the woman shall make a deposition on oath stating who is the father of the child. And it seems to me, from the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 10, s. 1, that it is to be a statement on oath taken down in writing; and although the woman refuses to sign it, yet, if the magistrate signs it, that would be a deposition within the meaning of this enactment. I think, therefore, the proceeding was irregular, and that a written statement of what was deposed to by the woman on oath ought to have been drawn up to the like effect of the form in the schedule to the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 10. The defendant, however, appeared to the summons and made no objection to the irregularity. It was competent to the defendant to waive the objection, and he did so, and upon such waiver the magistrate had lawful authority to hear and decide upon the summons. They were then acting judicially, sufficiently so to make a man guilty of perjury who wilfully swore falsely upon a matter material to the issue then before them.

Bramwell, B.—I am of the same opinion.

Byles, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that all the matters necessary to give the justices jurisdiction concur in this case. The parties were present at the hearing of the summons within the magistrates' jurisdiction. There had been an application for the summons; the summons had been issued; the defendant appeared to it, and committed wilful false perjury at the hearing of it. I agree that the word "deposition" means a statement of evidence reduced into writing in the ordinary form. But 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 3 varies this in the case where the appearance is after the birth of the child, and directs the justices merely to hear the evidence. To take the deposition of the woman as required by sect. 2, and to hear the evidence as directed by sect. 3, are in my opinion two distinct things. The summons, however, is only necessary to bring the putative father into court; and when he is in court the justices have jurisdiction to hear and decide the case, and any irregularity in the issuing of such summons is cured by the appearance.

Blackburn, J.—I am of the same opinion. On the construction of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 2, I think that the meaning of the words, "shall make a deposition or oath" is that the evidence shall be taken on oath, and taken down in writing under the sanction of the magistrate. But whether such deposition is to be signed by the witness and afterwards signed by the magistrate is a matter which we need not now consider. I doubt whether the statute is anything more than directory as to the matters required by sect. 2, for there are no words to oust the justices of all jurisdiction in case the requisitions are not complied with. The magistrate would be justified in refusing to issue a summons if the directions of the statute are not followed, but an order made on a summons after appearance would be good, notwithstanding such irregularity. The case of Reg v. Berry, which is undistinguishable, concludes this case, for it was there held that all irregularities in the issuing of the summons are cured by waiver. When a special jurisdiction is conferred by statute pro hac vice, proof must be given that it has been properly exercised in every particular; but where the jurisdiction created is large, and the court has a general jurisdiction over many things, though its decision may be quashed in a particular matter, yet the jurisdiction to hear the matter remains. Take for example the case of an indictment tried in one county, and the offence was committed in another county, and the conviction therefore quashed for error in fact, yet I should be very sorry to say that perjury could not be assigned upon wilfully false evidence given on the trial.

Conviction affirmed.

Attorney for the prisoner, S. Leech, Derby.

(Before Bovill, C.J., Martin, B., Byles, J., Bramwell, B., and Blackburn, J.)

Reg. v. White and others.

Parent and child—Abandonment and exposure—Father's duty—24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 27.

A mother of a child under two years of age brought it and left it outside the father's house (she not living with her husband, the father of it). He was inside the house, and she called out, "Bill, here's your child; I can't keep it. I am gone." The prisoner some time afterwards came out, stepped over the child, and went away. About an hour and a half afterwards the father's attention was again called to the child still lying in the road. His answer was, it must bide there for what he knew, and then the mother ought to be taken up for the murder of it. When his attention was called to it again, he said he should not touch it; those that put it there must come and take it. Later on the child was found by the police in the road, cold and stiff; but by care it was restored to animation.

Held, that the father was properly convicted of abandoning and exposing the child within the meaning of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 27.

Case reserved for the opinion of this court at the Winchester Michaelmas Quarter Sessions 1870.

The prisoners were indicted at the quarter sessions for the county of Southampton, held at Winchester on the 19th Oct. 1870, under the Act 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 27, for that they did on the 1st Sept. 1870, unlawfully and wilfully abandon and expose a certain child, then being under the age of two years, whereby the life of the said child was endangered.

It appeared, from the evidence, that Emily White (the wife of William White), who was not included in the indictment, was the mother of the child, which was about nine months old at the time mentioned in the indictment. On that day she had an interview with her husband, from whom she had been living apart since the 11th Aug. of the same year, and asked him if he intended to give her money or victuals; he passed by her without answering, and went into his house, this was about 7 p.m. His mother, the prisoner Maria White, shut the wicket of the garden, and forbade his wife from coming in. The wife then went to the door of the house, laid the child down close to the door, and called out, "Bill, here's your child; I can't keep it. I am gone." She left, and was seen no more that night. Shortly after, William White came out of the house, stepped over the child, and went away. About 8.30 p.m. two witnesses found the child lying in the road outside the wicket of the garden, which was a few yards from the house door; it was dressed in short clothes, with nothing on its head; they remained at the spot till about 10 p.m., when William White came home. They told him that his child was lying in the road. His answer was, it must bide there for what he knew, and then the mother ought to be taken up for the murder of it.

Another witness, Maria Thorn (the mother of his wife) deposed also to the fact that about the same time, in answer to her observation that he ought to take the child in, he said, he should not touch it; those that put it there must come and take it. She then went into the house. About 11 p.m. one of the two witnesses went for a police constable, and returned with him to the place about 1 a.m., when the child was found lying on its face in the road, with its clothes blown over its waist, and cold and stiff. The constable took charge of it, and by his care it was restored to animation. At 4.30 a.m., the constable went to the house, and asked William White if he knew where his child was. He said "No." On being asked if he knew it was in the road, he answered "Yes." It appeared that, during the time which elapsed between William White leaving his house about 7 p.m, and his return about 10 p.m., he had been to the police constable stationed at Beaulieu, and told him that there had been a disturbance between him and his wife, and wished him to come up and settle it, but he did not say anything about the child.

The prisoner's counsel objected that upon these facts there was no evidence of abandonment or exposure under the Act by William White.

He also objected that there was no evidence against John White and Maria White.

The court were of opinion that there was no evidence against the two last-named prisoners, but overruled the objection as to William White, as to whom the case was left to the jury, who found him guilty.

The court, upon the urgent appeal of the prisoner's counsel, consented to reserve a case for the opinion of the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved, and the question is whether the prisoner William White was or was not properly convicted upon the facts as above stated.

Judgment upon the conviction was postponed, and the prisoner remitted to prison, to be discharged on recognisance of bail to appear to receive judgment when called upon. The prisoner was subsequently admitted to bail, and released.

W. Clement D. Esdaile.

No counsel appeared on either side.

Bovill, C.J.—I am of opinion that the conviction is right, and ought to be confirmed. The prisoner was indicted for unlawfully and wilfully abandoning and exposing a child under two years of age, whereby the life of the child was endangered. The child was the child of the prisoner, and the facts are: [His Lordship stated the facts, and continued:] On these facts it was objected that there was no evidence of abandonment or exposure within the meaning of the statute. The words of the statute are "whosoever shall unlawfully abandon or expose any child, being under the age of two years, whereby the life of such child shall be endangered, or the health of such child shall have been, or shall be likely to be permanently injured, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor." And if either branch of the section is proved, or there is evidence in support of it, the conviction was right. Now, the father was entitled to the custody and possession of the child, and he was entitled to exercise control over it, and was bound to maintain and provide for it, and to protect it, both morally and legally. The prisoner was aware that the child was lying at his door, and there was clear evidence that he knew it was there, and therefore he had the opportunity of protecting it. The only question is, was there evidence for the jury in support of the conviction; and I am clearly of opinion that there was evidence on which the jury might, and ought to have convicted the prisoner. The child was lying in the road exposed, and its life was endangered, and in consequence of the exposure it was nearly dying. The relationship of a father as regards his duty to his child is different from that of any other person, and in this case there was abundant evidence both of exposure and abandonment of the child by the prisoner.

MARTIN, B.—I concur. At one time I had some doubt upon the construction of the statute. The obvious and plain meaning of the enactment struck me at first as being that the person guilty of the offence of abandoning and exposing a child should have been in the actual possession of the child. But there is no doubt that a father is bound to maintain and support his child; and, upon the facts in this case, it may be said, without straining the language of the statute, that the prisoner was guilty of abandoning and exposing his child within the meaning of the statute.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. If some one who had had the child to nurse had brought it and left it, as was done in this case, no one could have doubted that the prisoner under the circumstances had abandoned and exposed it; and it is just the same now, though the mother brought the child.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree that the other prisoners were entitled to be acquitted although they had not performed their duty, for their duty was one of imperfect obligation. But the father is in a different position: he is under a legal obligation to support and provide for his child, and he would be guilty of murder, or manslaughter at the least, if in consequence of his neglect of duty the death of his child were to follow. It does not depend on the father having the actual physical custody of his child; for as soon as he knows that his child is in a position of danger, as in this case, and he neglects his duty, he has abandoned and exposed his child within the meaning of the Act.

CHANNELL, B.—I represent my brother Byles, who formed one of the Court when this case was called on, and I am authorised by him to say that he agrees in the judgment of the other members of the court. For myself I may say that I have had an opportunity of consulting with the other members of the Court, and that I am of the same opinion.

Conviction affirmed.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by H. LEIGH, and H. F. POOLEY, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Wednesday, May 3, 1871.

CORNEWALL v. DAWSON.

Demise of lands and exclusive right of sporting—Covenant by grantee not to permit rabbits to become so numerous as to cause damage—Grantee prevented by tenants from going on the lands—Sporting rights not reserved by grantor—Grantee's inability to perform covenant—Action by grantor for breach—Grantee's failure to perform covenant caused by grantor's default—Plea in answer to action—Consideration—Covenant—Pleading.

Declaration, that the plaintiff and other persons, by indenture, demised to the defendant certain lands of the plaintiff, and also the sole right of shooting, &c., in, upon, and within all the lands of the plaintiff in S.. for twenty-one years, and the defendant by the said deed covenanted with the plaintiff that he would not permit the rabbits to become so numerous as to cause damage to any of the farm tenants of the said lands. Breach assigned, that the defendant, after the said indenture and during the said term, did, contrary to the said covenant, permit the rabbits to become so numerous as to cause damage to divers of the said farm tenants, whereby they were greatly damaged, and the plaintiff became liable to them for such damage, &c.

Plea, that at the time of the said demise, and thence hitherto, parts of the said lands, in, upon, and within which the plaintiff and the said other persons demised to the plaintiff the sole right of shooting, &c., as in the declaration mentioned, were and have been respectively held by and in the possession of certain persons, as tenants to the plaintiff and the said other persons, without there being reserved to the plaintiff and the said other persons, or any of them, the right of shooting, &c., or otherwise killing rabbits, in, upon, or within the same respectively. And the plaintiff and the said other persons had not, nor had any of them, at the time of the said demise or at any time since, any right or power to demise to the defendant the right of shooting, &c., rabbits on the said parts of the said lands; and that the defendant has never had, or been able to have or enjoy, the right of shooting, &c., rabbits in, upon, or within the said parts of the said lands, and has been wholly hindered and prevented, by the respective tenants thereof, from shooting, &c., rabbits in, upon, and within the same; and that the alleged breaches of covenant in the declaration assigned, are breaches arising from and consequent upon rabbits being permitted, by the respective tenants of the said lands, to become so numerous as to cause damage as in the declaration alleged, and not from any default by or on the part of the defendant:

Held, on demurrer, by the Court of Exchequer (Kelly, C.B., and Martin, Channell, and Cleasby, BB.) to be a good plea in answer to the plaintiff's action. The plaintiff not having, in the lease to his tenants, reserved the right of shooting over the lands, had no power to authorise the defendant to enter thereon for the purpose of shooting, and so was himself the cause of the defendant's breach of covenant, by having rendered it impossible for the defendant to enter upon the lands for the purpose of performing it.

By his declaration in this case the plaintiff charged that by indenture, made the 18th April 1866, between Henry Hood, first part; William Cann, second part; Thomas Shapter, Lionel Roberts, and Charles Henry Kingdon, third part; the plaintiff, fourth part; Sir Thomas Dyke Acland, Samuel Trehawke Kekewich, and Sir John Buller Duckworth, fifth part; and the defendant, sixth part; it was and is witnessed that the plaintiff, and the said persons, parties thereto of the first and second parts, demised to the defendant certain messuages and lands belonging to the plaintiff, "and also the sole and exclusive right of shooting, sporting, and fishing in and upon, and within all the estate and lands of the plaintiff, situate in the county of Salop," for twenty-one years, from 25th March 1866; and the defendant, by the said deed, amongst other things, covenanted with the plaintiff that he "would not permit the rabbits and hares to become so numerous as to cause damage to any of the farm-tenants of the said lands and estate, and would, in the exercise of the rights thereby granted, do as little damage as possible to the property of the said farm tenants;" assigning, for breach, that the defendant, after the making of the said indenture, and during the said period of twenty-one years, did, contrary to the said covenant, permit the rabbits to become so numerous as to cause damage to divers of the farm tenants of the said lands and estates, whereby they were greatly damaged, and the plaintiff became liable to them for such damage; whereby, also, the plaintiff was greatly injured in his interest in the said lands and estate; and by reason whereof also one of the tenants, to wit, one Hoole, the farm tenant of one of the farms, called Delbury farm, part of the said estate, was so damaged that he gave notice to quit the said farm, and it became necessary to let the same to him at a lower rent than it otherwise would have been let at; and whereby also the said estate was much damaged, and the drains thereof were burrowed under and broken up, and obstructed.

The defendant by his third plea to the said declaration, pleaded that, at the time of the said alleged demise, and from thence hitherto, certain parts of the said lands of the plaintiff, in and pon and within which the plaintiff, and the said other persons, demised to the defendant the sole and exclusive right of shooting, sporting, and fishing, as in the declaration mentioned, were and have been respectively held by and in the possession of certain persons, as tenants thereof to the plaintiff and the said other persons, without there being reserved to the plaintiff and the said other persons or any of them, the right of shooting or sporting for, or otherwise taking, killing or destroying rabbits in upon or within the same respectively, and the plaintiff and the said other persons had not, nor had any of them, at the time of the said alleged demise, or at any time since, any right or power to demise to the defendant the right of shooting or sporting for, or otherwise taking, killing or destroying rabbits on the said parts of the said lands of the plaintiff. And that since the said alleged demise the defendant has never had or been able to have or enjoy the right of shooting or sporting for, or otherwise taking, killing, or destroying rabbits in, upon, or within the said parts of the said lands of the plaintiff, and has been wholly hindered and prevented by the said respective tenants thereof from shooting or sporting for or otherwise taking, killing, or destroying rabbits in, upon, and within the same; and that the alleged breaches of covenant in the declaration assigned are breaches of covenant arising from and consequent upon rabbits being permitted and allowed, by the respective tenants of the said parts of the said lands of the plaintiff, to become so numerous as to cause damage, as in the declaration alleged, and not from any default by or on the part of the defendant.

Replication. Issue taken and joined on each of the defendant's pleas; and demurrer and joinder in demurrer, to the third plea; the objection taken to the said third plea, as marked in the margin, being that the covenant is legal, binding, and absolute, and the breach not excused; and that, if the tenants will not allow the defendant to destroy the rabbits, he must take the consequences of not protecting himself against such a contingency.

The plaintiff's points for argument: First, the covenant is absolute; secondly, the defendant was bound to obtain the consent of the tenants; thirdly, prevention by a stranger is no answer to an action for breach of covenant; fourthly, the tenants may have had a remedy against the plaintiff for rabbit damage, and may have refused consent in order to make claims on the plaintiff, and the very object of the covenant may have been either to protect the plaintiff from or to indemnify him against such claims; fifthly, the defendant could easily have protected himself against the consequence of prevention, by inserting in the covenants an exception in his favour, when he should be prevented by tenants, if it had been the intention of the parties that, under such circumstances he should not be liable; sixthly, even as an equitable plea the facts would be much too shortly stated to show that the defendant has an equity; seventhly, if any of the following matters are material for his defence, the defendant should have alleged them, and they are not to be assumed in his favour: namely, (1) That the preventing tenants held under leases granted by the plaintiff; (2) that the defendant could not, by making some reasonable compensation, have obtained the consent of the tenants.

The defendant's points for argument. First, that the defendant is not liable on his covenant for damage arising from, and consequent upon, rabbits being permitted and allowed by the tenants of the lands, on which he never had the right of shooting, or sporting for, or otherwise taking, killing, or destroying rabbits, to become so numerous as to cause damage, as in the declaration mentioned, and not from any default by or on the part of the defendant; secondly, that it was in consequence of the plaintiff and the other lessors having no right or power to demise to the defendant the right of shooting or sporting for, or otherwise taking, killing, or destroying rabbits on the parts of the lands, in and upon and within which they professed to demise to the defendants the sole and exclusive right of shooting, and sporting, and fishing, that the alleged damage arose. Thirdly, that it was in consequence of the acts and defaults of the plaintiff and the other lessors that the said damage arose; fourthly, that the defendant's covenant is not absolute, but dependent upon his having the right of shooting and sporting which the plaintiffs and the other lessors professed to demise to him.

Harington (with him H. James, Q. C), argued on the part of the plaintiff, and submitted that the plea demurred to furnished no answer to the declaration. The declaration was founded upon and set out an absolute covenant by the defendant and a breach of it; and the plea, if it showed any answer at all, amounted simply to this, that the defendant was prevented from performing it by the acts of strangers. There is no averment in the plea that the acts done were done by the plaintiff or by his direction, and no connection whatever is shown between the plaintiff and the acts of the tenants. It is no answer to an action for not keeping down the rabbits on the parts of the estate demised to him, that they were bred and increased on some other land. The covenant is either a covenant to keep down the rabbits upon the whole of the plaintiff's estates, or upon the estate over which the right of sporting is demised. Suppose a grant of sporting rights over Blackacre and Whiteacre, and a covenant by the grantee to keep down the rabbits generally, and then the grantee finds that he cannot get upon Whiteacre to shoot; it would be no answer to an action on the covenant providing against injury to Blackacre, to say that the rabbits increased in Whiteacre owing to the act of some third person. The contract being absolute, it became the defendant's duty to take all the necessary means to enable him to perform it, as by applying to the tenants for leave to enter on the lands to shoot. He chose to enter into an absolute covenant with open eyes, and must perform it, or take the consequences. McNeill v. Reid (9 Bing. 68), is an analogous case, where it was held that damages might be recovered upon an agreement by one of several partners to introduce a stranger into the firm, though the agreement be entered into without the knowledge of the firm. Tindal, C.J., in his judgment there, said, "Two objections have been made to the plaintiff's right to retain his verdict; one, that the plaintiff was aware of the fact that other persons were already in partnership with the defendant, consequently that the defendant could not, without the consent of such persons, force a stranger into the firm; and that the plaintiff cannot seek to enforce a contract which at the time he knew to be impossible. But this is no answer in the mouth of the defendant, for he should have secured the consent of his partner before he ventured to enter into such a contract, or is bound at all events to obtain it afterwards." So here, if the consent of the tenants was necessary to the performance of the contract, the defendant should have obtained it, either before or after entering into the covenant, and their refusing consent is no answer in his mouth to the plaintiff's action. The case of The Dean and Chapter of Bristol v. Jones and others (1 El. & El. 484; 28 L. J. 201, Q. B.) is also an authority in the plaintiff's favour. There a lessee had covenanted, at his own costs, to repair and keep in proper repair the demised premises, "having or taking upon the said premises, competent and sufficient housebote, &c., for the doing thereof without commiting any waste;" and it was held, in an action for not keeping the premises in repair, that the covenant to repair was absolute, with a licence to the lessee to take competent and sufficient housebote, &c., and that the finding such housebote, &c. on the premises was not a condition precedent to the lessee's liability to repair. In the present case the demise is not by the plaintiff alone, but by him and five other persons. The covenant is an absolute covenant with one of them, namely, the plaintiff. The plea is that the said persons had no power to demise, not that the plaintiff had not. The covenant is shown to be separate from and altogether independent of the demise. The demise of the game here is not the sole consideration, and even if the plaintiff has acted wrongly the defendant is not without remedy, and he can bring a cross action if he has been prevented by the plaintiff from being able to perform the absolute covenant into which he has entered: See Boon v. Eyre, cited in notes to Pordage v. Cole (1 Wms. Saund. 320 c., 320 d., 320 e.) He cited also Spicer and others v. Barnard (28 L. J. 189, M. C.).

Kemplay (for the defendant), contra, was not called on by the court to support the plea.

KELLY, C.B.—I am clearly of opinion that the defendant is entitled to the judgment of the court. The circumstances of the case are as follows: The plaintiff, together with five other persons, by deed granted to the defendant the right to enter upon and shoot and sport over a certain number of closes or lands—for illustration's sake, let me say over twenty closes of land—belonging to the plaintiff, and by the same deed the defendant covenanted with the plaintiff, and the plaintiff alone, that he would not permit the rabbits to become so numerous, or, in other words, that he would kill such quantities of them, upon these twenty closes of land, as would prevent their increasing in such numbers as to do damage to any of the tenants of the said land. Then comes the defendant's covenant, as correctly set forth in the declaration, and the plaintiff proceeds to assign a breach of it in these terms: "Yet the defendant, after the making of the said indenture, and during the said period of twenty-one years, did, contrary to the said covenant, permit the rabbits to become so numerous as to cause damage to divers of the farm tenants of the said lands and estates, whereby they were greatly damaged, and the plaintiff became liable to them for such damage, and whereby also the plaintiff was greatly injured in his interest in the said estate, and by reason whereof also one of the tenants gave notice to quit." That is, in effect, saying (without stating where or in what part or parcel the breach was committed), "I granted to you a right of shooting over twenty closes, and you covenanted to keep down the rabbits, and to kill as many as might be found anywhere on these twenty closes, so as to prevent them from doing damage to the tenants, or to any of the closes in question;" and then the breach assigned is, "you have not kept down the rabbits" —that is to say, "there are certain closes in which rabbits existed, and you have permitted them to increase in such numbers, by failing to destroy them; that the result has been that they have so increased as to do damage to one or more of these closes." Now, what is the defendant's answer? [Reads portion of the third plea.] That is to say, you, the plaintiff, granted to me the right of sporting over twenty closes, and as to ten of them they were in the hands of tenants, in whose leases or agreements there was no reservation of the right of sporting, therefore you had no power to grant to me any such right, and the consequence is that I have been unable to exercise the right, and to enter upon these closes, or to kill a single rabbit there. Now let us see what follows, "And the alleged breaches of covenant, in the declaration assigned, are breaches of covenant arising from and consequent upon rabbits being permitted and allowed by the respective tenants of the said parts of the said lands of the plaintiff, to become so numerous as to cause damage as in the declaration alleged, and not from any default by, or on the part of the defendant;" which is in fact saying that the damage complained of, and the alleged breach of covenant, consist in this, that inasmuch as I was unable to enter upon these lands and to kill any rabbits there, the rabbits have been permitted by the tenants to increase so as to do the damage of which you complain, I having been unable to prevent that damage, through my being rendered unable to perform my covenant, by your not having any power to grant to me the right, which you pretended to grant to enter upon these lands. It is you, the plaintiff, therefore, and the other persons who concurred with you in the grant, who have deprived me of the power of performing my covenant, which could only have been performed by my killing rabbits in the very closes which you had no power to authorise me to enter. It seems to me to be substantially similar to a demise of a house for a year, where the lessee covenants that he will within the first three months paint and paper the house, but on proceeding to enter, in order to perform his covenant, he finds that the house belongs to a stranger, and that the lessor has no title, and so he, the covenantor, has no power to perform his covenant; can it be gravely argued that an action for breach of covenant could be maintained, and damages recovered in such a case, where the failure to perform the covenant is caused by the default of the plaintiff himself? If that be so, what difference would it make that there was a demise of two houses, and a covenant to paint and paper both of them, and on the covenantor proceeding to take possession, he is unable to enter into one of the houses so demised, in order to perform his covenant, but he enters into the other, and performs his covenant in respect of that one. What difference would it make that he was able to perform his covenant, in part, if he was not able to perform it wholly? If A. enters into a covenant with B. to do a certain act, and B. renders it impossible for him to do the act, the covenant is at an end. If A. says to B. you may go and kill as many rabbits as you please over any land belonging to me, provided you engage to kill them in such numbers that they shall do no damage to the growing crops, and when B. proposes to enter upon the lands in order to fulfil his engagement he finds that A. had no power to grant him a licence to enter on the lands, and that he would be a trespasser if he did enter, A. would in that case have rendered it utterly impossible that B. should perform his engagement. I am therefore clearly of opinion that, not only upon legal principle, but as a matter of common sense and understanding, the defendant is entitled to the judgment of the court.

MARTIN, B.—I am of opinion that the plea is a good plea; I thought so when I first read it, and I am of the same opinion still.

CHANNELL, B.—I am also of opinion that the plea is a good plea. The question is, whether the defendant was relieved from his contract by a state of facts suggested, which would go to show that as to some of the closes the plaintiff might have no title. This is not an action for any specific sum of money, but to recover damages for the particular breach which the plaintiff has proceeded upon. I agree with Mr. Harington, that possibly the plaintiff might have declared without noticing the particular terms of the demise, that is, he might have said that by a certain indenture, of a certain date, made between certain parties, the defendant entered into the covenant mentioned in the declaration, leaving out all reference to the particulars of the demise. If the particulars of the demise were important to the defendant's case, there would be nothing to prevent his introducing into his plea that which the plaintiff had left out of the declaration. The defendant has not put into his plea the contents of the demise, but has rather stated two facts, one of which is, that as to certain closes, or certain parts of the lands, over which the right of sporting was intended to be demised, the plaintiff had no title or authority to demise such right, not having, in the leases of such closes, previously let to his tenants, reserved any right of entering upon their lands for sporting purposes. I think that in substance, therefore, taking the whole together, it involves this—a demise of the estate, coupled with a right of sporting over certain lands, the lessee covenanting to keep down rabbits on the lands of the plaintiff, but as to a part of the lands, in respect of which a breach is alleged, the plaintiff had not, nor had any of the other five persons joining in the lease, any right to give the defendant an opportunity of doing that which he covenanted to do, or which the covenant required him to do. Now, it is quite true that in a contract under seal you need not prove the consideration; but if the defendant is in a position to show that there was a consideration for a covenant, of which covenant he is alleged to have committed a breach, which consideration has wholly failed and was false, that I think is an answer to the action. The defendant, I think, does show that. The only breaches here are breaches, not in respect of all the lands, but in respect of that part of the lands (including nominally the right to sport) as to which the plaintiff had no right to grant the privilege and authority to enter. The defendant has been prevented by the plaintiff not having previously reserved to himself the privilege which alone could have enabled the defendant to do that which he is charged with not doing. I think, therefore, the plea is good, and is an answer to the action.

CLEASBY, B.—This is an action upon a contract, and the contract is to keep down the rabbits on a particular estate, which is a perfectly legal contract. The breach here is, not keeping down the rabbits upon the estate according to the terms of the covenant. In considering the plea, we must look at the whole declaration, and not only at the breach. The defendant has a right to import into his plea the statement contained in the declaration. The statement in the declaration is that this was a grant and demise by the plaintiff and others of the right of sporting over several farms. The difficulty which, to a certain extent, I felt on the plea was that it does not allege that the defendant did keep down the rabbits upon that part of the land over which he had the right of sporting, and that he kept them down without reference to where they came from, or how they came. He does not say, "I did keep these rabbits down, and perform my covenant, in that part of the land, and as to the other part you had previously dealt with the land in such a way that I could not do it. You undertook to provide me with the means, and the only means, of performing my covenant, namely, the right to go upon the land, and so far as I could go upon the land I completely performed my covenant, because I did keep these rabbits down in a certain portion of the land, but as regards the rest of the land you, by your own act, had deprived me of the only means of doing so." That, I apprehend, would have been a good plea, and the question is, whether or not the plea amounts to that. Now, with regard to these words (for all the introductory part is no answer), "that the alleged breaches in the covenant in the declaration assigned, are breaches of covenant arising from and consequent upon rabbits being permitted and allowed by the respective tenants of the said parts of the said lands of the plaintiff to become so numerous as to cause damage." I think that, stopping there they are certainly not equivalent to what I have suggested. They do not amount to an allegation that he has kept down the rabbits upon that part of the estate where he had a right to go, however strong the inference in that direction might be; but the plea goes on to say, "and not from any default by or on the part of the defendant," and that I think is equivalent to saying that he was prevented altogether from going there. I cannot, therefore, say that I have any reason for differing from the rest of the court in this matter.

CROWN CASES RESERVED.

Reported by John Thompson, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Saturday, April 22, 1871.

(Before Bovill, C.J., Martin and Bramwell, BB., Byles and Blackburn, JJ.)

Reg. v. Wilmot.

False pretences — Remoteness of the pretence — Evidence.

An indictment for false pretences charged that the defendant falsely pretended that he had a lot of trucks of coal at a railway station on demurrage, and that he required forty coal bags.

The evidence was that defendant saw prosecutor and gave him his card, "J. W. and Co., timber and coal merchants," &c., and said that he was largely in the coal and timber way, and inspected some coal bags, but objected to the price. The next day he called again, showed prosecutor a lot of correspondence, and said that he had a lot of trucks of coal at the railway station under demurrage, and that he wanted some coal bags immediately. Prosecutor had only forty bags ready, and it was arranged that defendant was to have them, and pay for them in a week. They were delivered to defendant, and prosecutor said he let the defendant have the bags in consequence of his having the trucks of coals under demurrage at the station.

There was evidence as to the defendant having taken premises, and having a small business in coal, but he had no trucks of coal on demurrage at the station.

The jury convicted the prisoner, and on questions reserved, this court held, that the false pretences charged was not too remote to support the indictment, and that the evidence was sufficient to sustain it.

Case reserved for the opinion of this court at the general sessions of the peace, held at Exeter, in and for the county of Devon, on Tuesday the 14th Feb. 1871.

The material part of the indictment against him charged, "That he, on the 20th Dec. 1870, contriving and intending to cheat and defraud, did unlawfully, knowingly, and designedly, falsely pretend to one Joshua Caryl Clogg, that he, the said John Wilmot, was a timber and coal merchant, dealer in seeds, guano, and other manures, farm implements, &c., at 3, Bartholomew-street, Exeter, and that his yard and stores were in the Commercial-road, meaning in the city of Exeter. And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath aforesaid, further present that, on the 21st Dec. in the year aforesaid, the said John Wilmot did unlawfully, knowingly, and designedly, falsely pretend to the said Joshua Caryl Clogg that he the said John Wilmot had a lot of trucks of coal at Queen-street Station, meaning thereby the Exeter Station of the London and South-Western Railway, and that the said trucks were under demurrage, and that he, the said John Wilmot, required forty coal bags."

The indictment then negatived the alleged false pretences in the usual way.

It appeared from the evidence of the prosecutor, Joshua Caryl Clogg, that he is a bag maker, in business at St. Thomas, in the county of Devon.

On the 20th Dec. 1870, the prisoner called at prosecutor's shop and gave him a card, on which was printed, "J. Wilmot and Co., timber and coal merchants, dealers in seeds, guano, and other manures, farm implements, &c., 3, Bartholomew-street, Exeter. Yards and stores, Commercial-road." He said, "That he was on largely in the coal and timber way," and asked to see some bags. Prosecutor showed prisoner some bags, but prisoner objected to the price and went away, saying that he would call again. The next day (Dec. 21st) prisoner came to the prosecutor again, showed prosecutor a lot of correspondence, and said that he had a lot of trucks of coal at the Queen-street Station under demurrage, and that he wanted some bags immediately. He also asked prosecutor to recommend him a carter. Prosecutor recommended a Mr. Newcombe. Prisoner then left, saying he would go to Newcombe, and returned soon afterwards, saying that he had made an arrangement with Newcombe, and wanted eighty bags. Prosecutor had only forty bags ready. It was then arranged between the prisoner and the prosecutor that the prisoner should have forty bags, and that he should pay for them in a week. The prisoner then left. On Friday, the 23rd Dec., the younger Newcombe called, and the prosecutor delivered the forty bags to him. The prosecutor stated that he let the prisoner have the bags in consequence of his having the trucks under demurrage at the Queen-street Station.

On cross-examination the prosecutor said that the prisoner took away the bags three days after he bought them. He also said that he had seen prisoner's advertisements in the newspapers, and that he had also seen a lease of premises in the Commercial-road from the town council of Exeter to the prisoner, and that before prisoner's arrest ent to the place, and found that the premises being repaired for the prisoner by the town cil; but he could not say what was the extent isoner's trade, or whether he had any business l. The prosecutor swore that the prisoner's and his statement that he had premises in the mercial-road, and that he was in trade there had fect whatever upon his (prosecutor's) mind, and he parted with his goods solely on the faith o ner's statement that he had coals under de- age. The prosecutor said that he knew that the bags were delivered prisoner twice called is shop while he was absent and saw his ecutor's) son about payment, and that he elf also called once at prisoner's house, and l that prisoner was out. Twenty of the bags d hold a ton of coals. Prosecutor further said oss-examination that he never sent in any bill e prisoner up to the time of his arrest, which place at Bartholomew-square, Exeter, on the an. 1871 under a warrant.

wcombe proved that prisoner came to his e on the 21st Dec., and stated to him also he had five or six trucks of coal under de- age at Queen-street station, and arranged him to send five or six carts on the following y (the 23rd Dec.) to remove it.

the next day (Dec. 22) prisoner came to New- e, and said that he should only want one cart orse. On Friday, the 23rd Dec., Newcombe's the younger Newcombe, accordingly met ner with a cart and horse. The prisoner then the younger Newcombe to the prosecutor's for ags, and as soon as he returned with them ner told him to go to Queen-street station, fterwards countermanded this, saying, "We o to St. David's first."

ordingly prisoner and the younger Newcombe first to the St. David's railway station. The David's station belongs to the Bristol and r Railway Company. The Queen-street n belongs to the South-Western Railway any.

the St. David's station the younger New- e by prisoner's order loaded two tons of coal the Patent Fuel Company's stores, and de- d it at various houses in Exeter, under the ion of a man named Eden, whom prisoner with him. The prisoner then took the ger Newcombe, with the cart, to the Queen- railway station. There, by prisoner's direc- a ton of coal was loaded from a truck into which the prisoner had obtained from prose- , and was carted to the prisoner's premises in ommercial-road, where it and the bags were Durston proved that the two loads of coal l by the younger Newcombe from the St. l's station were sold by him to the prisoner e 22nd Dec. The prisoner told him that he he bags from Mr. Clogg, and had paid 8l. for , and had been allowed 10s. discount.

cross-examination this witness said that he partner named Broomfield, and that he knew Broomfield had sold prisoner some coal about ime. A coal merchant named David Perry, firm had trucks of coal at the Queen-street n, said that prisoner called upon him and d to buy some coal, on and previously to th, and that on the 22nd Dec. he sold prisoner ons of coal; consequently, on Dec. 23rd he d the ton carted away by the younger New- e to be taken. He also knew that prisoner had been corresponding with the Bristol and Exeter Railway Company about a special rate for the carriage of coals, and had seen a letter from the company to the prisoner on the subject. He also knew that the town council of Exeter had let premises in the Commercial-road, Exeter, to the prisoner. Eden, the man who accompanied the younger Newcombe when he delivered the coal taken from the St. David's station, proved that it was delivered at houses where orders had been previously obtained for it by him on prisoner's behalf, and that when later in the day, on Dec. 22nd, he came to the Queen-street station, prisoner asked whether he had any more orders, he said "No;" and prisoner then pointed to the truck from which a load was subsequently taken, and said, "That's my truck, I will have twenty bags out of it and take them to my stores."

In cross-examination Eden said prisoner had not been paid for the coal delivered at houses in Exeter on the 23rd Dec. Coals were hard to get just at that time; and several ships had been prevented from coming up the River Exe by the ice. A warehouse- man from the Queen-street Station said that there never was any coal at that station consigned to "J. Willmot," or "J. Willmot and Co.," and that there were no coals at the station under demurrage on Dec. 23rd.

The manager of the mines department of the Bristol and Exeter Railway gave similar evi- dence, except that he could not say whether or not there was coal at St. David's station under demurrage.

In cross-examination both these witnesses said that they should know nothing about goods till they actually arrived.

At the close of the case for the prosecution the prisoner's counsel objected, first, that under the circumstances of the case the statement by prisoner that he had coals at the Queen-street station under demurrage was too remote to support an indict- ment; and, secondly, that such statement had not been proved to be untrue.

The court overruled both objections. No wit- nesses were called for the defence.

In summing up, the chairman told the jury that the only false pretence on which they could con- vict was prisoner's statement that he had coals at the Queen-street station under demurrage; and that in order to convict, they must be satisfied that the prosecutor, on the faith of that representation, parted with his bags, and also be satisfied that the statement was false, and that the goods were obtained with intent to defraud.

The jury found the prisoner guilty, but recom- mended him to mercy. The prisoner was then sentenced to six months' imprisonment with hard labour; but the court reserved the questions raised by the counsel. The prisoner remains in custody.

The questions for the consideration of the court are:

First, whether, under the circumstances of the case, prisoner's statement that he had coal at the Queen-street station under demurrage is, or is not, too remote to support an indictment; and secondly, whether there was sufficient evidence of its being false to go to the jury.

If the court shall be of opinion that the false pretence in question was not too remote, and that there was sufficient evidence of its being false to go to the jury, then the conviction will be confirmed. But if the court shall be of opinion either that the false pretence relied on was too remote to support an indictment, or that there was not sufficient evidence of its being false to go to the jury, then the conviction will be quashed.

Morley, Chairman.

G. Lewis for the prisoner.—The conviction was wrong. Here the false pretence that the prisoner had coals at the Queen-street station under demurrage was not sufficiently connected with the obtaining of the coal bags from the prosecutor to support the conviction. It amounted to no more than this, that the prisoner represented himself, as he was in fact, to be a coal merchant, and that he required the coal bags in the way of his business. The mere fact of not having coals on demurrage at the station was not sufficient to found the charge of false pretences, for he had coals there, as was proved. [Blackburn, J.—In Rex v. Villeneuve (2 East P. C. 830), where the defendant falsely pretended to J. N. that he was entrusted by the Duke de Lauzan to take some horses from Ireland to London for him, and that he had been detained by contrary winds, and had spent all his money, and thereby induced J. N. to advance him money; this was holden to be a false pretence within the Act. Why is not the present case within the Act?] No credit was given on account of this statement about the coal on demurrage. [Bramwell, B.—Is that so? Does not the representation amount to this? "I am a person of such credit that persons send me trucks of coal."] In Rex v. Johnson (1 L. T. Rep. N. S. 513; 2 Moo. C. C. 254), it was held where money was obtained by falsely pretending that the defendant intended to marry A., and wanted money for the wedding suit, that the case was not within the Act. [Martin, B.—The jury have found that the bags were obtained by the fraudulent representation that the prisoner had coals on demurrage at the station, and that the prisoner did not mean to pay for the bags. The only question is whether there was evidence for the jury.] The false representation was too remote. Where defendant represented himself to be a naval officer, and thereby induced the prosecutrix to contract to board and lodge him at a guinea per week, and so obtained various articles of food, it was held that the obtaining of the food was too remotely the result of the false pretences, and that a conviction could not be supported:

Reg. v. Gardner, Dears. & B. 40; 7 L. T. Rep. N.S. 471; Reg. v. Bryan, 2. Fos. & Fin. 567.

As to the second point, that there was no evidence to go to the jury. Here it is quite consistent with all the facts of the case that the bags were not obtained by means of this false representation:

Reg. v. Stone, 1 Fos. & Fin. 311.

H. Clark, for the prosecution, was not called upon to argue.

By the Court.—The conviction must be affirmed.

Reg. v. Balls.

Embezzlement—Charging a gross sum in indictment—Evidence—24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 71.

It was the duty of an agent and collector of a coal club to receive payments by small weekly instalments, and to send in weekly accounts on Tuesdays, and on each Tuesday to pay the gross amount received into the bank to the credit of the club.

An indictment charged the agent with embezzling 1*l.* 1*s.*, and evidence was given that during a certain week payments of ten smaller sums, making together 1*l.* 1*s.*, had been made to the agent, and that the prisoner failed to account for those sums, or for any specific sum of 1*l.* 1*s.*

There were two other counts containing charges of embezzlement of two other sums of 1*l.* 7*s.* and 1*l.* 5*s.*, and supported by similar evidence:

Held, that the indictment might properly charge the embezzlement of a gross sum, and be proved by evidence similar to the above, and that it was not necessary to charge the embezzlement of each particular sum composing the gross sum, and that although the evidence might show a large number of small sums embezzled, the prosecution was not to be confined to the proof of three of such small sums only.

Case reserved for the opinion of this court by Mr. Commissioner Kerr at the Central Criminal Court.

At a session of the Central Criminal Court, on Tuesday, the 2nd May 1871, Edmund Balls was tried before me on the following indictment:—

The first count charged "that he, being a member of a certain co-partnership of persons trading under the name, style, and title of the Alliance Industrial and Provident Coal Society (Limited), did on the 5th Dec. 1870 receive into his possession the sum of 1*l.* 1*s.* in money, for, and on the account of the said co-partnership, and fraudulently and feloniously did embezzle the said sum of money."

The second count charged him with having within six months from the offence in the first count, that is to say, on the 12th Dec., while he was a member of the said co-partnership, received on account of the said co-partnership the further sum of 1*l.* 7*s.*, and with having embezzled that sum.

The third count charged him with having within six months from the offences in the first and second counts, that is to say, on the 19th Dec., while he was a member of the said co-partnership, received on account of the said co-partnership the further sum of 1*l.* 5*s.*, and with having embezzled that sum.

It was proved that the prisoner was a shareholder in the society named; that he received dividends on his shares therein, and that he was also duly appointed an agent of the society, in which capacity it was part of his duty to collect moneys for the society in the manner hereinafter mentioned. He gave a bond for the faithful performance of his duties. It was his duty as such agent and collector to receive payments from numerous persons who bought coals from the society, for which they were to pay by weekly instalments. Of these payments, which were to be made weekly, it was his duty to send in weekly accounts on the Tuesday of every week. And it was his duty on the Tuesday of every week to pay the gross amount received by him in the course of the preceding week into a bank to the credit of the society.

The prisoner did in fact pay money into the bank to the credit of the society every week, both before, during, and after the time covered by the three several counts of the indictment. On some occasions he paid into the bank a larger sum than by his account of the previous week's collection he ought to have done.

To prove the allegation in the first count of the embezzlement of the sum of 1*l.* 1*s.* on the 5th Dec., it was proposed by the counsel for the prosecution to give evidence of ten different payments in the course of the week ending on such 5th Dec.; that these payments were made to the prisoner by ten different persons, and that the several small sums so paid to him amounted in the whole to 1*l.* 1*s.* It was also proposed to prove that neither in the prisoner's account, sent in by him on the 5th Dec., when he ought to have accounted for the previous week's collection, nor in any subsequent account did the prisoner account for those several sums, or any of them, nor for any specific sum of 1*l.* 1*s.*

To prove the allegation in the second count of the embezzlement of the sum of 1*l.* 7*s.* on the 12th Dec., it was proposed also to prove by ten different witnesses ten different payments in the course of the week ending on that day; that the several small sums so paid amounted in the whole to 1*l.* 7*s.*; and that neither in the prisoner's account sent in by him on the said 12th Dec., nor in any subsequent accounts, did the prisoner account for those several sums, or any of them, nor for any specific sum of 1*l.* 7*s.*

To prove the allegation in the third count of the embezzlement of the sum of 1*l.* 5*s.* on the 19th Dec., it was proposed, in like manner, to prove by eleven different witnesses eleven different payments in the course of the week ending on that day; that the several small sums so paid amounted in the whole to 1*l.* 5*s.*; and that neither in the prisoner's account sent in by him on the said 19th Dec., nor in any subsequent accounts, did the prisoner account for those several sums, or any of them, nor for any specific sum of 1*l.* 5*s.*

The prisoner's counsel, who was absent while the case was being opened to the jury, objected that the course proposed to be taken would be admitting evidence of thirty-one different acts of embezzlement upon one indictment, whereas the statute only permitted evidence to be given of three. He contended that the non-accounting for each of these thirty-one sums was a separate and distinct act of embezzlement, and that only three of those acts could properly be included in one indictment.

On the other hand, the counsel for the prosecution contended that as it was the prisoner's duty to account once a week only for what he had received during the preceding week, there were only three distinct non-accountings, and, therefore, only three distinct acts of embezzlement; that the act of embezzlement was not committed upon receipt of the money, but upon the non-accounting and non-payment of it, if the jury should find such non-accounting and non-payment to be fraudulent.

I expressed my intention to confine the evidence to three separate and distinct receipts of three of the small sums so received by the prisoner as aforesaid, and to the non-accounting for the same; but, being pressed by counsel for the prosecution, I admitted the evidence so proposed to be given of the receipt by the prisoner of the thirty-one different sums, and of his non-accounting for the same.

This evidence was accordingly given, and the jury found that in not paying over on the 5th, 12th, and 19th days of Dec. respectively each and every of the several small sums received by him in each and every of the several weeks ending on those days respectively, the prisoner did fraudulently embezzle each and every of the said several sums, and that those sums collectively amounted in each of those weeks respectively to the several sums named in the first, second, and third counts of the indictment.

Thereupon I directed a verdict of guilty to be recorded against the prisoner on each of these counts, subject to the opinion of the justices of either bench and barons of the Exchequer, whether the evidence on which the prisoner was so convicted was properly admissible. If such evidence was not admissible in point of law, then the conviction of the prisoner is to be quashed. If properly admitted, then the conviction is to stand.

I postponed judgment, and allowed the prisoner to go out on recognisance, with sureties for his appearance to hear judgment when called upon.

R. MALCOLM KERR,
One of the Commissioners of the Central Criminal Court.

Collins for the prisoner.—The evidence objected was wrongly admitted, and the conviction should therefore be quashed. The indictment is framed upon the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 116, s. 1, which enacts that a member of a copartnership who shall steal or embezzle any of the partnership property, may be tried and committed for the same as if he had not been a partner. Then the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 71, enables a prosecutor to charge three distinct acts of embezzlement in an indictment. It is not competent to charge the receipt of a gross sum of 100*l.*, and support that by proof of several acts of embezzlement. By the finding of the jury each of the thirty-one sums must be taken as the subject of a distinct embezzlement. [COCKBURN, C. J.—The jury also add, "And that those sums collectively amounted in each of those weeks respectively to the several sums named in the first, second, and third counts of the indictment."] The prosecutor ought to have been put to his election. In Reg. v. Williams (6 C. & P. 626), where the indictment charged the receipt of a gross sum on a particular day, and the evidence was that the money was received in different sums on different days; the prosecutor was put to his election, and directed to confine himself to one sum and one day. [COCKBURN, C. J.—In that case the prisoner was bound to account for each sum and not for the gross amount. Here the prisoner was bound to hand in weekly accounts on the Tuesday in each week. It is an account of the aggregate of all he received.] That may be so in one sense, but nevertheless the thirty-one sums were distinct acts of embezzlement. [COCKBURN, C. J.—The prisoner might have been indicted for the embezzlement of each sum, but the question here is whether he did not embezzle the gross amount?] The moment three acts of embezzlement had been proved, the evidence ought to have been stopped: (1 Taylor on Evidence, 272.) If the jury had found simply that the sums charged had been embezzled, Reg. v. Lambert, 2 Cox C. C. 309, would have applied. In that case the prisoner had debited himself with an amount forming the balance of a number of receipts and payments; and it was held that the offence was made out if the jury were satisfied that the prisoner received in the aggregate the amount with which he had charged himself; and that he absconded or refused to account, leaving a portion of the gross sum deficient; and that it was not necessary to prove that any particular sum or sums were received from any particular person. [MELLOR, J.—Have not the jury found not only that the prisoner embezzled each of the thirty-one sums, but the gross amount also? Is there anything to prevent the charging of three aggregate sums in an indictment? M. SMITH, J.—The indictment is right, and is supported by good evidence. Does it make it bad because the jury also say that they think each of the thirty-one sums was embezzled? CHANNELL, B.—There could have been no embezzlement until the Tuesday in each week. WILLES, J. referred to Reg. v. Richardson, 8 Cox C. C. 448 and Reg. v. Proud, L. & C. 37; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 331.]

COCKBURN, C.J.—Without reference to Reg. v. King, we are satisfied that the conviction was right. We agree that where a man has to account for each sum that he receives, no more than three such receipts can be charged in an indictment. Even then, if it is necessary to explain the intention of the prisoner, and to show that the omission to account was not accidental or an oversight, evidence may be given of other instances to show a fraudulent intent. The present case is free from difficulty, for although anyone of the receipts might have been charged as a distinct act of embezzlement, it is distinguishable from the ordinary case by the fact that the prisoner was only to account once a week and pay over the aggregate amount he had received during the week. The account must necessarily be made up of all the items composing the aggregate sum to show how that is made out, but the handing over is of one gross amount, and the prisoner might, therefore, be charged with embezzling the gross amount, and it was not necessary to charge the embezzlement of the different sums received. The evidence objected to was, therefore, admissible, and it would be mischievous if persons in such cases as these could not be convicted of embezzling a gross sum, especially as there is no rule of law against it.

The other learned judges concurred.

Conviction affirmed.

COWLES v. GALE.

Vendor and purchaser—Specific performance—Agreement for sale of public-house—Transfer of licence—9 Geo. 4, c. 61, ss. 11, 14—Licence in name of deceased owner.

The trustees of a will sold a public-house as a going concern by auction under a power of sale. On the day fixed for completion the purchaser refused to complete on the ground that the trustees were not in a position to transfer the licence, which had been renewed in the name of the testator after his death.

Held that, though the renewal was irregular, the purchaser would not incur any risk on that account, and that under the licence, endorsed by the vendors, he would have an unimpeachable title to carry on the trade of the public-house.

Decree accordingly for specific performance with costs.

Day v. Luhke (L. Rep. 5 Eq. 336), and Claydon v. Green (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 607; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 511, distinguished.

THIS was a suit by vendors for the specific performance of a contract to purchase a public house at Romford, in the county of Essex, called the Durham Arms.

The public house in question was held down to the time of his death in July 1870 by George ROSS, who, by his will dated the 21st Aug. 1868, gave all his real and personal estate to the plaintiffs upon trust for sale, and appointed them and his wife executors and executrix of his will.

At his death, George Ross was entitled to the Durham Arms in fee, and he was also possessed of the usual magistrates' and excise and other licences, under which he had carried on the business of a publican on the premises, and which had been granted to him and made out in his name under the General Licensing Act (9 Geo. 4, c. 61).

Under the power of sale contained in the will the plaintiffs on the 12th Oct. 1870, put up the public house for sale by auction, and the defendant Charles H. Gale became the purchaser at the price of 745*l.*, and the 16th Nov. following was the day fixed for completion.

On the 19th Oct. the abstract of the plaintiff's title to the public-house was delivered to the defendant's solicitors, who, on the 21st of the same month sent in requisitions, one of which was in these words: "In whose name are the licences now standing?" To this requisition the plaintiff's solicitor sent the following reply: "In the name of the late George Ross. They will be transferred by the executors in the usual way." No objection was taken to this reply.

On the 16th Nov. the parties with their solicitors and brokers met on the premises, and the stock-in-trade, furniture, &c., were valued. But on ascertaining that the licences had not been transferred into the names of the executors, the purchaser refused to complete his purchase and accept a transfer of the licences.

The magistrates' licence had in fact been renewed on the 26th Aug. 1870, in the name of the deceased owner, George Ross, under the circumstances which are stated in the judgment.

After some negotiations, which led to no result, the trustees of the will instituted the present suit for specific performance of the contract; the testator's widow being made a defendant by amendment.

Southgate, Q.C. and Horton Smith, for the plaintiffs. Assuming that the licence was improperly renewed in the name of the deceased owner, and that the trustees are liable to a penalty for not having complied with the requirements of the 14th section of 9 Geo. 4 c. 61, we submit that the defendant Gale would not be affected by this, but that he would have been effectually protected by the licence being duly indorsed by the executors of the deceased owner. But, if this be not so, we submit that the purchaser is precluded from now raising the objection, as he took no exception to the answer furnished by us to his question, in whose name the licences were standing, which answer of ours was in accordance with the facts.

Daniel Jones, for the testator's widow.

Roxburgh, Q. C. and Morton, for the defendant Gale.—As we purchased this public-house as a going concern, time is of the essence of the contract: (Day v. Lukke, L. Rep. 5 Eq. 336.) The 16th Nov. 1870 was the day fixed for completion. We contend that the plaintiffs were not on that day in a position to transfer the licence, for there was then no licence at all in existence. The licence had been renewed in the name of George Ross after his death, and we contend that a licence to a dead man is no licence at all. We were, therefore, entitled to repudiate the contract. In Day v. Lukke, upon the day fixed for completion of a sale of a public-house as a going concern, the vendors were not in a position to procure a transfer of the licence under the 11th section of the General Licensing Act, and it was held that the purchaser was entitled to repudiate the contract. In Claydon v. Green (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 607; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 511) the vendor of a public-house had agreed to make a proper assignment of the licences on a given day or as soon thereafter as might be; the business of the house had been carried on under the management, and under a licence granted under 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, in the name of the vendor's son as servant to his father; three months before the sale the son had gone to America and had not since been heard of, and since that time, but without any transfer of the licence, the business had been continued under the management of another son of the vendor, and it was held that the vendor, not being able to obtain the indorsement of the licence by his son in whose name it was, was not in a condition to perform his contract, and consequently that the purchaser might recover back his deposit and the expenses which he had incurred in and about the purchase. In the present case the vendors were not in a condition, on the day fixed for completion, to perform their contract; and we contend that we are, therefore, entitled to recover back our deposit, and that the bill must be dismissed with costs.

Southgate, Q. C. in reply.

June 4.—Lord ROMILLY.—This is a suit for the specific performance of a contract to sell a freehold public-house in Essex, called the Durham Arms. Some other property was sold at the same time, but this need not be regarded, as the objection applied to the public-house only. The property was put up for sale by auction on the 12th of last October, and the defendant bought both lots for 745*l*. The sale being of a public-house, time is of the essence of the contract. The 16th Nov. 1870 was the day fixed for completion, or in other words the "change day," when the possession of the public-house, with its appurtenances and liquors, was to be delivered up and the licences transferred. This was not done, and the defendant contends that the plaintiffs were not in a position to do so. The plaintiffs contend that they were able and willing to do so, and that if the defendant and his agent had but waited another hour, as he had agreed to do, the licence would have been duly transferred to him. This is the question which I have to try—namely, whether the plaintiffs on that day could transfer the licence to the defendant. The facts which raise the question are not in dispute. George Ross, during the first half of the year 1870, was the owner and his son was the occupier of the public-house called the Durham Arms, holding a proper licence to carry on business there, which licence in the ordinary course of events would have expired and would have had to be renewed on the 26th Aug. 1870. On the 13th July 1870, George Ross died. By his will he appointed his widow and the two plaintiffs his executors. The son of the testator, shortly before the 26th Aug., went to the deputy clerk to the magistrates of the Romford district, in which the public-house was situated, informed him of the death of the testator, and asked him how he should proceed. Mr. Smith, the deputy clerk, told him to attend on the 26th Aug. to renew the licence in the testator's name, and stated that the transfer could be made on a subsequent day. This was accordingly done, and the licence was renewed in the name of George Ross, who was then actually dead. I think that this was a mistake, and that according to the statute 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, the executors ought to have obtained a protection order under the 14th section, and got the licence duly transferred, and if they had done so they could without difficulty or objection have transferred the licence to the purchaser. But in fact they did not do so till Dec. 1870, and in Feb. 1871 they transferred the licence to the widow, who, has since the death of the testator and does now, carry on the business. What took place was this. The change day was fixed for the 16th Nov. 1870. On that day the parties met: everything was completed except delivery up and transfer of the licences; but before the appraisement and delivery of the goods had begun, it was discovered that by some inadvertence the licences in connection with the Durham Arms had been left in London, and with the consent of the defendant and of his solicitors, a special messenger was sent by the 4.35 train to London to fetch the licences, and the defendant and his solicitors and brother agreed to wait for his return, and, thereupon, the appraisement and examination of the furniture and liquors continued to be made and was completed. The agreement was then produced, and a receipt for the amount was endorsed on the valuation and duly stamped and signed by the plaintiffs. The messenger sent to London returned to Romford at 8 o'clock in the afternoon. In the mean time this had occurred. I will read it from paragraph 21 of the written evidence, where it is told as shortly as I can tell it: "At a few minutes before 7 o'clock the said Mr. Fry, on behalf of the defendant, asked us whether the magistrates', and excise, and other licences had been transferred into the names of the plaintiffs, the testator's executors, and was told, as the facts were, that they had not. The said Mr. Fry thereupon arose and said that he should wait no longer, and that if the licences were not at once produced to be handed over, he should not allow the defendant to complete, on the ground that they should have been in the names of the executors." That, it is agreed, is what took place upon this occasion, and the question is whether the defendant was right in so doing. Having regard to the facts which I have already mentioned,

I am of opinion that it is exactly the same as if the licence had then been returned from London, and had been tendered at the time. The contention of the defendant's counsel is that a licence given to a dead man is no licence at all, and that the renewal of the 26th Aug. 1870 was merely a frivolous and inofficious act, having no operation at all; and consequently that there was no licence then to be transferred, and therefore none could be transferred; and that, according to Day v. Luhke (L. Rep. 5 Eq. 336) and Claydon v. Green (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 607; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 511), such being the case, the defendant was entitled to abandon the contract. The answer of the plaintiffs is twofold; first, they say that assuming the executor acted improperly in not obtaining the protection order under sect. 14 of the Act, this misconduct in no respect affected the purchaser; that the licence, if duly endorsed by the executors, protected him, and the penalty, if any, would be confined to the executors; and that, according to the practice adopted in the cases before the Romford district magistrates, the licence endorsed by the executors would have been treated as a valid transfer of the licence by the magistrates, and renewed, as a matter of course, in the name of the purchaser; and, further, they contend that, even if this were not so, still the defendant is not at liberty to take the objection, inasmuch as on the 21st Oct. 1870, two days after the delivery and receipt of the abstracts of title of the public-house, the defendant's solicitor sent in the requisitions, one of which was in these words: "In whose name are the licences now standing?" to which the plaintiffs' solicitor sent the following answer in writing: "In the name of the late George Ross. They will be transferred by the executors in the usual way." No objection was taken to this answer; the change day was appointed, and the meeting took place as if nothing more was required, although the defendant knew or must be taken to have known, that the 26th of August, 1870, which was then past, was the day for renewing the licence, and they say that these acts constitute a waiver of the objection if otherwise it could be maintained. Upon a consideration of the whole matter, I think that the objection itself cannot be maintained, and, as to any technical or other nominal objection that the licence could not be transferred, because a licence to a dead man is nothing, and that therefore there was none to be transferred, I disregard that, because the document itself, purporting to be a licence granted by the magistrates, even if invalid, rendered it impossible for any person to obtain a licence other than the legal personal representatives of the testator or their assigns. And upon reading the evidence of Mr. Smith, the Deputy Clerk for the Romford district, I am of opinion that in that district the licence being endorsed by the plaintiffs as executors of the testator, the defendant would have obtained a negotiable title to carry on the trade of the public house called the "Durham Arms." This is clearly shown by his evidence. I will read this part of it—paragraphs 2, 3, and 4: "According to the custom existing with the Romford magistrates upon the transfer of a public house with reference to the transfer of the magistrates' licence held in connection therewith, there would be no necessity in order to make a valid transfer of such licence from the executors or the acting executors of a deceased testator, as vendor to a purchaser, that such licence should, as a preliminary, be transferred from the name of the testator, the deceased licensee, into those of his executors. All that would be necessary would be for the executors or acting executors, as the case might be, to sign a notice of application for transfer in the form required by the 11th section of the statute, 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, and for such executors or acting executors as the case might be, or someone duly authorised in that behalf by them, to have attended before the said magistrates (having previously given the requisite notices under the said 11th section of the said statute 9 Geo. 4, c. 61) and to have produced the probate of the testator's will, admitted or proved the signatures to the said notices and completed the transfer of the said licence in accordance with the provisions of the said section. On the 26th Aug. 1870, the renewed licence referred to in the plaintiff's amended bill was signed by two of the magistrates and on that day on the name of George Ross being called at the meeting of the said magistrates, a person came up to the table where I was sitting and paid me the usual fees in exchange for the renewed licence which was available from the 10th Oct. 1870 to the 10th Oct. 1871. And I further say that had such renewed licence been subsequently brought to me along with the notices of application for transfer as required by the 11th section of the statute 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, and had one of the said executors or acting executors, as the case might be, or some one on their behalf, attended at the special sessions then next ensuing and produced the probate of the testator's will and acknowledged his signature to the notices and proved that the same had been duly served, such renewed licence would (provided, of course, there existed no evidence of the intended transferee being an objectionable person) have been duly transferred without further requirement into the name of the said Gale. In fact it is within my own knowledge that such licence, so granted in the name of the said George Ross in Aug. last, was in Dec. last temporarily protected by the said magistrates to the said executors, and since then, namely in Feb. last, was transferred into the name of Ann Ross, in whose name the same now stands." I am also further of opinion that, assuming that the course which was so adopted was not the right course, and that it was contrary to the Act of Parliament, still that the defendant ran no risk in accepting such transfer, as the penalty (if any) would have fallen on the executors of the testator, and not on the defendant. It is to be observed that in Day v. Luhke (L. Rep. 5 Eq. 336) and Claydon v. Green (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 607; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 511) a good title could not then have been made except under the 14th section of the Act, and a mere transfer of the licence under section 11, was not what the executors were able and willing to give. In Day v. Luhke it could not be done, because the licensee was alive and had absconded. In Claydon v. Green it could not be done for some reason, and although it does not appear that he had absconded, yet at all events he had gone to America and he could not be found to transfer the licence; but in case of death the executors are the persons who hold the licence, and who, if they endorsed it, would have given a sufficiently good title to the purchaser. I think, therefore, that the plaintiffs are entitled to a decree for specific performance and that the defendants must pay the costs up to and including the hearing.

The plaintiffs must pay the widow's costs and add them to their own.

Petroleum—Keeping without a licence—25 & 26 Vict. c. 66—31 & 32 Vict. c. 56.

By sect. 3 of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 56 (The Petroleum Act 1868) the word "petroleum" is to include all such rock oil, &c., as gives off an inflammable vapour at a temperature of less than 100 degrees of Fahrenheit's thermometer, and by sect. 4 it is enacted that no petroleum shall be kept otherwise than for private use within 50*yds. of a dwelling-house, &c., except in pursuance of a licence:*

Held, that an offence was committed under the last mentioned section, although the petroleum does not give off an inflammable vapour under 100 degrees of Fahrenheit's thermometer.

THIS was a case stated by justices under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43 upon a conviction by them of the appellant for keeping, otherwise than for private use, within 50yds. of a dwellinghouse, a quantity of petroleum without being licensed. The case stated as follows:—

1. At a petty sessions, holden at Kingston-upon-Thames, in and for the division of Kingston, in the county of Surrey, on the 8th Dec. 1870, an information preferred by William Cook (hereinafter called the respondent), against the said Slaney Jones (hereinafter called the appellant), under the Petroleum Act of 1862 and 1868, charging for that the said appellant did keep, otherwise than for private use, within 50yds. of a certain dwelling-house, then and there occupied by him, a quantity of petroleum without being licensed, in accordance with the Petroleum Acts 1862 and 1868, was heard and determined by us, the said justices respectively, being then present, and upon such hearing the appellant was duly convicted before us of the said offence, and we adjudged him to pay a fine of 10*s.* and costs, amounting to 17*s.* 6*d.*

2. And whereas, the appellant being dissatisfied with our determination upon the hearing of the said information, as being erroneous in point of law, hath, pursuant to sect. 2 of the said statute, 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, duly applied to us, in writing, to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and the ground of such our determination as aforesaid for the opinion of this court, and hath duly entered into a recognisance, as required by the said statute in that behalf.

3. Now therefore we, the said justices, in compliance with the said application and the provisions of the said statute, do hereby state and sign the following case.

4. Upon the hearing of the information it was admitted by the appellant that he did keep such petroleum as charged in the information, and that he had no licence to keep it; and it was admitted by both of the said parties that the petroleum did not give off an inflammable vapour at a temperature of less than 100 degs. of Fahrenheit's thermometer, but that it did give off such a vapour at a greater temperature.

5. It was contended on the part of the appellant, that inasmuch as it was admitted that the petroleum in question did not give off an inflammable vapour at a temperature of less than 100 degs. of Fahrenheit's thermometer, that no licence in accordance with the Petroleum Act of 1862 and 1868 was necessary; and that the definitions given of petroleum in sect. 1 of the said Act of 1862 and in sect. 3 of the said Act of 1868, showed that the petroleum in question did not come within the provisions of sect. 4 of the Act of 1868, under which section we convicted the said appellant.

6. It was contended on the part of the respondent that the term "petroleum" not only included the substances mentioned in sect. 3 of the Petroleum Act 1868, as giving off an inflammable vapour at a temperature of less than 100 deg. of Fahrenheit's thermometer, but also included petroleum itself or any produce thereof in any form whatever; and that sect. 3 of the Act of 1868 extended the operation of the said Acts to other substances, and prevented the substances therein mentioned from being kept and sold without a licence, although some of the substances mentioned in the said sect. 3 were not products of petroleum at all, and would not, unless they had been specially mentioned in sect. 3 of the Act of 1868, have come within the provisions of the Petroleum Acts of 1862 and 1868, although they gave off an inflammable vapour at a temperature of less than 100 deg. of Fahrenheit's thermometer. It was also contended on the part of the respondent, that the words "other substances" in the preamble of the Act of 1868, and the words "petroleum shall include all such rock oil, &c.," in sect. 3 of that Act, instead of limiting the meaning of the word petroleum, had an enlarging effect, and made the word include the substances mentioned in sect. 3, in addition to the natural meaning of the word petroleum, and that no test whatever was necessary with regard to keeping petroleum, which was naturally a highly inflammable substance, although not always flashing at less than a temperature of 100 deg. of Fahrenheit, and that any person who kept it must be licensed under sect. 4 of the Petroleum Act 1868, or render himself liable to the highest penalty imposed by the Act (20*l.*). It was further contended, on the part of the respondent, that as two separate penalties were awarded by the Petroleum Acts 1862 and 1868, one of 20*l.* for keeping petroleum without a licence, and another of 5*l.* for selling or exposing for sale petroleum which flashed at less than 100 deg. Fahrenheit's thermometer, unless the bottle containing such last-mentioned petroleum was labelled as by sect. 5 of the Act of 1868 is directed. The respondent urged that the first kind of petroleum is dangerous, the second is highly dangerous, even in common use, but both are equally dangerous, in case of fire; and it was therefore the intention of the Petroleum Acts (as will be seen by sect. 5 of the Act of 1862) to prevent traders keeping either description in any improper place, so as to endanger the neighbouring public, for in case of fire it is impossible to extinguish it by water; and with regard to that petroleum that flashed at less than 100 deg. of Fahrenheit's thermometer, it was the intention of the said Acts to prevent it being even exposed for sale in small quantities, unless the public who purchased were fully cautioned against its extra dangerous properties. The respondent also cited in further proof that this was the proper construction of the Petroleum

Acts; the portion of sect. 4 of the Act of 1868, which amongst other things gives the local authority power, after actually granting their licence, to annex conditions to it, as, for instance, a power to test such petroleum from time to time, and he argued therefrom, that if a licence was only required in cases where petroleum flashed at less than 100 deg. of Fahrenheit, and this fact having been once admitted, and a licence granted to the person keeping such petroleum, there would be no necessity for any further test, whereas, on the contrary, these words showed that a trader having taken out a licence to keep petroleum, might store and sell as much as he liked, if it did not flash under 100 degs. Fahrenheit, without a label, but if on testing it he found it flashed at less than 100 degs., he was at once compelled by the Acts to put a proper label on the bottles in which he sold it, the same petroleum frequently, from atmospheric or other causes, differing in its degree of inflammability and requiring testing frequently in order to guard against such variations of inflammability. It was further contended by the respondent that sect. 6 of the Act of 1868, which gives an inspector of weights and measures power to inspect and test all petroleum kept, offered, or exposed for sale, and if he shall find any kept, offered, or exposed for sale contrary to the provisions of the Petroleum Acts of 1862 and 1868, the same shall be liable to be seized, and on conviction, forfeited, and the person or persons offending shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding 5l., fully confirmed all his previous arguments, for he argued that the section applies to the minor offence of exposing for sale petroleum that flashes at less than 100 deg. of Fahrenheit without having a proper label, and it gives an appeal from the test of such inspector, and the petroleum is only forfeited in case of conviction; whereas sect. 4 says that petroleum kept without a licence shall be forfeited with or without a conviction, and the occupier of the place in which the petroleum is kept shall be liable to a penalty of 20l., the respondent contending that the inspector under sect. 4 is not required even to test the petroleum, and that no appeal is therefore given against his decision. The respondent therefore contended that the Petroleum Acts prevented two things; first, the keeping of petroleum, &c., without a licence, whether it flashed at less than 100 deg. of Fahrenheit's temperature or not; secondly, the selling petroleum that flashed at less than 100 deg. of Fahrenheit's thermometer without a cautionary label on the vessel containing it.

7. We being of opinion that the contention of the respondent as stated in paragraph 6 was the correct construction of the Petroleum Acts of 1862 and 1868, and that the case was within the operation of sect. 4 of the Act of 1868, gave our determination against the appellant in the manner before stated.

8. The questions of law arising on the above statement for the opinion of the court, therefore, are: First, Whether any kind of petroleum, at whatever temperature it gives off an inflammable vapour, is contemplated by sect. 4 of the Act of 1868, and requires a licence for keeping it? secondly, whether only such petroleum as gives off an inflammable vapour at a temperature of less than 100 deg. of Fahrenheit's thermometer is contemplated by that section, and requires a licence for keeping it? thirdly, whether the petroleum, for the keeping of which the information was laid against the appellant, was shown to be within the provisions of the Petroleum Acts 1862 and 1868, and whether the appellant was rightly convicted by us the undersigned justices?

If the court be of opinion that the said conviction was legally and properly made, and the appellant is liable as aforesaid, then the said conviction is to stand; but if the court should be of opinion otherwise, then the said conviction should be quashed and the said information dismissed.

Given under our hands this 19th Jan. 1871, at Kingston-on-Thames, in the county aforesaid.

(Signed) Charles Cooke.
Edward Welch.

By the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 66 (An Act for the safe keeping of petroleum) s. 1, it is enacted that—

Petroleum, for the purposes of this Act, shall include any product thereof that gives off an inflammable vapour at a temperature of less than 100 deg. of Fahrenheit's thermometer.

By sect. 3 it is enacted that—

From and after the 1st Oct. 1862, not more than forty gallons of petroleum shall be kept within 50yds. of a dwelling-house, or of a building in which goods are stored except in pursuance of a licence given by such local authority as is hereinafter mentioned, &c.

By the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 56 (the Petroleum Act 1868), it is by sect. 1 enacted that this and the former Act shall be read as one Act.

Sect. 3 enacts that—

For the purposes of the Petroleum Acts 1862, 1868, including all local Acts and bye-laws relating to petroleum or the produce thereof, "petroleum" shall include all such rock oil, Rangoon oil, Burmah oil, any product of the same, and any oil made from petroleum, coal, schist, shale, peat, or other bituminous substance, and any product of them as gives off an inflammable vapour at a temperature of less than 100 deg. of Fahrenheit's thermometer.

By sect. 4 it is enacted that—

From and after the 1st Feb. 1869, the 3rd section of the Petroleum Act 1862 shall be repealed, &c., and that from and after the 1st Feb. 1869 no petroleum shall be kept, otherwise than for private use, within 50 yds. of a dwelling house, or of a building in which goods are stored, except in pursuance of a licence given in accordance with the Petroleum Act 1862. . . . Any petroleum kept in contravention of this section shall be forfeited, and in addition thereto the occupier of the place in which such petroleum is kept shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds a day for each day during which petroleum is kept in contravention of the Petroleum Acts 1862 and 1868, or either of such Acts.

Section 5 enacts that—

No person shall sell or expose for sale for use within the United Kingdom any description of petroleum from and after the 1st Feb 1869, which gives off an inflammable vapour at a temperature of less than 100 deg. of Fahrenheit's thermomer, unless the bottle or vessel containing such petroleum have attached thereto a label in legible characters, stating as follows: "Great care must be taken in bringing any light near to the contents of this vessel, as they give off an inflammable vapour at a temperature of less than one hundred degrees of Fahrenheit's thermometer." Any person acting in contravention of this section shall for each offence be subject to a penalty not exceeding five pounds.

Sect. 6 empowers any inspector of weights and measures, or other person or persons, duly appointed under the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 56, at all reasonable times to inspect and test all petroleum kept, offered, or exposed for sale; and if upon such inspection and test any description of petroleum shall be found, kept, or offered for sale as aforesaid contrary to the provisions of this Act, or of the Petroleum Act 1862, the same shall be liable to be seized, &c.

neither appeared for the appellant.—The con- n was wrong. The Acts upon the subject of eum apply only to liquids that give off an mmable vapour at a temperature of less than g., and it is found in the case that the petro- the appellant had upon his premises did not ff an inflammable vapour at less than 100 This is clear from the fact that the 6th n provides for testing the liquid, which would be unnecessary if petroleum of any quality within the Act.

CRESSWELL, J.(a)—I am of opinion that the trates were right in their decision. By the eum Act of 1862 it is enacted that the term oleum" shall include any product thereof ives off an inflammable vapour at a tempera- f less than 100 deg. Then sect. 3 refers to eum both in its natural and its artificial state. It is argued for the appellant that in sect. 3 Petroleum Act of 1868, petroleum must such petroleum as gives off an inflammable r at less than 100 deg.; but that is not what s. Sect. 4 means that a person shall not petroleum nor such rock oil, as is described, es off an inflammable vapour, without a . Certainly sect. 6 appears to be some- inconsistent with the former provisions; but be construed to mean, that if upon inspec- se article is found not to be petroleum, no on as to test is to arise. At all events there hing in that section to repeal the distinct ions already enacted.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. If the 1862 stood alone, it is perfectly clear that troleum or any product thereof could be without a licence. In the year 1868 it was ly represented to Parliament that other oils petroleum gave off dangerous vapours, and pon the legislation of that year took place he subject, but it leaves petroleum proper ished. Sect. 4 is certainly important as g the distinction between storing and . The object of sect. 5 is to give a caution public as to the dangerous nature of the , and sect. 6 appears to be directed to cases petroleum is kept for sale, and not for e only. I think, therefore, that the convic- correct.

May 3 and 5, 1871.

(Before MELLOR and HANNEN, JJ.)

MARSHALL (app.) v. FOX (resp.).

Habitual Criminals Act 1869—Permitting thieves or reputed thieves to assemble, &c.—Purpose of meeting—Conviction.

The appellant was convicted under sect. 10 of the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 99 (The Habitual Criminals Act 1869), of knowingly harbouring thieves or reputed thieves, and permitting them to meet and assemble in his house. It appeared that there was held in the house of the appellant, who was an innkeeper, what was called a "friendly meeting" or "lead" for the purpose of getting up a subscription in aid of the wife and children of a man who had been committed to take his trial for an offence, or for procuring him means for his defence. The money was collected by cards of admission. The company sat round a table drinking and singing songs, and amongst them were several thieves, or reputed thieves, whom the appellant knew to be such. There was no disorderly conduct, nor were the parties assembled in pursuance of any absolutely unlawful design or to concert crimes or otherwise misbehave themselves:

Held, that such an assembly was within the operation of the said 10*th section, and that the conviction was right.*

THIS was a case stated by one of the metropolitan police magistrates upon a conviction by him of the appellant for an offence under sect. 10 of the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 99, for that he, being a person who occupied and kept a place where excisable liquors were sold, did knowingly harbour thieves or reputed thieves, and knowingly permit or suffer them to meet or assemble therein, upon which conviction he was fined 5*l*. It was at the hearing proved on the part of the complainant that on the day named there was held in the house of the appellant what was called "a friendly meeting," or "lead," for the purpose of getting up a subscription in aid of the wife and children of a man who had been committed to take his trial for an offence, or for procuring him means for his defence. The manner in which the money was collected was by cards of admission circulated by the friends of the parties to be benefited. In the large room of the alehouse the company sat round a table drinking and singing songs, and amongst the company were several thieves or reputed thieves, whom the appellant knew to be such. There was no disorderly conduct proved. The magistrate, in convicting, held that there was such an assemblage as was within the meaning of the before-mentioned section, though at the same time he was not of opinion that the parties assembled there were there in pursuance of any absolutely unlawful design, or that they met together to concert crimes or otherwise to misbehave themselves.

If the court should be of opinion that upon the facts stated, the magistrate was bound to convict the said John Marshall, then the conviction was to be confirmed. But if the court should be of a contrary opinion, then the said conviction was to be quashed.

By sect. 10 of the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 99, it is enacted that—

> Every person who occupies or keeps any lodging house, beerhouse, public-house, or other place where excisable liquors are sold, or place of public entertainment or public resort, and knowingly lodges or harbours thieves, or reputed thieves, or knowingly permits, or suffers them to meet or assemble therein . . . shall be liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding 10*l*., &c.

Francis appeared for the appellant.—The magistrate was not bound to have convicted, as it is clear that although there may have been some bad characters amongst the assembly, the purpose was a lawful and proper one; and the object of the section was to prevent the assemblages of thieves who might be congregating together to concoct unlawful designs. He referred to

F. M. White for the respondent.—The magistrate was right. This was not a casual meeting, but was settled beforehand. The object of the section was to prevent thieves from assembling together in such houses.

Francis was heard in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 5.—MELLOR, J.—We have considered the mode in which the question is referred to us, and we cannot help thinking that what the magistrate intended to ask us is, whether having stated the facts of the case, and having found nothing that ought to induce him to draw any other inference than that which he appears to have drawn, we ought to say he was at liberty to hold otherwise? That is the sense in which we think that he intended to leave to us the question whether he was not bound, the facts being proved before him, to hold that these facts bring the case within the statute, we think that he ought to have so decided upon the facts stated, and we think therefore he was bound in that sense so to decide. Now, the statute by the 10th section which is in Part 3, under the head "Habitual Criminals," enacts thus: "Every person who occupies or keeps any lodging-house, beerhouse, public-house, or other place where exciseable liquors are sold, a place of public entertainment or public resort, and knowingly lodges or harbours thieves, or reputed thieves, or knowingly permits or suffers them to meet or assemble therein," &c. Now, in this particular case, the occasion of the assembly was that some man who had got into trouble upon some criminal charge, sends out, by means of his friends, cards inviting people who took an interest in his fate to assemble together that they might be induced to subscribe funds for his defence. It is called a friendly meeting, or lead, and people are called together by means of cards. There were a number of persons sitting round a table singing and drinking, and so far as all the parties are concerned, even supposing them not to be thieves or reputed thieves, nobody can doubt that they did meet and assemble together in the appellant's house. It turns out that a number of them were thieves, or reputed thieves, and the magistrate has found as a fact that the appellant knew that some of the people there assembled, drinking and singing songs, were thieves, or reputed thieves. We quite agree that it is not every casual meeting of thieves, or reputed thieves, which can constitute this offence. It would be very hard indeed if it were so. We think the object of the Legislature was to prevent thieves, although they had no particular felonies or criminal object in view, from meeting together. The theory upon which the legislation in the Act is based is this, that where thieves or reputed thieves meet together, it affords an opportunity or inducement for the concoction and commission of future crimes and offences, and therefore the Legislature intended to strictly prohibit people who have public houses or other places of public entertainment from allowing thieves or reputed thieves to assemble together in such places. We think the magistrate has found facts upon which, if he discharged his duty properly, he ought to have convicted the appellant, and we think that that is the only meaning he could have put upon the word "bound." Therefore, although he has put the question to us in a form which at first presented some little difficulty, upon consideration we think that he has given the right meaning to it, and that the conviction should be affirmed.

Conviction affirmed.

GORE AND OTHERS (apps.) v. THE SPECIAL COMMISSIONERS FOR ENGLISH FISHERIES (resps.)

Salmon fishery—Fixed engine—Stop net—Definition—28 & 29 Vict. c. 121, s. 39.

G. being the owner of a several fishery in a tidal navigable river, used a stop net for catching salmon. A boat was fixed or steadied by large poles tipped with iron which the fisherman carried in his boat, and worked into the bed of the river in contrary directions to which the boat was tied. The fisherman then had two poles extending beyond and resting upon the gunwales of the boat to which a net was attached. He kept his hand on the upper end of the poles, so that when he felt a fish had gone into the net, he could instantly jerk up the mouth of the net and enclose the fish. The weight of the poles and the net rested mainly on the gunwales of the boat, and they were nearly balanced, so that the fisherman's hand did not support or work the net which was thirty feet wide, the poles of the net not being fastened to the boat:

Held, that this net was a "fixed engine" within the definition of the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 121, s. 39, which includes any net fixed to the soil or made stationary in any other way.

THIS was a case stated for the opinion of the court by the Special Commissioners for English Fisheries, pursuant to the Salmon Fishery Amendment Act 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 121), which incorporates the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, as follows. At a court holden by the said special commissioners at Newport, in the county of Monmouth, on the 13th Dec. 1869, for the purpose of inquiring into the legality of the fixed engines situated in the river Usk in the Usk fishery district. The Rev. George Gore and others, the trustees of the late Capel Hanbury Leigh (hereinafter called the appellants), having been duly summoned to appear before the said commissioners, and having appeared by their attorney, made claim to use a stop net in a certain fishery called the Lower Crown fishery in the river Usk, and also a stop net in a certain other fishery adjacent, for a certain number of hides, of which stop nets the said appellants were the owners, as being lawful engines and not merely privileged fixed engines within the meaning of the Salmon Fishery Acts, and the said commissioners having heard what was alleged and proved gave their decision on the 18th May that the stop nets were fixed engines and were privileged within the meaning of the Salmon Fishery Act 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 21, s. 39). And whereas the said appellants being dissatisfied with the decision of the said commissioners, and having given notice of appeal to this honourable court, and having requested us to state a special case for the opinion of this court accordingly, and having also entered into recognisances as required by the te, the said commissioners hereby state and such case as follows:

CASE.

the Salmon Fishery Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict.
9, s. 11), it is enacted that no fixed engine the hearing of the said claim, before the said issioners at Newport aforesaid, the appellant

d engines," and therefore not within our liction. And it is to be taken as a fact that said stop nets are "fixed engines," there was ient evidence to satisfy us that there was eral fishery lawfully created, and that the nets were lawfully used at the places herein-described. We held that the appellants were ed to our certificate to that effect, pursuant e statute, and that our certificate must ibe the situation of the engine. The said stop were used in the river Usk between Caerand the town of Usk, and the river at places where the nets in question were is tidal and navigable, but not at the state of ide when the nets are in use. The fisher-on going out to fish with a stop net first es his boat athwart the current. This he irst by his anchor until he can set in position long stakes or poles tipped with iron which rries in his boat. One of these poles he s or works into the bed of the river from one f the boat in a slanting direction, the second rks in like manner into the bed of the river the other end of the boat, and a third pole is ally slanted in a direction transverse to the two from one end of the boat. These stakes es are lashed to the boat with ropes, and the ined effect of the poles when set and pene-g the bed of the river is to keep the boat still place, and to prevent the current carrying it on to either side. When the boat is steadied, the fisherman puts his net over-, which is about thirty feet wide at the mouth, and tapers to a point. The mouth which faces the current is distended by two light poles called rames, which are tied together at one end with a rope, and which end the fisherman keeps his hand upon when fishing. The rames diverge from this upper end gradually until at their furthest end they stretch out the mouth of the net to its full width of about 30ft. This stretching is facilitated by a cross stick or stretcher inserted between and fastened to the rames at about 7ft. from the upper end, and this prevents the rames closing together. The rames are about 22ft. long, and each lies over the edge of the boat, touching the edge at a distance of about 8ft. from the upper end where the poles converge. When the net is working the rames point against the current in a slanting direction, and form an acute angle of about twelve degrees with the surface of the water, the lower ends being under water, so as to keep the bottom rope of the net about three or four feet below the surface. The upper ends of the rames meet and are tied together, being pressed upon by the fisherman's hand, as the net and poles are almost self-balanced. The weight of the net and rames rests on the edge of the boat, the fisherman's hand being on the upper end, not to support or work the net, but merely so that he may be quite ready to jerk up the rames at a moment's notice in a horizontal position. The upper end of the rames could be equally well kept steady by tying it with a string to a part of the boat, but inasmuch as the fisherman must in any event be in a standing position to jerk up the rames on the instant while he is so standing, his hands or arms generally lean on that end of the rames, and thereby help at the same time to keep the rames steady. In jerking up the rames he uses the edge of the boat on which each rame rests as a fulcrum, but the rames are not tied to the boat. When the rames are raised to a horizontal position they raise with them the mouth of the net out of the water, and so prevent the fish escaping. The net need not, and seldom does, touch the bed of the river; but it is essential that its weight should rest on the boat, and that is effected by suspending the net to the poles or rames which lie over the edge of the boat. These rames are necessary, first, to distend the net, and keep it open, and, secondly, to jerk up the mouth of the net instantly when necessary. The fisherman began to fish as before described generally from two hours before the ebb to the flood tide, and remained fishing with his boat in position as above mentioned from two to three hours at a time. During that period the water was generally at its lowest, and was not, in point of fact, used for the purpose of navigation, and no evidence was given that any actual obstruction to the navigation was caused by the said stop nets and boats during the time these were used for fishing purposes. The said stop nets were set and used in the same spot, such spot being selected from some favourable peculiarity in the current at that place, and the reason given for their being used only immediately before low water was, that the current or tide would at other times be so strong as to sweep away the boat and cross poles, or render it more difficult to steady and fix the boat. It was essential for the working of the net used in the above manner that the boat in which it is used should be fixed or steadied in some way. It was admitted by the opponents of the claim that the place where the stop nets in question were used was part of a legally created and existing several fishery, known as "The Crown Fishery," in the river Usk, and which had belonged to the kings and queens of England, in right of the Crown, down to the 12th March 1839, when it was duly conveyed by Her Majesty's Commissioners of Woods and Forests by deed to the predecessor in title and possession of the present appellants for the consideration of 600*l*. It was contended on the part of the appellants that the stop nets were fixed engines, and that the Court of Queen's Bench had so decided in Holford v. George (L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 639), and that such fixed engines would be illegal, being prohibited by statute 2 Hen. 6, c. 15, unless they had existed before that statute. On the other hand, it was contended by the appellants that the said stop nets were not fixed engines under the circumstances applicable to the spot where they were used in this fishery, and were not prohibited by the statute 2 Hen. 6 or any other statute, and were not within the prohibition of the Salmon Fishery Acts, and that the owner could use as many of such engines as he pleased within any and all parts of this several fishery where no obstruction to navigation was caused thereby; that the statute of Hen. 6 only applied to fixed engines which actually obstructed or were calculated to obstruct the navigation of the river at the places wherein and during the time when they were used; but here, there being no evidence of any such actual obstruction of navigation, but merely a use of poles and stakes to steady the boat, and the evidence on the contrary leading to the conclusion that at the state of the tide when the fishing actually occurred, no such obstruction could exist, that therefore there was nothing in that or any other act to render this mode of fishing illegal either before or since the Salmon Fishery Acts; and further, that the statute of Henry 6, and the other statutes for prohibiting the use of fixed engines, could not, and did not, affect the Crown, which might have used any number and description of fixed engines within the fishery in question, without any sort of interruption at all times down to the year 1839, and consequently that quoad the fishery in question, there was nothing on which the Salmon Fishery Acts of 1861 and 1865 could operate. We were of opinion upon the evidence as above stated, that the said stop nets were fixed engines within the meaning of the Salmon Fishery Acts; but inasmuch as the other evidence satisfied us that they had been lawfully used before those and any other statutes which prohibited them, we gave our decision that they were privileged "fixed engines," and that the appellants were entitled to our certificate to that effect.

The question for this honourable court is, whether on the facts we ought to have held that these stop nets were not fixed engines, and ought to have declined jurisdiction.

If the opinion of the court is in the negative, then our order and certificate will stand; if in the affirmative, the case will be remitted to us, that we may decide accordingly.

Given under our hands this 30th Nov. 1870.

HENRY SCOTT.

Mathews, Q.C. (J. O. Griffits with him) contended that this was no more a fixed engine than a man sitting on a punt and using a fishing rod could be called a "fixed engine." The man was essential to the working of the net which could not catch a fish unless he were there to do something to the net. If, instead of a boat in the river, a person were to hold the net over a bridge, it would be the same thing, and neither the man nor the bridge could be called a "fixed engine." This was not a fixed but a movable net. It was not within the mischief or the words of the Salmon Fishery Acts. There was nothing illegal in the mode of fishing, and a person might use as many of these nets as he pleased. The judgment of the commissioners ought, therefore, to be reversed.

Archibald (the Solicitor-General with him) for the respondents, was not called upon.

BLACKBURN, J.—I do not think we need trouble you to argue this case Mr. Archibald. It comes to be a question whether or not this net is a "fixed engine?" We have the case amended now, and can see how it is done, and whether this comes within the description of a "fixed engine." The 28 & 29 Vict. c. 121 was passed so as to make that term include "any net or other implement for taking fish, fixed to the soil or made stationary in any other way, not being a fishing weir or fishing mill-dam." The question therefore is, whether this net is made stationary? It is admitted that the rames—the poles I would rather say—on which the net works, are made stationary; and it is very much as Mr. Mathews puts it, as if there were a bridge across the river and this net rested upon it. When we have the description of the net, we find that it is of a very large size, and no human being would have any power to hold it up against the tide—a net thirty feet wide, and going a considerable distance into the water. It rests on the side of the boat by its own weight, and it is made stationary. As long as the boat is stationary it remains fixed and stands there. It is admitted that if there was not anything to steady it the net would from the pressure of the water below pass under the boat. It is as Mr. Mathews put it, as a teaspoon that is balanced, which would fall down if the part which is beyond extended a little further. Something there must be to keep it there. I would say that if it were tied with a piece of packthread and the fisherman was standing there resting one hand to hold it there, and if it is in consequence of this pressure of the hand upon it that it is made fixed, yet notwithstanding that it is a human hand that does it, and the net so becomes stationary, it is brought within the Act. It seems to me to be as much stationary when the man is there as though it had been fixed. I do not think that the mere intervention of the hand would in all cases make it stationary; but I think that here, when you come to consider whether it is made stationary or not, the quantum of degree is very material. I do not think that a mere casting net which a man throws into the water for a short time could be called stationary. But here it is made stationary and fixed by the man standing and keeping his hand upon it. If the net itself is stationary, and catches a fish because it is stationary by mechanical means, the case would be entirely free from doubt. The present case, however, is very near this. The net was kept there, and it is because of its being so kept stationary that the fish go into it, and when there the fisherman jerks it up. It is by means of its being stationary that the fish are caught. I think that the respondents are right, and that our judgment should be for them.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that it is impossible to say that this net was not made stationary. It was not fixed to the side of the boat, it is true; but if it is made stationary in any other way it is sufficient, and comes within the Act. If these poles or rames had been tied to the boat, there cannot be a doubt that that would make the net stationary. But if, instead of that, the tops of the poles be steadied by human agency, it is equally within the terms of the statute.

Hackney carriage—Railway station—"Plying for hire"—The Metropolitan Public Carriage Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 115) s. 4.

The driver of a carriage, standing on the premises of a railway company, by permission of the company, awaiting the arrival of the trains, applied to persons arriving by one of the trains to hire his carriage:

Held, that this was a "plying for hire" within the meaning of the Metropolitan Public Carriage Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 115) s. 4, and that the carriage was therefore a hackney carriage, and ought to be licensed.

Clarke v. Stanford (24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 389; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 357) followed.

CASE stated by justices under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

1. Upon the hearing of an information preferred by the appellant, an inspector of the metropolitan police, against the respondent, charging for that he on the 23rd June 1870, was the owner and driver of a certain unlicensed hackney carriage, which unlawfully plied for hire at the Cannon-street Railway Station, in the said city, contrary to the Metropolitan Public Carriage Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 115) s. 7, I dismissed the same.

2. The 7th section of this statute referred to is as follows:

If any unlicensed hackney or stage carriage plies for hire, the owner of such carriage shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding five pounds every day during which such unlicensed carriage plies. And if any unlicensed hackney carriage is found on any stand within the limits of this Act, the owner of such carriage shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding five pounds for each time it is so found. The driver also shall in every such case be liable to a like penalty, unless he proves that he was ignorant of the fact of the carriage being an unlicensed carriage. Any hackney or stage carriage plying for hire, and any hackney carriage found on any stand without having such distinguishing mark, or being otherwise distinguished in such manner as may for the time being be prescribed by the said Secretary of State shall be deemed to be an unlicensed carriage.

3. The Secretary of State for the Home Department has by an order made pursuant to the power given him by sect. 6 of the said statute, dated the 1st Feb. 1870 (regulations Nos. 6 and 7), prescribed the distinguishing mark of a licensed four-wheeled hackney carriage to be a metal plate, bearing the number which is to distinguish such public carriage fixed on the back panel thereof. Subject to certain provisions contained in the said order of the said Secretary of State (regulations Nos. 4, 20, and 27), there is no restriction on the rates to be charged by the proprietor of a licensed hackney carriage.

4. In sect. 4 of the same statute, "stage carriage" is defined to mean "any carriage for the conveyance of passengers which plies for hire in any public street, road, or place within the limits of this Act, and in which the passengers, or any of them, are charged to pay separate and distinct, or at the rate of separate and distinct fares for their respective places or seats therein," and "hackney carriage" to mean "any carriage for the conveyance of passengers which plies for hire within the limits of this Act, and is not a stage carriage," the words "limits of this Act" being simply defined by sect. 2 to be "the Metropolitan Police District, and the City of London and the liberties thereof."

5. The words "plies for hire," in the 7th section, are not defined in the said statute, and no definition of them is given in the 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 22, or any of the earlier Acts; but sect. 15 of the said Metropolitan Carriage Act 1869, enacts that "all the provisions of the Acts relating to hackney carriages and metropolitan stage carriages in force at the time of the commencement of this Act shall, subject to any alteration made therein by this Act or by any order or regulation of the said Secretary of State made in pursuance of this Act, continue in force and all such provisions of the said Acts as relate to licenses granted under those Acts, or any of them, shall, subject to any alteration as aforesaid, apply to licences granted under this Act.

6. It was proved or admitted before me, for the purposes of this case, as follows: that the respondent was the owner of a four-wheeled carriage of the class usually called "broughams," which carriage he, dressed after the manner of a private coachman, himself drove.

7. That the respondent's carriage had no "distinguishing mark" or "numbered plate," such as licensed hackney carriages ought to have, and presented the appearance of a private carriage.

8. That the South-Eastern Railway Company allowed to the proprietors of certain carriages, both of the class known as "cabs" and of the said class usually called "broughams," the right or privilege of coming into the railway station at Cannon-street, and of standing such cabs and broughams by the arrival platform in the interior of such station for the purpose of being hired; the said station in Cannon-street (where the alleged offence is stated to have been committed) being the property of the said South-Eastern Railway Company, to which the general public have no right of access, except when arriving or departing as passengers by the said railway.

9. That the respondent being allowed such privilege from the said South-Eastern Railway Company on the day in question, placed or stood his brougham alongside the arrival platform in the interior of the said station, and spoke to two several passengers who had arrived by train, his object being to get his carriage hired, but neither passenger engaged him.

10. That the railway company so allowed the respondent to stand his carriage in their station for the purpose of accommodating some of their passengers who desired a better class of carriage than those known as "cabs."

11. Upon these facts it was contended by the counsel for the appellant that the respondent had committed the offence with which he was charged, on the following grounds.

(a) That the respondent's carriage was a hackney carriage within the meaning of the statutes.

(b) That there was a "plying for hire" within the terms of the section under which the respondent was charged, although the plying for hire was proved to have been within the said railway station; and upon this point the appellant's counsel relied on the fact that the definition of a hackney carriage given by sect. 4 of the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 115 is, that it is a "carriage for the conveyance of passengers, which plies for hire within the limits of the Acts," without adding, as in the definition given in the same section of a stage carriage, "in any public street, road, or place," and that such definition must be construed literally.

The counsel for the appellant also urged that the said statute having been passed some months after the decision of the Court of Exchequer in Case v. Storey (L. Rep. 4 Ex. 319; 38 L. J. 113 M. C.; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 618), the Legislature must be presumed to have intentionally omitted the words "in any public street, road, or place" from the definition of a hackney carriage, in consequence of that decision.

(c) That if it is necessary for the appellant to prove, to support the present information, that the respondent's carriage was plying in a public place, the said railway station was such a public place within the meaning of the Act.

12. On behalf of the respondent it was contended that,

(a) The respondent's carriage was not a hackney carriage within the meaning of the statutes.

(b) That the Hackney Carriage Act did not, as respects this case, extend to a railway station such as that at Cannon-street, where the alleged offence is charged to have been committed, which is private property.

(c) That there was no "plying" for "hire" within the terms of the section under which the respondent was charged, upon which point the respondent's advocate relied on the decision in the case of Case v. Storey.

(a) That prior to the passing of The Metropolitan Public Carriage Act 1869, the acts done by the respondent would not have constituted an offence, and that if the Legislature had intended to make so violent a change in the law as to prevent private broughams unlicensed as cabs being hired on private property, it would have enacted such a provision in express terms, or in specifying the limits of the Act, or in its definition of a hackney carriage.

13. I dismissed the information, being of opinion that the contention of the respondent's was the correct one; that the evidence and admissions of fact did not show that any offence had been committed by the respondent; and that according to the judgment in the cited case of Case v. Storey, there being no interpretation in the statute, the words "ply for hire" must be taken to mean a plying for hire by any one of the public who might think fit to hire the vehicle in question, and therefore could not apply to a standing or plying for hire under the circumstances which appear in this case, and which are analagous to those in the reported case of Case v. Storey.

14. The question of law arising thereupon, and the grounds of my determination are set out in paragraphs numbered 11, 12, and 13, and the opinion of the court is requested as to whether I ought to have convicted the respondent on the facts before me.

M. White (Griffiths with him) for the appellant. Clarke v. Stanford (24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 389; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 357) is precisely in point in favour of the appellant, and was rightly decided.

Field, Q.C. (Willis with him) for the respondent. —Clarke v. Stanford is no doubt directly in favour of the appellant, but this court is not bound by it, and the case was wrongly decided. To constitute a "plying for hire" within the meaning of the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 115, s. 4, what is done must be in a public place, and a railway station which is private property is not such a public place. Case v. Storey (ubi sup.) is still an authority.

White in reply cited Ex parte Painter (2 C. B. N. S. 702) and Bocking v. Jones (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 739).

WILLES, J.—Without saying what my opinion would have been but for the case in the Queen's Bench, I feel pressed with the authority of that court, and feeling, as I do, the great importance of a concurrence in our decisions, I am driven to the conclusion that the appellant is entitled to our judgment. The case in the Queen's Bench is precisely in point, and not only that, but this is a stronger case, for here it was given in evidence that the respondent applied to one or two persons to hire his fly. I must take it that the Court of Queen's Bench came to the conclusion that the words "in any public street or road" which are found in sects. 4 and 35 of 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 22, were properly omitted from the Act of 1869 by reason of the decision come to by the Court of Exchequer in the case of Case v. Storey, where it was held that these words did not apply to a railway station. I take it that according to Clarke v. Stanford this carriage was a hackney carriage, although it was within the station. Was there then a plying for hire? According to the decision of the Queen's Bench there was. The carriage was in the station and was intentionally exposed so as to be hired by any person. Moreover, it was proved that actual application was made to two persons who arrived by the train, to hire the carriage, so that that strengthens the case as to plying for hire. I think, founding my judgment on that of the Queen's Bench, that there must be judgment for the appellant.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I ground my judgment on the case in the Queen's Bench, where it was held that, if a person exposes his carriage in a place where everybody passing by may be willing to hire it, that is a plying for hire. That case also disposes of the suggestion that there is no distinction between this case and one in which the owner of a carriage keeps it in the stables ready to be hired.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

June 27 and July 28, 1871.

(Before Lord CHELMSFORD, Lord WESTBURY, and Lord COLONSAY.)

MORGAN AND OTHERS v. CRAWSHAY.

Poor rate—43 Eliz. c. 2, s. 1—Galees of mines in Forest of Dean—Non-rateability of iron mines.

In an action by the defendant, the galee of iron mines in the Forest of Dean, against the plaintiffs, the overseers of the parish of East Dean, for having seized the plaintiff's goods as a distress for a poor rate:

Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber), first, that the defendant was an occupier, and not a mere licensee of the mines, the stat. 24 & 25 Vict. c. 40, s. 1 having enacted that a gale of these mines shall be deemed to confer "an interest of the nature of real estate" on the grantee; secondly, that iron, and all other mines except coal mines, were exempt from liability to poor rates under the stat. 43 Eliz. c. 2, s. 1.

THIS was a proceeding in error upon a judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, affirming that of the Court of Queen's Bench in an action brought by the defendant in error against the plaintiffs in error for having seized his goods as a distress for a poor rate.

A special case was stated, without pleadings, by consent and by judge's order, pursuant to sect. 46 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1852.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the defendant in error, as galee of certain mines of iron ore in the Forest of Dean, was liable to be rated to the relief of the poor by virtue of the statute 43 Eliz. c. 2, which, by sect. 1, enables overseers to raise poor rates by taxation of "every occupier of lands, houses, tithes impropriate, propriations of tithes, coal mines, or saleable underwoods in the parish."

The case came on in the Court of Queen's Bench on May 29th 1868, and that court gave judgment pro formâ for the defendant in error without argument.

The Court of Exchequer Chamber, on June 16th 1869, unanimously affirmed the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench: (L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 581.)

Sir R. Palmer, Q.C., H. James, Q.C., and Anstie, for the plaintiffs in error, contended that the defendant as galee and occupier of iron mines was an "occupier of lands" within the meaning of the statute, and therefore liable to be rated.

Manisty, Q.C. and Matthews, Q.C., for the defendant in error, argued that the only mines rateable were those expressly named in the statute, viz., coal mines; and that galees of iron mines in the Forest of Dean were mere licensees under the Crown.

The Award of the Forest of Dean Mining Commissioners, dated June 20, 1841.

July 28.—Lord CHELMSFORD.—My Lords, with respect to the question whether galees of iron mines are liable to be rated as occupiers, the point has been determined by statute. At the time of the passing of the statute 23 & 24 Vict. c. 40, some doubts had been entertained as to the estate and interest conferred by grants of gales of coal and iron within the Forest of Dean. For quieting these doubts sect. 1 of the above Act enacts that the grant of such a gale shall be deemed to confer "an interest of the nature of real estate." The interest of the galee is not, therefore, a mere licence to work the mines, but is of the nature of real estate, and so capable of occupation. It was also admitted in the course of the argument, that the galees of coal mines in the Forest of Dean (and the gales of coal mines are granted in the same manner as those of iron mines) have always been rated as occupiers of the mines. On the further question, whether an occupier of iron mines is rateable, the decisions of both courts below, and the opinions of the six learned judges who have advised your Lordships, are all against his liability to be rated. After these uniform judicial decisions, after more than two and a half centuries of practical acquiescence in the construction of the statute of Elizabeth, there not being a single instance of any other mines than coal mines having been rated to the relief of the poor during this long period, unless it clearly appeared that the decisions had commenced and been continued in error, your Lordships would be very reluctant to disturb the settled law upon the subject. It may be difficult to say why coal mines only were specified in the statute of Elizabeth, and the reasons assigned by Lord Mansfield in the case of The Lead Company v. Richardson (ubi sup.) may not be satisfactory, but the statute must speak for itself, and, mentioning coal mines only, it must be taken to intend these only to be rated. Expressio unius est exclusio alterius. Nor are there wanting express decisions. In the first reported, that of The Lead Company v. Richardson (ubi sup.), decided in 1762, it was held that the lessees of lead mines, who paid no rent, but only a certain part of the ore raised, were not liable to be rated. The cases of Crease v. Sawle, and Reg. v. Todd (ubi sup.), are in no way opposed to the above decision, for these cases determined merely that the lessors of tin and lead mines, receiving a certain proportion of ore by way of rent, were liable to be rated in respect thereof. In Rex v. Inhabitants of Sedgley (2 B. & Ad. 65) it was held that mines, other than coal mines, were not rateable; and Lord Tenterden (p. 73) observed that, though many of the decisions and dicta cited before him were not satisfactory to his mind, yet "the rule of construction had been established and acted upon, and ought to be adhered to, unless it could positively be said to be wrong and productive of inconvenience." Even if the question were one to be considered for the first time, I should, acting on the ordinary rules for the construction of statutes, have been unable to gather an implied intention on the part of the Legislature beyond what it has expressed. I submit that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber should be affirmed.

Lord WESTBURY.—My Lords, assuming the interest of the galee to be a tenement and not merely an incorporeal right, I must still arrive at the conclusion that we should not attempt to disturb the uniform interpretation that the statute of Elizabeth has received. To do so would be to shake rights and titles which have been founded through so many years on the conviction that that interpretation was right, and would not be departed from. The decision in Jones v. The Mersey Dock Company (ubi sup.) is not at variance with the present, for there your Lordships had, there being many conflicting determinations, to come to some settled opinion on the construction of the statute. But here you have everything upon which the people of this country are disposed to rely in the acquisition of property, namely, the uniform declaration of the law for more than two centuries.

Lord COLONSAY concurred.

KELK v. PEARSON.

Light and air—Nature and extent of the right—How acquired—Effect of the Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71), s. 3—Injunction.

The Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71), has made a material alteration in the way in which a right to the access of light and air may be acquired, but it has not in any way altered the nature or extent of the right itself.

In a suit to restrain an interference with the access of light and air to the plaintiff's house, the question for the court to determine is (just as it was before the passing of the Prescription Act), whether the interference complained of would substantially affect the comfortable occupation and enjoyment of the plaintiff's house, according to the ordinary notions of mankind.

The defendant was erecting a row of houses running east and west. The western wall of the house at the west end of the row immediately adjoined the eastern boundary of the plaintiff's garden, which was on the north side of the plaintiff's house. The south frontage line of the defendant's row of houses was almost in a line with the north side of the plaintiff's house. The defendant's houses when completed were intended to be about 32ft. deep, and 45ft. high, which height would exceed by a few feet that of the plaintiff's house. The evidence showed that the nearest house to the plaintiff's house would interfere with the access of light and air thereto, to such an extent as substantially to affect the comfortable enjoyment of the plaintiff's house.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to a perpetual injunction to restrain the building of the house nearest to his own.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants from a decision of Bacon, V.C. (reported 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 458) granting an interlocutory injunction to restrain the defendants from building certain houses so as to interfere with the access of light and air to the plaintiff's house. The facts are very fully stated in the former report, and it is unnecessary now to repeat them. The appeal came on by way of appeal motion, but before the arguments were concluded it was arranged upon the suggestion of the court that the matter should stand over, and that the plaintiff should give a notice of motion for decree, which should be heard and finally disposed of by their Lordships with the appeal motion.

E. E. Kay, Q. C. and Fielding Nalder, on behalf of the plaintiff, contended that the Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71), s. 3, gave to the owner of a house an absolute and indefeasible right to the access of all the light and air which he had enjoyed for twenty years. They relied also upon the evidence in the case as proving that the defendants' houses would interfere to such an extent with the access of light and air to the plaintiff's house as to entitle him to the interference of this court.

R. P. Amphlett, Q. C. and J. T. Crossley, on behalf of the defendants, were directed to confine their arguments on the evidence to the case of the house nearest to the plaintiff's house. Upon this point they urged that the plaintiff had not made out his case. They also contended that no alteration in the nature or extent of the right to the access of light and air had been produced by the Prescription Act.

Lord Justice JAMES said that it had been contended that the Prescription Act gave to the owner of a house an absolute and indefeasible right of property in all the light and air coming to his premises, of which he had had twenty years' enjoyment. That Act, however, his Lordship thought had made no alteration in the previously settled law with regard to the nature and extent of the right to the access of light and air. Before that Act passed it had been well settled that the owner of a house had a right to the access of so much light and air as would, according to the ordinary notions of mankind, be sufficient for the comfortable use and enjoyment of his house. The owner of a house had a right to prevent his neighbour from building upon his land in such a way as to interfere with the access of light and air to the house to an extent which would make the occupation of the house substantially less comfortable than be-

In his Lordship's opinion that right re- ed since the Prescription Act exactly the as it was before. The question was in all one of degree, which the court, acting as a must determine on the evidence. In all the since the Act the law had been laid down in way. Applying this rule to the facts of the nt case, his Lordship said that in his opinion vidence adduced by the plaintiff far pre- erated over that which was adduced by defendants, and it was established that efendants' houses materially diminished the nt of light coming to the plaintiff's house so bstantially to affect the comfortable occupa- f it. His Lordship agreed with very much of was said in Clarke v. Clark (ubi sup.) as to fluence which the balance of convenience and venience should have upon the interference of ourt. The court, with regard to that, would more readily interfere by injunction in one han in another. In this case, if the injunc- was granted, the result would be that the dants would be prevented from making use of all piece of building ground, while, on the hand, if the injunction was refused, the com- f the plaintiff's dwelling house would be ially diminished. The balance of convenience vidently in favour of granting the injunction, he plaintiff ought to have his legal right en- l by the assistance of this court. A manda- injunction must be granted to compel the dants to pull down that house which was st to the plaintiff's garden, to the height at his garden wall formerly stood. The plain- ing thus successful in the suit, would, as a al rule, be entitled to his costs. It was d that he ought not to have his costs because d, by his bill, asked for too much, and because ce-Chancellor had granted an injunction which too far. It did not, however, appear that the dants had been put to any further expense by a of this, and, consequently, there was no ld for depriving the plaintiff of the costs of uit.

d Justice MELLISH was of the same opinion. ntirely agreed in thinking that no alteration nature and extent of the right to the access ht and air had been made by the Prescription The Act had made a very material altera- n the way in which the right was acquired, had made no alteration in the nature of the itself. It must be remembered that even now ght was not always gained exclusively by the tion of the statute, but it was often acquired ans of an implied grant from the owner of a bouring tenement, as, for instance, where was a severance of adjoining tenements held e owner. It would be a very inconvenient if the nature of the right to light and air lifferent when acquired under the statute from what it was when acquired by an im- grant. The rule at law was clearly settled the Act was passed, and it was thus laid in Parker v. Smith (5 C. & P. 438): "It is ery possible, every speculative, exclusion of which is the ground of an action; but that the law recognises is such a diminution of as really makes the premises to a sensible less fit for the purposes of business." question to be determined was always Is the plaintiff's house made by the lant's building substantially less fit for occupation than it was? That was the rule in a court of law, and the rule in this court was in effect the same. No general rule could be laid down as to the exact quantity of light to which a man was entitled; it was eminently a question of degree. Upon the evidence in the present case his Lordship was clearly of opinion that the plaintiff could maintain an action at law. The duty of this court was to decide the matter once for all and put an end to the litigation. This court could not deprive the plaintiff of his right to bring his action without giving him any relief. It must, therefore, either finally settle the matter in dispute, or it must leave the plaintiff at liberty to bring action after action at law. Then this court might adopt one of two courses, either grant a mandatory injunction, or compensate the plaintiff by damages once for all. Seeing, however, that the plaintiff desired to occupy his house with the same comfort as before, and that the granting an injunction would only deprive the defendants of the ground-rent of one house, which it appeared was about 12*l.* a year, his Lordship was of opinion that the case was one in which a mandatory injunction ought to be granted, instead of giving the plaintiff compensation by means of damages.

COUSENS v. ROSE.

Lease—Grant of right of way—Construction.

In a lease the lessor demised certain hereditaments, together with free liberty and right of way and passage, and of ingress, egress, and regress to and for the lessees and lessee, their or his workmen and servants, and all and every other persons and person by their or his authority or permission, from time to time, and at all times during the continuance of the lease, by, through, and over a certain roadway or passage, jointly with the lessor and other the tenant or tenants, occupier or occupiers for the time being of the adjoining land:

Held, that this gave a right of way for foot passengers only, and did not extend to horses and carts.

BY an indenture dated the 7th March 1860, Winn demised to the defendant Rose and his partner a shipyard and dry dock, together with free liberty and right of way and passage, and of ingress, egress, and regress to and for the lessees, their workmen and servants, and all and every other persons and person by their or his authority or permission, from time to time, and at all times during the continuance of the lease, by, through, and over a certain roadway, or passage, jointly with the lessor, his executors, administrators, and assigns, and other the tenant or tenants, occupier or occupiers for the time being of the adjoining land.

The plaintiffs, who were the lessees, under an agreement dated the 8th Dec. 1865, of a warehouse known as the Gun Wharf, which had been built by Winn on a piece of land separated from the dock by the roadway mentioned in the lease of the 7th March 1860, instituted the present suit to establish their exclusive right to the use of the roadway.

The bill prayed, first, that it might be declared that the plaintiffs were, under or by virtue of the memorandum of agreement of the 8th Dec. 1865, entitled to the sole and exclusive right and use of the said strip of land or roadway partitioned to the said Gun Wharf as aforesaid for the residue of the said term thereby agreed to be granted, subject to the performance of the provisions in the said agreement contained on the part of the said Thomas Gooch, and that the defendants, William Comer Scott, and Thomas Isaac Large, as legal personal representatives of the said Charles Winn, might be decreed specifically to perform the said agreement, the plaintiffs being willing and thereby offering specifically to perform the same on their part; secondly, that the defendants might be decreed at their own costs and charges forthwith to remove, or to cause the said earth, stones, bricks, and rubbish, and all other obstructions, shot or placed by them, or any or either of them, their or any or either of their agents, workmen or servants upon the said roadway, or any part thereof, to be removed, and also to restore and repair the said fence broken down as aforesaid; thirdly, that the said several defendants, their respective agents, servants and workmen, might thenceforth, and at all times, during the residue of the term granted or agreed to be granted by the said memorandum of agreement of the 8th Dec. 1865, be restrained by the order and injunction of the court from shooting or placing any earth, stones, bricks, rubbish, or other matters, or things upon the said roadway, or any part thereof, and from in any manner obstructing or interfering with the plaintiffs in the right of use of the said roadway, and from removing, pulling down, or injuring, or causing, or permitting to be removed, pulled down, or injured, the said fence and buildings, or any part of such fence or buildings.

The other facts of the case will be found fully set forth in his Lordship's judgment, which was in writing.

April 19.—Lord ROMILLY.—This is a suit instituted asking first for a declaration that the plaintiffs are entitled to the exclusive right of the roadway adjoining their warehouse, and secondly, seeking to obtain a perpetual injunction to restrain the defendants from interfering with the plaintiffs' right of way. The case and the frame of the bill are peculiar in many respects, but some statement of the facts is necessary in order to explain it. In Dec. 1857, Winn, Rose, and Crowder carried on business in partnership as shipwrights at the place in question, in Wapping, called the Gun Dock and Wharf. The land belonged to Winn under a lease for ninety-nine years from Michaelmas 1857. In March 1860 the partnership was dissolved as from the 30th Jan. preceding. Winn thereupon divided the property included in his lease into two portions, both fronting the river. The easternmost portion, called the Gun Dock, he demised to Rose and Crowder, and on the remaining or westernmost portion, called the Gun Wharf, he erected a set of warehouses, which he let to Messrs. Page and Son. Between the edge of the dock and the wall of the warehouses lay a strip of land, 23ft. in breadth, extending from the Wapping-road on the north to the river on the south, through the whole extent of the property. Of this strip a portion, consisting of 14ft. in breadth, was paved by Winn and a strong curb, 3in. in height, placed at the easternmost extremity of it. This is proved to have been done in the month of Jan. 1860, at the sole expense of Winn, and not at the expense of the partnership, as alleged by Rose. Upon this curb Winn erected a close wooden fence 6ft. high, The question at issue between the parties to this suit is whether the defendant Rose has a right of using this strip of land in every part of it as a general mode of access to his dock. After a change of tenants, and a short occupation by the War Department of the warehouse in question, Winn entered into a contract with the plaintiffs on the 8th Dec. 1865 to demise the warehouse known as the Gun Wharf to the plaintiffs for twenty-one years at the yearly rent of 1700*l*. The extent of the property demised is specified in a plan attached to the contract, and it includes the strip of land in question of 14ft. in breadth. Winn died in Jan. 1868. The defendants Scott and Large are his executors. The bill thereupon makes them parties, and prays specific performance against them as well as an injunction against Rose, who, by arrangement with Crowder, has become the sole owner of the Gun Dock. A suit so constituted is obviously multifarious, and, like most suits so constituted, is in a most inconvenient and irregular frame, but as objection has not been taken to it by way of demurrer, it is too late to do so now. I may, therefore, at once dispose of the case so far as the executors are concerned. They, on the whole, submit to act as the court shall direct. They admit the contract, and though they raise some difficulties as to obtaining a licence from the ground landlord to demise a portion of the property included in the contract made by Winn with the plaintiffs, they do not resist specific performance. It is, I think, reasonably clear that they can obtain the consent of the ground landlord for a reasonable sum of money, or, if they cannot, then the contract must be specifically performed with a compensation for this omission. They do, however, suggest that the including of this piece of land in the contract was not intended, but that doing so was a blunder and a mistake on the part of Winn. Still as regards them the suit must be treated as an ordinary suit for specific performance, and if they intended to object they have not done what they might and ought to have done for that purpose, viz., have demurred to the bill for multifariousness; and on the whole they seem to me to give their evidence fairly and honestly without favour to either side. The plaintiffs cannot, therefore, complain of them or the course they have pursued. Before filing the bill the plaintiffs should have tendered to Scott and Large the conveyance of the Gun Wharf according to the contract subject to such rights as Rose might possess.

e defendants had then declined to execute the eyance, or had refused to attempt to obtain onsent of the ground landlord for the little of land included in the contract, or if they declined to include in the conveyance the of land specified in the plan annexed to the act, I might, on a bill being filed for specific rmance against them, have compelled them y the costs of it. But not only was this not but no application was ever made to them ie subject, and as the plaintiffs had been for al years in occupation of the property demised, ut asking for a lease, the defendants might suppose that they were content with the occupation under the agreement, and did equire the conveyance. Such being the case, not, I think, refuse to give them their costs is suit, assuming, as I do, that they will now all the necessary steps for enabling them e the plaintiffs a proper lease according to ontract, or, if they cannot, allow compensa- or such part as they cannot convey, and the e as to them will simply be for specific per- nce with a reference to chambers to settle ase in case the parties differ. The case as to efendant Rose is very different, and is more licated. The lease by Winn to Rose and der unquestionably gives them a right of way the strip of land in dispute. About this I tain no doubt. I disregard entirely the sug- n that the words in the lease to Rose and der applied solely and exclusively to the 9ft. ning strip of the piece of land in ques- by the side of the dock. I am clear that ght granted extended to the whole strip of broad. Nor do I doubt that the plaintiffs lue notice of this right of way when they the lease. The next question is what was haracter of the right of way so granted, and privileges did it confer on Rose and Crowder? e referring to the exact words of the grant I it proper to point out the construction Mr. Rose himself has put upon them, and he claims to be entitled to do. During the 1867, and during the life of Winn, some pro- were made by Winn, in conjunction with to give the plaintiffs a building lease of the of the Gun Dock. Winn, as I have stated, n Jan. 1868, and then offers were renewed in following by Rose and Crowder, and were ed by the plaintiffs in June of that year. ly after, in the same month of June, the dant Rose removed a portion of the fence, eposited for a short period of time a consider- amount of rubbish and earth on the 14ft. of land in question. The defendant Rose ot justify the deposit of rubbish and earth, e says this was merely temporary and was diately removed, but the rest of his acts he es on the following grounds:—First, he says n 1861 he claimed this right, and mentioned he storekeeper of the War Department, then upation of the warehouse, and that again in by permission of the War Department, who ccupied the warehouse, and who had inquired is right, he was allowed to pull down the where it interfered with the power of loading from his dock. This was complained of by , through the defendant Large, who then is agent, and the fence was replaced, as ould seem, by Rose, or by some one s behalf. Again in March 1864 Rose and Crowder wrote to Winn to this effect: "Dear Sir, —We beg to call your attention to the fence and privies illegally erected upon the roadway between Gun Dock and Gun Wharf, and which materially interfere with the rights and privileges granted under our lease. We have, therefore, to request that they may be removed within seven days from the date hereof." And shortly afterwards Rose removed a portion of the fence. This was complained of by Winn in a letter of May 1864, to which I shall again refer. In it he denied Rose's right to do this, and insisted that his right of way was merely a right of way for persons, and not extending to anything beyond this. To this remonstrance of Winn's, no answer was made, and the palings were again replaced in a temporary manner. Nothing further seems to have been done till June 1868, when the trespass I have already stated occurred. Thereupon the plaintiffs filed this bill on the 13th July 1868, and obtained an injunction from Giffard, V.C., confined to the second paragraph of the prayer of the bill. I now come to consider the construction and the effect of the exact words of the grant made to Rose and Crowder, which is now vested in Rose, in order to ascertain whether they justify the claim made, or the act committed. The words are these: He gives them the property specified in the margin coloured pink, "together with the free liberty and right of way and passage and of ingress, egress, and regress to, and for them and him, their and his workmen and servants, and all and every other person or persons by their or his authority or permission from time to time, and at all times hereafter during the continuance of this demise, in, by, through, and over the said roadway or passage lying to the west of the said premises hereby demised jointly with the said Charles Winn, his executors, administrators, and assigns, and other the tenant or tenants, occupier or occupiers, for the time being, of Gun Wharf aforesaid, his or their agents or appointees," to hold and exercise the same for the term of twenty-one years. The first thing that strikes me on reading these words is that, whatever be the construction on the question whether the right of way extends to horses and carriages or whether it is confined to foot passengers, nothing can justify the conduct of the defendant Rose in pulling down the fence. The fence is admitted to be constructed on land not included in the demise to Rose and Crowder, and it is obvious that the common law right to build a wall or fence on his own land which belonged to Winn, was in no respect abrogated or controlled by anything contained in this demise, and it is clear that this right is conferred on the plaintiffs. It is also clear that the repeated trespasses of Rose could not create such a right or vest it in him, even if they had been unaccompanied by the repeated remonstrances of Winn. Still less could it justify the deposit of obstructions on the roadway, for however short a time. In the matter originally complained of, therefore, by the plaintiffs, viz., the pulling down the fence and the deposit of earth, I am clear that the defendant Rose was in the wrong. I am also of opinion that this grant is not that of a general undefined right of way such as existed in the cases referred to by Mr. Southgate, but that it is a right of way granted for foot passengers only and confined to them; that is, a right of way including the defendant Rose, including his workmen, and also including any person or persons he may think fit to authorise, and all these persons are to be able to pass in, by and through this passsage or 14ft. roadway, but no one else, and nothing more. This also it is clear was the intention of the parties, as is shown in the following passage from the letter of Winn on the 17th May 1864, to which I have already referred, viz., "I am willing, however, to believe that you have acted upon erroneous impressions, so ask your attention to the fact, first, that the fence is my property and stands on my ground, being the partition between the premises leased to you and my roadway, and does not interfere with the reasonable exercise of your right of way over the road, provision for which, it being only for persons, was made by arrangement with you at the time of the erection of the fence and water-closets, by a wicket being placed at the south end of it (key of which was handed to you, and is, no doubt, still in your possession), so, that being mine, you have no right to interfere with it." Then he goes on with another subject, supposing it to be so. It is to be observed that no answer was sent or any denial or objection urged by Rose to this letter. This, in fact, disposes of the whole case. I cannot make the declaration asked for by the plaintiffs in the first paragraph of the prayer of the bill. But I will make it in these terms: I am willing to declare that, subject and according to the provisions in the said agreement contained, on the part of the said Thomas Gooch, and subject to the right of way to and for the defendant Rose himself, and to and for his workmen and servants, and to and for every other person authorised by him, in, by, through, and over the said strip of land, to enter and the like, in the words of the agreement, giving them an exclusive right of way, subject to this right; or I will make a declaration specifying how I limit the right of way granted in the indenture of the 7th March 1860, in the words I have already read. I think the plaintiffs are entitled to a decree in the terms of the second paragraph of the prayer of the bill (if not already done), and that they are also entitled to an injunction in the terms of the third paragraph of the prayer of the bill. And I am clearly of opinion that this suit has been rendered necessary by the misconduct or mistake of the defendant Rose, and that he must pay the costs of the suit, but not including the costs which the plaintiffs will have to pay the defendants Scott and Large. I do not except from the costs Rose will have to pay so much of the costs as relate to the specific performance, because in the first place they but slightly increase the amount of costs as between the plaintiffs and Rose, and are confined to a few paragraphs in the bill, and also because if the defendant Rose intended to insist on that he should have demurred for multifariousness.

BUBB v. YELVERTON (LORD CHARLES KER'S CLAIM).

Racing bets—Betting agent—Authority to bet—Implied promise to pay.

A testator had requested a friend to bet for him on certain horses, and the friend had paid the amount lost by the bets.

Held, that the request to bet implied authority to pay the bets if lost, and that the friend was entitled to prove against the testator's estate for the amount paid by him in respect of the bets.

ADJOURNED summons.

This was an application by Lord Charles Ker for leave to prove against the estate of the Marquis of Hastings, which was being administered in the above suit, for the sum of 850*l.*, paid by him on behalf of the Marquis under the following circumstances:

The Marquis had requested Lord Charles Ker to bet for him at the Newmarket Houghton meeting 1867, telling him what horses to back and what amounts to lay. In accordance with his instructions, Lord Charles Ker laid twenty-nine bets in all, on which he won 605*l.* and lost 1455*l.*, the net loss amounting to 850*l.*

The losses were paid on the settling day following the Houghton meeting by a Mr. Brewer, who was Lord Charles Ker's commissioner, and Lord Charles Ker received the amount of the winnings. After the death of the Marquis, he applied to the executors, Admiral Yelverton and Mr. Padwick, for payment of the balance of 850*l.*, as a debt due from the estate; but the residuary legatees objected to the payment being made, contending that the claim was illegal, as the payment had been made in respect of racing debts.

Southgate, Q. C. and Brooksbank, for the claimant.—The 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 18, does not make wagering contracts illegal, but merely incapable of being enforced; therefore there was nothing illegal in Lord Charles Ker's making the bets on account of the Marquis of Hastings. We have clear evidence that the Marquis requested the claimant to make the bet, and we submit that the request necessarily implied an authority to pay the bets if lost, and that the claimant is, therefore, entitled to recover the amount of his claim. Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C. and Pemberton, for the residuary legatees of the Marquis, cited Boyse v. Adams (26 L. J., N. S., 841, Ch.), where the amount of a bet lost at a horse race had been paid by the loser into the hands of a third party, upon the faith of the promise of the latter to pay it to the winner, and the person who had received the money died before he had paid it to the winner, and a claim by the winner to be paid the amount out of the assets of the deceased was disallowed. They also referred to Grisewood v. Blane, 11 C. B. 526.

Jessel, Q. C. and Rowcliffe, for the executors of the marquis.

Lord ROMILLY said that it was merely a question of evidence, and that he had no doubt that Lord Charles Ker's account of the matter was true. If the Marquis of Hastings asked him to bet, that implied authority to pay any bets that were lost, and a promise to repay the amount so paid. The applicant had expended 850*l.* on the faith of an implied promise of this kind. His Lordship was of opinion that Lord Charles Ker could have maintained an action at law against the marquis for the amount. Lord Charles Ker made the payment at the request of the marquis, he was a mere agent, and was not involved in the illegality of the transaction. The claim must, therefore, be admitted, and the costs added to the amount.

Re KILVERT'S TRUSTS.

Bequest to charitable society—Inaccurate description—Claim by two charitable societies—Application cy près—Apportionment.

A testatrix by her will bequeathed a legacy to a charitable society in the diocese of W. Although there had been formerly such a society, there was not at the date of the will a society accurately answering the description, the diocese of W. having previously to the date of the will been increased by the addition of the archdeaconry of C., and the whole diocese divided into two archdeaconries, viz., W. and C. (the archdeaconry of W. being co-extensive with the former diocese of W.), in each of which there was at the date of the will a society in name and objects very similar to those of the old society named in the will, the old society restricting itself with a slight alteration in its title and objects to the archdeaconry of W.

Held, that there being no evidence that the testatrix was aware that the old society had restricted itself to the archdeaconry of W., the apparent general charitable intention towards the diocese of W. must be regarded, and the legacy divided between the two societies.

FRANCIS MARIA KILVERT, late of the city of Worcester, spinster, by her will dated the 7th July 1868, gave, amongst other legacies, a sum of 10,000*l.* free of legacy duty "to the treasurer for the time being of the fund for the relief of the widows and orphans of the Clergy of the Diocese of Worcester to be applied by him for the benefit of that charity," such legacy to be paid out of such part of her personal estate as she could lawfully charge with the payment of legacies to charitable uses. The will contained also a residuary bequest.

The testatrix died in Nov. 1870, and her will was proved in the same year. In April 1871, the executors paid the legacy into court under the Trustee Relief Act, on the ground that claims had been made by two charitable societies with respect to the legacy.

The contending claims arose under the following circumstances: The diocese of Worcester comprised, previously to the year 1837, only one archdeaconry, namely, the archdeaconry of Worcester, which was in extent identical with the diocese of Worcester, but in the year 1837 the archdeaconry of Coventry was separated from the existing diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, and united to the diocese of Worcester, which after that time consisted of two archdeaconries, namely, Worcester and Coventry.

The society named in the will of the testatrix was founded in the year 1777, but in the year 1848 its name was changed to that of "The Society for the Relief of Clergymen's Widows and Orphans and Necessitous Clergymen in the Archdeaconry of Worcester," as it was not intended to extend the operations of the society to the archdeaconry of Coventry.

Another society had also been formed with a similar object, under the title of the "Charity for the Relief of Necessitous Clergymen, their Widows and Children, within the Archdeaconry of Coventry."

It appeared that the father of the testatrix had been for many years a subscriber to the old society in the diocese of Worcester before the addition of the archdeaconry of Coventry had been made to the diocese, and that since his death the mother of the testatrix had continued his subscription to the society in the archdeaconry of Worcester, and that the testatrix herself had been a subscriber thereto.

Cotton, Q.C. and Walker for the society in the archdeaconry of Worcester, now applied to have the fund paid out to them. They submitted that the court must look to see what was the connection of the testatrix with the society, and would take notice of the fact of the testatrix's own subscription to the society in the archdeaconry of Worcester, and would inquire into every material fact for the purpose of ascertaining the object of the testatrix's bounty. They referred to:

Still v. Hoste, 6 Madd. 192;
1 Jarm. on Wills. 2nd edit. p. 360;

Glasse, Q.C. and Vaughan Hawkins for the Coventry Society, contended that as the description in the testatrix's will did not accurately apply to either society, the fund must be applied cy près, and divided between the two societies. They argued further that evidence of the testatrix's subscription to one of the societies could not be admitted. They referred to the following cases:

Cotton, Q.C. in reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR, after stating the circumstances of the case and referring to the fact of the subscriptions by the testatrix's father and mother, and to her own subscription, which he observed was not to the old society but to the present society in the archdeaconry of Worcester, said that if it had been shown that the testatrix had known that the old society had since the year 1849 restricted itself to the archdeaconry of Worcester, he should have held it clear that the society for which the petitioners claimed was entitled to the whole of the legacy; but it was not shown that she knew of this, though it might be conjectured that she did. He could not find any warrant for attributing to the testatrix an intention to exclude a clergyman from the benefit of her bequest, because he resided in the diocese of Worcester but not in the archdeaconry of Worcester; that there was no society accurately answering the description in the will, and he could not come to the conclusion that the testatrix meant to confine her bounty to the archdeaconry of Worcester. He must hold that there being no one charity answering the particular description contained in the will, and being of opinion that the testatrix's bounty was meant to apply to the whole diocese of Worcester, the legacy must be divided between the two charitable societies.

Re THAKEHAM SEQUESTRATION MONEY.

Suspensio: — Sequestration — Right to surplus moneys on sequestration after payment of curate in charge.

In the year 1845 the Rev. Mr. H., the rector of T., was suspended for three years, and the suspension was followed by sequestration. The bishop, after providing for the minister in charge, placed the surplus profits of the living to an account at his bankers, entitled, "The Bishop of C. Thakeham account." On the death of the bishop in 1870 this fund was claimed by his executors, and also by Mr. Hurst under an alleged agreement, by the churchwardens of Thakeham, and by the present bishop. The bankers paid the fund into court under the Trustee Relief Act.

Held, that the representatives of the late bishop were absolutely entitled to the whole fund, and that the bankers ought not to have paid it into court.

In the year 1845 certain proceedings were taken in the Arches Court of Canterbury in a suit of Travers v. Hurst, and by a decree in that suit the Rev. John Hurst, rector of Thakeham, in the county of Sussex and diocese of Chichester, was suspended for three years from the discharge of his duty and from receiving any of the profits of the rectory; and in pursuance of that decree letters of sequestration were issued on the 18th July 1845. During the sequestration the profits and emoluments of the living were paid by the sequestrator into the bank of Messrs. Dendy and Co., to the credit of an account entitled: "The Bishop of Chichester. Thakeham Account;" and such account was from time to time drawn upon for the salary of the officiating minister and for other necessary expenses, and part of the moneys so paid in were invested in Exchequer Bills. The Right Rev. Ashurst Turner was Bishop of Chichester previously to the year 1845, and continued bishop till his death on the 21st Feb. 1870. He duly made a will by which he appointed Robert Wintle Wintle and the Rev. Thomas Morrell Gilbert, the petitioners in this matter, his executors. On the 18th April 1871 the bankers, Messrs. Dendy and Co., paid into court, under the Trustee Relief Act, the sum of 262*l.* 0*s.* 5*d.* cash to the credit of "The Bishop of Chichester. Thakeham account," and also deposited to the like credit two Exchequer Bills for 500*l.* and 100*l.* respectively. They stated that the whole or part of this fund had been claimed by the petitioners, by Mr. Hurst, the rector, by the churchwardens and overseers of the parish of Thakeham, and by the present bishop. It further appeared that Mr. Hurst's claim rested on a letter which had been written by the late bishop to one of the parishioners of Thakeham, in which he offered to pay Mr. Hurst "a portion of the surplus" if he would agree not to interfere with the sequestrator, and if certain conditions with respect to proposed schools were complied with.

Kay, Q.C. and Pemberton appeared for the petitioners.—They argued that the effect of suspension followed by sequestration was that the bishop became entitled to the whole of the emoluments of the benefice subject only to the duty incumbent on him to provide for the cure of the parish. They cited in support of this proposition:

Bunter v. Cresswell, 14 Q. B. 835;
Pinden v. Barr, 24 L. J. 30.

They also urged that the agreement with Mr. Hurst could not be supported, because a letter to a parishioner cannot be considered to amount to an agreement with Mr. Hurst, or binding as between Mr. Hurst and the bishop; also the condition of the agreement was not carried out both with respect to the schools and to the institution of a suit which interfered with the sequestrator as far as the glebe lands of the living were concerned, and also because the agreement was too vague and Mr. Hurst had not made any claim for more than twenty years during the life of the late bishop, they submitted that his claim could not be supported.

Fry, Q.C. and Freeman, for Mr. Hurst, contended that the words "a portion of the surplus" was a sufficiently certain agreement to be binding in law, and especially as the agreement had been carried out on Mr. Hurst's part by non-interference with the sequestrator; they further contended that the suit referred to clearly showed that the sequestrator had no jurisdiction over the glebe lands, and argued that its institution could be no interference with his duties. As to the lapse of time, they stated that Mr. Hurst supposed the whole of the proceeds of the living were applied either to the support of the incumbent, or to the necessary law expenses, or towards building a church near Chichester. And lastly, they contended that it was impossible that the bishop could be entitled to this surplus for his own private benefit.

Kingdon, for the churchwardens and overseers of the parish, referred to Hubbard v. Beckford, 1 Con. Rep. 307;

The Church Discipline Act (3 & 4 Vict. c. 86), ss. 12 and 13 to show that the bishop might have been, and to a certain extent must have been, a judge in the cause which deprived Mr. Hurst of the living, and it was therefore impossible he could be allowed to take any private benefit under the sequestration. He submitted that the parish was properly entitled to the surplus profits during a vacancy:

Burn's Justice, vol. 4, p. 1.

Woodroffe, for the present bishop, said he had put on a "moral distringas," but that he had no legal claim.

Alfred Smith appeared for the bankers, who had paid the money into court.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said there was no doubt, and it was a point perfectly well established, both upon authority and in principle, that the profits and emoluments of a living, after sequestration,

. to the bishop. It was quite competent ishop, had he so desired, to perform the hich devolve upon the incumbent in his son, and indeed if he could not find a ; was his duty so to do, and then he would ed to the whole profits of the living. If, ther hand, he preferred to perform this deputy, then it was equally clear that, viding for the proper remuneration of ister whom he placed in charge, he itled to the balance of such profits. st had made no claim for twenty-two uring the whole lifetime of the late but now set up an alleged agreement. f that agreement was that he should rfere with the sequestrator, and he rly forfeited any claim he might have er such agreement by most effectually ng the sequestrator in his endeavour to e rents of the glebe lands. But in any greement to give "a portion of the sur- ould have been too vague and uncertain . His Honour thought that neither the bishop, nor the churchwardens, had any to appear at all, and that the bankers who the fund into court had occasioned the this absurd litigation. He said the funds paid to the petitioners as prayed, and o allow costs to any of the respondents.

PANY OF PROPRIETORS OF THE NEATH CANAL TION (apps.) v. THE CHURCHWARDENS AND ERS OF THE POOR OF THE PARISH OF (resps.)

ill. 4, c. 90 (The General Watching and g Act), s. 33 — Canal — Rateability — s, buildings, and property other than

h Canal is possessed and maintained by an rated company of proprietors, under statu- nwers. The land occupied by the canal is faced and lined in certain parts with nd masonry) and towing-path, have on, longing, and incident thereto, and neces- the occupation and use thereof, certain r fastening vessels and barges, a paddle shut off the water for the purposes of re- one bridges, culverts, and a dry dock (used repairing canal boats), lined with masonry part of the said canal and towing-path.

eneral Lighting and Watching Act (3 & 4 , c. 90, s. 33) "owners and occupiers of buildings, and property (other than land) to the relief of the poor in any parish," be rated at "a rate in the pound three reater than that at which the owners and rs of land shall be rated." By sect. 34, courtyard, yard, or garden (such garden ng a market garden or nursery ground) shall be included in and make part of the assess- ment to be made on the house, buildings, or other property to which they may be respectively at- tached."

The appellants were rated to a watching and lighting rate, made for the parish of Neath, in respect of the canal and towing-path, as occupiers of "build- ings . . . . or property other than land," at a sum three times greater than that at which the owners and occupiers of "land" were rated.

On appeal against a decision of sessions confirming the rate:

Held, that, as the masonry works in and about the canal were mere accessories to it, the whole con- struction was "land" simply, and as such, there- fore, liable only to the lower rate.

ON an appeal to the Glamorganshire quarter sessions against a rate or assessment for the watching and lighting of the parish of Neath it was ordered that the said rate or assessment should be confirmed with costs, subject to the following

CASE:

1. The appellants are, and at the time of making the rate hereinafter mentioned were, the owners and occupiers of a certain canal, towing path, and premises hereinafter more particularly mentioned and described, a portion of which is situate in the parish of Neath, in the county of Glamorgan.

2. By a rate or assessment duly made and published in the month of July A.D. 1870, in and for the parish of Neath, for the purposes of the watching and lighting of the parish, under 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 90, the appellants were rated and required to pay, as the occupiers of that part of the canal and towing path, lying and situate within the parish, the sum of 9*d.* in the pound, on 161*l.*, the rateable value of the portion of the canal, towing path, and premises fixed by and mentioned in the said rate. This was the rate appealed against.

3. By 31 Geo. 3, c. lxxxv., amended by 38 Geo. 3, c. xxx., (both of which Acts are declared by the last sections to be public Acts), after reciting "That the making and maintaining a canal or navigable communication for the navigation of boats, barges, and other vessels from or near a certain place called Abernant, in the county of Glamorgan, to and through a certain place called 'The Brick- field,' near Melincrythan Pill, in the river of Neath, near the town of Neath, in the said county, will open communication with several extensive mines, quarries, woods, ironworks, and collieries, and be of great utility," the company of proprietors of the Neath Canal Navigation (the appellants) were incorporated by that style, and were accord- ingly authorised to make and maintain such canal, and to purchase, take and hold lands and grounds for that purpose.

4. By sect. 68 of the first-mentioned Act it was enacted "That the said company of proprietors shall from time to time be rated to all Parlia- mentary and parochial taxes and assessments for and in respect of the lands and grounds to be pur- chased or taken by the said company of proprietors, in pursuance of this Act, in the same proportion as other lands and grounds so to be purchased or taken would be rateable, in case the same were the property of individuals in their natural capacity." And by the 69th section of the same Act it was enacted "That the said company of proprietors shall not be rated or contributory to any parochial taxes or assessments for or in respect of the rates and tonnage received by them, under and by virtue of the Act, from persons navigating the said canal."

5. Under the provisions and powers of the above statute the company proceeded to purchase and take the lands necessary for the construction of the works thereby authorised, which included the land now occupied by the canal and towing path and premises herein mentioned, in the parish of Neath, the mode of rating which is the subject matter of this appeal.

6. The said land occupied by the said canal (which is faced and lined in certain parts within the said parish with stone and masonry) and towing path, have on and belonging to them and incident thereto, and necessary to the occupation and use thereof, certain posts for fastening the vessels and barges on the said canal thereto, a paddle or valve used to shut off the water from one part of the canal for the purposes of repair, stone bridges, culverts, and a dry dock (used only for repairing canal boats), lined with masonry, forming part of the said canal and towing path.

7. There is a gas lamp erected upon the bridge carrying the turnpike road over the canal, which throws light partly upon the turnpike road and partly upon the canal and towing path. There are three other lamps erected upon a highway which runs parallel with the canal on the opposite side of the canal to the towing path, but upon the side of the highway nearest to the canal, and which throws light upon the said highway, and upon the canal and towing path. There are two other lamps upon or adjacent to the appellants' towing path, which also throw light upon the canal and towing path. There are two other lamps upon or adjacent to the appellants' towing path which also throw light upon the canal and towing path. The distance from the first, or turnpike road lamp, to the first of the three highway lamps is about 330 yards. The other lamps are at distances of from sixty to eighty yards apart, the whole being within a distance of three-eighths of a mile, while the total length of the canal in the town of Neath is about a mile and a half.

8. By 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 90, intituled, "An Act to Repeal an Act of the 11 Geo. 4 for the Lighting and Watching of Parishes in England and Wales, and to make other Provisions in lieu thereof," it was enacted, by sect. 32—

That as soon as the inspectors have been elected as aforesaid, it shall be lawful for them, or any two or more of them, from time to time to issue an order under their hands to the overseers of the poor of any parish to which the provisions of this Act shall be extended, by which order they shall require the said overseers to levy the amount mentioned in the said order.

It was further enacted by sect. 33—

That the overseers aforesaid shall, for the purpose of collecting, raising, and levying the rate necessary for the purposes of this Act, proceed in the same manner and have the same powers, remedies, and privileges as for levying money for the relief of the poor in the said parish: Provided always, that the owners and occupiers of houses, buildings, and property (other than land) rateable to the relief of the poor in any such parish, shall be rated at and pay a rate in the pound three times greater than that at which the owners and occupiers of land shall be rated at and pay for the purposes of this Act: Provided also, that the total amount of the sum to be collected, raised, and levied for the purposes of this Act within any one year shall not exceed such sum as shall have been agreed on by the inhabitants of the said parish as aforesaid; and that the said sum shall be assessed upon the full and fair annual value to which lands, houses, buildings, and other property within the said parish shall be rated, or shall be rateable, according to the last valuation made and acted upon for the rate for the relief of the poor within the said parish.

And by sect. 34 it was further enacted—

That it shall be lawful for the overseers of the poor of any such parish, and they are hereby required, whenever, according to the rate made for the relief of the poor, one and the same person shall be rated in one sum in respect of land, and also of houses, buildings, and other property, to cause such land, and also such houses, buildings, and other property, to be separately assessed, and the sum hereby authorised to be levied shall be assessed accordingly: Provided always that every courtyard, yard, or garden (such garden not being a market garden or nursery ground), shall be included in, and make part of, the assessment to be made on the house, buildings, or other property, to which they may be respectively attached, provided always that such lands, houses, buildings, and other property, shall not in the whole be assessed at a higher amount than they were in the last rate made for the relief of the poor within the said parish.

This Act was duly adopted in the parish of Neath many years ago, and has ever since continued and now is in force therein.

9. The said land occupied by the canal and towing-path and premises in the parish of Neath the property of the company, has been assessed for the relief of the poor at the rateable value of 161*l.*, and the same value was adopted and acted upon in the rates made for the purposes of the watching and lighting of the parish of Neath under the provisions of the said Act.

10. In the last of such rates made in and for the parish of Neath (that appealed against) the rateable value of the said portion of the canal towing path and premises in the said parish, was assessed at the said sum of 161*l.*, but rated at the house-rate, namely, 9*d.* in the pound; and not at the land-rate of 3*d.* in the pound, which was the rate in the pound at which the owners and occupiers of land within the said parish were rated by the said assessment committee.

At the said quarter sessions the appellants objected to the principle so adopted by the respondents, and contended that the lands so occupied were not liable to the higher rate.

11. For the purposes of the appeal it was admitted and taken that the rateable value of the company's property, the subject of the appeal, was correctly assessed at the sum of 161*l.* (the amount mentioned in the rate) but it was contended, on behalf of the appellants, that on the state of facts above-mentioned and set out the land occupied by the said portion of the said canal towing path and premises, was properly rateable under the provisions of the statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 90, as land only, and not as houses, buildings, and property other than land; and, further, that even if under that statute taken alone, it would be thus rateable as houses, buildings, and property other than land, that, nevertheless, by virtue of the provisions of the 68th and 69th sections of the Company's Special Act, still unrepealed and in full force and effect, it was excepted and protected in that respect from the operations and provisions of the later general Act (viz., the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 90) and rateable by virtue of those sections only as land, and that, therefore, 3*d.* in the pound as land, and not the higher rate of 9*d.* as houses, buildings, and property other than land was the amount at which it ought to be rated, and which ought to be paid in respect of it.

12. The court of quarter sessions, however, confirmed the said rate.

13. The Acts, herein referred to, were to be cited and referred to if necessary by either party on the argument of this case, and to be taken as incorporated therein, and the court was to be at liberty to draw any inference from facts above stated, which might have been drawn by the court of quarter sessions.

14. The question for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench was, whether the principle of assessment adopted by the respondents was based upon the correct construction of the provisions of the said statutes with reference to the facts and circumstances hereinbefore mentioned, and found and disclosed in the above case.

15. If the Court of Queen's Bench were of opinion that the said property should be rated as land only at the sum of 3*d.* in the pound, the order of the court of quarter sessions was to be set aside, and judgment to be entered for the appellants with costs, and the rate amended by reducing it from the sum of 6*l.* 0*s.* 9*d.* to the sum of 2*l.* 0*s.* 3*d.*

If the court were of opinion that the property was properly rated at 9*d.* in the pound, the order of the court of quarter sessions was to stand, and the rate to remain at the above sum of 6*l.* 0*s.* 9*d.* and be confirmed.

H. Allen and E. Julyan Dunn, for the respondents.—The question is whether this canal and towing-path is land within the terms of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 90, s. 33. In Reg. v. Midland Railway Company (4 E. & B. 962), the question was whether the line of the railway was made rateable towards the lighting of a town under a local Act, which made all houses, buildings, erections and works, tenements and hereditaments, liable to be rated, and excepted land out of that rateability; and Lord Campbell, C. J., delivering judgment, said, "We are of opinion that it was rateable under the word 'works,' and was not included in the exception of land." [LUSH, J.—There the language of the Act was very different from that of the statute now in question.] Peto v. Overseers of West Ham (33 L. T. Rep. 222; 2 E. & E. 146), is a decision upon the two sections upon which the present case depends. The question there was whether a wet dock always covered with water was assessable as "land," and the court held that it was rateable at the higher rate as "property other than land," and ejusdem generis with houses and buildings; Lord Campbell said, "The 34th section of stat. 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 90, respecting 'gardens' seems to show clearly the intention of the Legislature, that what is accessory to 'houses and buildings' should come within the same category, and that the other category should only comprehend land used for agricultural purposes. When I look at the subject-matter rated here, I do not see how the dock and basin are to be separated from the jetties and warehouses. The dock and basin would be useless without the jetties, and warehouses would be useless without the dock and basin. They all form one undertaking, and one establishment." [LUSH, J.—Lord Campbell seems to have overlooked the exception as to market gardens in sect. 34; the proviso is, "that every courtyard, yard, or garden (such garden not being a market garden or nursery ground), shall be included in . . . the assessment to be made on the house, buildings, &c."] The case last cited is a strong one, for all the watching and lighting of the dock was done at the expense of the lessees thereof, who derived no benefit from the rates, yet they were held liable as occupiers of land covered with water. [MELLOR, J.—For it was no longer land but buildings. Here however the only building is the walling up of the canal.] Watching and lighting is, of course, very beneficial to a canal running through a town. This canal is not land in its natural state; it is used solely for a commercial purpose, and therefore is liable to a higher rate than agricultural land. [BLACKBURN, J.—I do not quite appreciate the ratio decidendi in Peto v. The Overseers of West Ham.] Par. 6 of the case describes this canal as being faced and lined in certain parts . . . with stone and masonry, and the towing path as having, belonging, and incident thereto, certain posts for fastening the vessels, and a paddle, stone bridges, culverts, and a dry dock lined with masonry. The mere passage of water through the land would be useless without those adjuncts. Lord Campbell says in the last cited case (p. 158): "There is no doubt that a large capital must have been laid out in excavating and puddling the dock and basin, and surrounding them with walls. If they had been used for carrying on a manufactory, without any buildings being erected upon them, and without water being introduced into them, they could not possibly have been considered "land" within the meaning of this section of the Act of Parliament; and can it make any difference that, instead of their being paved and goods being deposited upon them, water is introduced into them, which supports floating warehouses in which the goods are stored? [BLACKBURN, J.—The preceding passages must be read. The rateability does not depend on the fact of a large capital having been expended.] The land occupied by this canal is not used for agricultural purposes, and is therefore rightly rated at the higher rate.

G. B. Hughes (with him J. W. Bowen) for the appellants.—By sect. 68 of 31 Geo. 3, c. lxxxv., the company of proprietors are rendered liable to be rated to all Parliamentary and parochial taxes, and assessments in respect of the lands . . . . in the same proportion as other lands the property of individuals in their natural capacity. The Legislature in effect there says, "You are not to be rated on tolls, but shall be on land with its ordinary incidents—i. e., you must pay the same as if for agricultural land." [They were stopped by the court.]

COCKBURN, C. J.—I am of opinion that the canal and those constructions which are described in the case as partaking of the character of buildings, and which seem to me to be mere accessories of the canal, must be treated as "land" in the sense in which that word is ordinarily used. With respect to the liability to assessment a case was cited in which Erle, J. differed from the rest of the court, but in which the majority were of opinion that a dock must be taken to form part of a larger whole, and that the whole taken together was rather buildings than land covered with water. But the circumstances there were altogether different from those in the present case, for there was a warehouse and works of considerable extent, and the dock was subsidiary and subordinate to the purposes of the operations of the company who occupied those warehouses and buildings. I cannot say, notwithstanding the strong reasons given by Erle, J., that the majority of the judges were not right in their decision.

Here, however, is a canal existing for the ordinary purposes of traffic and of affording means of transit for barges, and the works and masonry for lining the banks are parts of the canal itself; so also the bridges, and these are no benefit to the company, but, on the contrary, were works executed rather for the benefit of the public. I think, upon the whole, seeing that the dock is used merely for the purpose of repairing barges therein, it also is but subsidiary to the canal. Therefore, this case differs altogether in its facts from that in 2 E. & E. 146, and we must treat this canal as land covered with water, as indeed it actually is, and therefore decide that it must be rated to the Watching and Lighting Rate on the lower scale.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question turns on the 23rd section of the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 90. [His Lordship read the section.] That word "land," perhaps, would include houses and buildings, but it is plain that the Legislature, making a distinction, divided "land," first into "houses and buildings," and secondly, into "property," which must mean property ejusdem generis with houses and buildings. In the first class is land in general, in the other, "houses," &c. I don't think Reg. v. The Southwark and Vauxhall Water Company is in point. There the Vauxhall Water Company were held to be rateable to a lighting rate on the lower scale, as occupiers of land; and that was obviously right, for it could not be said that they occupied the land through which the mains and pipes passed as property other than land. Then Peto v. The Overseers of West Ham is referred to. There was a difference of opinion there, but that case really comes to this, viz., that the docks were part of a large undertaking, that is especially dwelt on in the judgment of the majority of the court, and they said that the dock which was in amongst the warehouses was as much a part of the buildings as the courtyard of a house, and was therefore ancillary to the buildings; and it was on that ground that the judgment of the court was founded; not upon the ground that the land covered with water was ancillary to the dock, but that the dock was ancillary to the buildings, and, consequently, must be taken as part of the property, and, therefore, it was rated at the higher rate. Viewing it in that way, I think that was the result I also should have arrived at, and I think we must hold the majority to have been right. But does that case govern the present one? I think not. Here we have a canal, and a canal in the general acceptation of the term is a long ditch, and is not itself a building. Now a ditch is no more a building than a piece of ground running beside a highway, and unless it could be said that a turnpike road would be a building, we cannot go to the length of saying that a canal would be so. If the question arose which I suggested during argument—viz., whether Holborn Viaduct was a building or not, I should think it would be found that it was; but if it were a question as to whether the road over it were a building, I should incline to think we could not say that it was. Now, looking at the decision in the above-mentioned case, I can find nothing which would justify us in saying that this canal is a building. No doubt there is some building about it. True, it is lined with masonry, but that is no more than the other case I adverted to in the discussion—viz., that of a sunk fence or ha-ha in a field, faced with masonry, which certainly would not make the field a building. Then as to the dock, I think that is merely ancillary to the canal. I am of opinion that the canal cannot be considered a building, or in the nature of a building, and therefore does not fall within the terms "houses, buildings, and other property," and therefore must be deemed to be "land other than" houses and buildings.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. This case is certainly distinguishable from that of Peto v. The Overseers of West Ham. There, no doubt, expressions are attributed to Lord Campbell which, in a very large and liberal sense, may go as far as Mr. Allen contended, but then they are confined to the circumstances of the case, as it plainly appears, for the learned judge says that the dock, jetties, and warehouses, "all form one undertaking and one establishment," that seems to me the ground on which Lord Campbell based his judgment. I read those words as a governing authority on the question as to what is property ejusdem generis with "houses and buildings," and putting that interpretation on the judgment, it cannot be said that that case governs the present one, for here there is really nothing to which these matters are ancillary, except the canal. That being so, it seems to me that as a yard attached to a house is ancillary to the latter, so here these masonry constructions are in their nature ancillary to the canal.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. Assuming Peto v. The Overseers of West Ham to be rightly decided, I think the ground of the decision was that the court, correctly or otherwise, regarded the dock or part covered with water, as accessory to the buildings. Neither is Reg. v. The Midland Railway Company, which is a decision on another Act of Parliament, containing essentially different words, an authority on the present case. There is nothing in sect. 33 to warrant us in holding that "land," to be assessed on the lower scale, must be only used for ordinary agricultural purposes. Sect. 34 clearly shows that such was not the intention of the Legislature, for that section provides that market gardens or nursery grounds shall not be assessed on the higher scale. For these reasons I am of opinion that the order of sessions should be quashed.

JUDGE AND ANOTHER (apps.), v. SELMES (resp.)

The Highway Act 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), ss. 27, 109—Surveyors—Void rate—Notice of action—Blunders bonâ fide.

The defendants, surveyors of highways, made a rate which purported to be laid under the 13 Geo. 3, c. 78 (a repealed statute), and was altogether informal and void.

They then, by their collector, applied to the plaintiff for payment of the rate, and received from him a sum of money, which the latter afterwards sought to recover back by action in the County Court.

The 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50 (The Highway Act 1835), s. 109, enacts that no action shall be commenced against any person for anything done "in pursuance of or under the authority of this Act" until twenty-one days' notice has been given, nor after three calendar months.

The judge of the County Court gave judgment for the plaintiff on the ground that the rate was void, and that the defendants were not entitled to notice of action, inasmuch as the repealed statute, under which the rate had been illegally made, did not require any such notice. On appeal,—

Held, that as the defendants intended to act, and acted bonâ fide as surveyors in raising money for the repairs of highways, under an authority given to them by law, they were entitled to the notice of action prescribed by the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 109, notwithstanding the fact of their having grossly blundered in carrying out their intention.

APPEAL from a decision of the judge of the County Court of Sussex, holden at Rye.

This was an action brought to recover 14*l.* 6*s.*, for money illegally demanded of the plaintiff by the defendants or their agents and paid by him as for a highway rate pretended to be made on the 1st Dec. 1868, at 1*s.* in the pound.

The summons came on for hearing on the 18th July last, but was adjourned to enable the plaintiff to prove that the defendants were surveyors of the highways at the time the rate was made.

At the adjourned hearing it was proved that at the general annual vestry meeting, holden on the 2nd April 1868, the defendants were, as appears from the vestry book, appointed surveyors of the highways of such part of the parish as lies within the borough of Rye for the year ensuing, and that James Duberly was appointed collector of the highway rate for the year ensuing at a salary of 5*l.*

On the 10th Dec. following, the defendants made a rate for the use of the highways, and which was entered in the rate-book in the following terms:

Rye. The 10th Dec. 1868. A composition of 1*s.* in the pound is agreed to be taken by Joseph Judge and James Collins Head, surveyors of the highways within the town and liberty of Rye, in lieu of statute work to be performed and done by the several inhabitants and occupiers of land, hereditaments, &c., due notice of composition being first given as by Act of Parliament in that behalf provided.

The said rate was not signed by the defendants as surveyors, nor allowed by two justices of the peace, nor published in accordance with sect. 27 of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50.(a)

The rate book was in due course given to the collector to collect the rate.

Upon the 13th Jan. 1869, the plaintiff being ignorant of the facts, was applied to for payment of the rate. It was on a Rye Cattle Market day, while the plaintiff was in the market, no coercive means were used to enforce payment, the collector simply asked for the rate in the usual manner, and the plaintiff paid it without comment, and received from the collector the following receipt:—

Parish of Rye. The 13th Jan. 1869. Received of Mr. Charles Selmes the sum of fourteen pounds six shillings in respect of the highway rate made the 1st Dec. 1868, at 1*s.* in the pound. 14*l.* 6*s.* Received JAMES DUBERLY.

It was also proved that the supposed rate was made on the 10th Dec. 1868, but the defendants were sued for money illegally demanded as for a highway rate pretended to be made on the 1st Dec. 1868, and the receipt produced by the plaintiff was in respect of a highway rate made on the 1st Dec. 1868.

Upon the plaintiff becoming aware of the above facts this action was commenced to recover back the money so paid by him, on the assumption that the rate for which it was paid was a valid rate.

At the trial the plaintiff contended that he was entitled to recover back the money as money paid under mistake of facts, on the ground that the rate was illegal. First, because by sect. 29 of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, no rate could be made for more than 10*d.*; secondly, that the rate had not been signed, published, and allowed as required by the statute.

The plaintiff also contended that the defendants, as surveyors, were not entitled to notice of action under sect. 109(b) of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50; because the making of a rate of 1*s.* could not be a thing done in pursuance of or under the authority of the Act, seeing that, first, the Act provided that no rate should exceed 10*d.* in the pound; secondly, that the rate was evidently intended to have been made under 13 Geo. 3, c. 78, which provided for such a composition as the rate purported to be, and which statute had been repealed by 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50.

The defendants, on the other hand, contended, first, that the defendants having been sued as surveyors of the highways were entitled to notice of action under 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 109; secondly, that more than three calendar months having expired since the fact was committed for which this action could lie.

The judge, who tried the cause without a jury, held, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and gave judgment for plaintiff for 14*l.* 6*s.* and costs, on the following grounds:—First, that the rate was void, it having been erroneously made as a composition in lieu of statute work under the repealed Act of 13 Geo. 3, c. 78, and, further, that the rate was not signed by the defendants, as surveyors, nor allowed by two justices of the peace, nor published as required by the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 27; secondly, that the plaintiff had paid the money in ignorance of the facts; thirdly, that the defendants were not entitled to notice of action, inasmuch as the Act of 13 Geo. 3, c. 78, under which the rate had been illegally made, did not require any notice of action.

The defendants, being dissatisfied with such judgment, prayed leave to appeal against the same, on the grounds above mentioned, and the judge thought it reasonable and proper that such appeal should be allowed, and allowed the same accordingly.

The question for the opinion of the Court of

(a) 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50 (The Highway Act 1835), s. 27, in order to raise money for carrying the several purposes of the Act into execution, enacts that a rate shall be made, assessed, and levied by the surveyor upon all property liable to be rated and assessed to the relief of the poor. Provided that every such rate shall be signed by the said surveyor, and allowed by two justices of the peace, and published in the same way as poor rates are now allowed and published.

(b) Sect. 109 enacts that "no action or suit shall be commenced against any person for anything done in pursuance of or under the authority of this Act until twenty-one days' notice has been given thereof in writing to the justice, surveyor, or person against whom such action is intended to be brought . . . . nor after three calendar months next after the fact committed for which such action or suit shall be so brought . . . ."

Queen's Bench was, whether the ruling of the judge in this action was correct in point of law. If the court should be of opinion in the affirmative, then the judgment in favour of the plaintiff to be affirmed, but if the court should be of opinion in the negative, then judgment to be entered for the defendants.

Hance for the appellants.—First, this was a voluntary payment. No objection was made by the plaintiff to pay the rate, and no suggestion of any distress was made to him.—[BLACKBURN, J.—But he paid it under an impression that the collector had a right to demand it.] It may be admitted that the rate was informal and void. But the defendants were acting as surveyors, and the question is whether they had reasonable ground for the belief that they were entitled to do the act which is now complained of. It may also be conceded that the cases show that mere honest belief is not sufficient. [LUSH, J.—Bona fides is not enough.] There must be a reasonable belief. The informal heading matters not, for the heading is no part of the rate: (Reg. v. Uttermere and another, 26 L. J. 197.) In that case Lord Campbell, C. J., remarks, "I know of no authority for saying that the heading of the rate must, like an order of justices, show jurisdiction."—[BLACKBURN, J.—I don't think that the fact of the surveyors' calling it a "composition" when it really was a rate would make it bad.] By 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, s. 29, it is enacted that every rate shall contain the names of the occupiers, the description of the premises or property they occupy, the annual value, and the sum in the pound at which the rate is made. There is no form of heading prescribed. The surveyors were entitled to notice of action, and the time within which the action should have been brought began to run from the making of the rate, and not from the demand: (The Kennet Canal Company v. The Great Western Railway, 7 Q. B. 844.) [BLACKBURN, J. referred to Roberts v. Orchard (9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 727; 33 L. J. 65, Ex.)] In that case it was laid down that when the question is whether a defendant is entitled to notice of action in respect of a thing done pursuant to a statute, the true rule is to ascertain whether the defendant honestly believed in the existence of such a state of facts as would, if it had existed, have afforded a justification for his acting under the statute. [BLACKBURN, J.—We there adopted the judgment of V. Williams, J. delivered in Hermann v. Seneschal (6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 646; 13 C. B., N. S., 392.] In Greenaway v. Hurd (4 T. R., 553) it was held that assumpsit for money had and received does not lie against an excise officer to recover duties received by him after the Act imposing them is repealed if he have paid them over to his superior. The officer is in such case entitled to a month's notice of action by 23 Geo. 3, c. 70, s. 30. Kenyon, C.J. there says, "It has been frequently observed by the courts that the notice, which is directed to be given to justices and other officers before actions are brought against them, is of no use to them, when they have acted within the strict line of their duty, and was only required for the purpose of protecting them in those cases where they intended to act within it, but by mistake exceeded it. Here the defendant acted as an officer of the excise when he received this money, and the plaintiff paid it to him in that character." So in the present case, when the collector received the money he did so on behalf of the defendants as surveyors, and the plaintiff paid it to him in that capacity. The case of Waterhouse v. Keen (4 B. & C. 200) was an action of assumpsit against a toll collector to recover back money alleged to have been exacted by him improperly as toll. The Turnpike Act, under which the toll was demanded, contained a proviso that no action should be brought for anything done "in pursuance of the Act" until twenty-one days' notice should have been given; and it was held that the twenty-one days' notice fixed thereby ought to have been given before action brought. Bayley, J. there says, "If an action be brought in consequence of a thing substantially done in pursuance of the Act of Parliament, it is a case within the Act." And Holroyd, J., "The action in substance is brought to recover money alleged by the plaintiff to have been unlawfully taken by the defendant as toll, under colour of the authority of the Act. The demanding and taking the toll was an act done in pursuance of the Act. This is a case, therefore, within the words of the Act."

Lanyon for the respondent.—The defendants clearly intended to act as surveyors, but not under this recent statute. The judge found as a fact that the proceedings were not intended to be in accordance with the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, but under the old Act. [BLACKBURN, J.—If we were to proceed under some repealed Act, should we not be acting under the authority of the law? It seems to be monstrous to say that they thought they were not acting under the Highway Act 1835.] In Downing v. Capel (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 323; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 461), A. purchased pine-apples of B., and directed him to take them to his house, and ask for payment. B. left them at A.'s house at one, p.m., and was paid by A.'s butler. A. returned home at three, p.m., and was informed that the butler had paid, and believing erroneously that he himself had paid B. at the time of the purchase, immediately sent for a policeman, and ordered him to arrest B. on a charge of obtaining money under false pretences. The policeman and A.'s butler at once went in pursuit of B., and apprehended him at ten p.m. By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 113, it is provided that notice of action for anything done in pursuance of the Act shall be given, and by sect. 103, that any person found committing any offence under the Act (inter alia, obtaining money under false pretences), may be immediately apprehended. In an action for wrongful arrest: Held, that B. was "found committing the offence," if at all, at one, p.m., and the pursuit not having been commenced till A.'s return at three, p.m., A. could not have believed he was acting in pursuance of the statute, and was not entitled to notice. Here, as a matter of fact, the defendants did not intend to act under the present Highway Act. They made a rate under the old statute, which does not entitle them to notice of action. [BLACKBURN, J.—The news of King James's death did not reach Chester in time to prevent the chief justice of that city, whose commission to try prisoners was thereby determined, proceeding to hang a criminal; but it was held that the chief justice was not guilty of murder, for he was acting as a judge; and Lord Hale puts the case of the Common Pleas entertaining an appeal of death and hanging a man; and he says, "I think it is an error, a great misprision in them, but not felony, because they had colour to hold plea thereof by an original writ out of the Chancery under the Great

' (a). So here, the surveyors were guilty, as re, of a "great misprision," but yet are en- to notice of action.] In Hardwick v. Moss T. Rep. N. S. 802; 31 L. J. 205, Ex.), Bram- B. seems to think that the last question in cases is, "Had the defendants reasonable id for believing that they were acting under uthority of the Act?" which provides for e of action. So in Leete v. Hart (L. Rep. 3 322), "Semble, that even an honest belief in e of facts, which, if true, would have afforded tification, is not sufficient unless the de- nt had reasonable ground for his belief." , J. referred to the judgment of Byles, J. in v. Leonard (6 B. & C. 354).] In Poulsam v. (L. Rep. 2 C. P. 449), the acts complained of "done or intended to be done under the s of the Act," conferring the right to notice ion. [BLACKBURN, J. referred to Wordsworth rley, 1 B. & Ad. 391.] In Smith v. Hopper J. 93, Q.B.), the judgment of Lord Denman, supports the present argument. On the g of the County Court judge the respondent itled to judgment.

ce in reply.—None of the cases cited contra, t all displaced the proposition that the defen- having really acted bonâ fide as surveyors in ay affairs are entitled to the protection of atute. [BLACKBURN, J.—Have you any neat rity to show that one is entitled to the pro- n of an Act of Parliament who has been under it, but blundering terribly?] No; he bona fides of the defendants who were only as surveyors of highways, and had a able belief that they were legally empowered as they did, entitles them to the protection of & 6 Will. 4, c. 50.

CKBURN, J.—I think the defendants were ed to the notice prescribed, on the ground hey were within the meaning of the 5 & 6 4, c. 50, when they levied this rate and re- the money, those acts being things done and "in pursuance of the authority" of tatute. It has long been decided that those really apply to things that are done under thority of the Act of Parliament, but which, me mistake or blunder on the part of the doing them, are not actually defences; and egislature thought in such case that because ndividual was acting under the supposed rity of the Act of Parliament he was entitled ice of action. Here the defendants are sur- s of highways, elected under 5 & 6 Will. 4, and whatever they did as surveyors of high- they assuredly thought they were doing by of the Act of Parliament under which were appointed. No doubt they, not being rs, were not able to say what that Act liament was, but they perfectly well knew were elected surveyors under the Highway nd must have intended to have acted under thority of that statute. Then are they enti- notice of action? The County Court judge hat the rate was made most informally, and face of it was called a composition. In all bility the surveyors had taken some old form under the Act of 13 Geo. 3, c. 78, long since ed. They also stated the composition at 1*s.* d of 10*d.*, which was the limit of the rate, and, r, they did not go through the necessary formalities of signing the rate, nor of having it properly allowed and published. Therefore the County Court Judge thought that they could not in point of law have been acting under the Highway Act, and that they consequently were not entitled to the notice of action prescribed thereby. Now I quite agree that if a person knows he has not authority under a statute to do a thing, and goes intentionally out of his way to do it, he cannot shelter himself by pretending that it was done under colour of an Act of Parliament. But there was nothing here to show that the act in question was done by the surveyors, they knowing that it was contrary to the statute; and if the County Court judge had anything before him to show that they were so aware of their act being contrary to the statute, and were trying with a high hand to get money to which they had no right, they would not have been under the protection of the Act of Parliament. It was, however, not so found; but what they, in fact, did, was this, viz., they, being surveyors of highways, made a rate in this very informal way, making it for 1*s.* instead of 10*d.*, not signing nor publishing it properly, and so on. Having done that they proceed in the ordinary manner by the ordinary collector whom they sent round to get the money for the repairs of highways, and he actually receives it. Were the surveyors, then, in point of fact, acting and intending to act in the office of surveyors? I think that they were so intending to act, though they blundered in carrying out their intention. Now we come to consider the cases of Roberts v. Orchard, Hermann v. Seneschal, and Leete v. Hart (sup.), and I must point out that both in Hermann v. Seneschal and Roberts v. Orchard the question raised was, What was it that entitled the man to have notice of action?—not, What would limit the notice of action? In Hermann v. Seneschal the defendant had absurdly, rashly, and hastily given a man into custody for uttering a half-crown which was, in fact, a good one; but, said the Court of Common Pleas, however unreasonable the supposition of the defendant was, yet if he really thought the half-crown was bad he was acting within the statute, and the question having been left to the jury whether he really thought so, they found in favour of the defendant, and the court held that he was entitled to notice of action. In Roberts v. Orchard the question was raised by a bill of exceptions to the ruling of Martin, B., who held that the defendant was not entitled to notice of action. The exceptions tendered were that the learned judge ought to have left to the jury some particular state of things, and if the jury so found, to have said that the party was entitled to notice of action. The Exchequer Chamber said "No; Hermann v. Seneschal is right." There counsel required Martin, B. to leave to the jury a question which, according to Hermann v. Seneschal, would have been bad. But neither in that case, nor in the former one, was it laid down that the defendant would not be entitled to notice of action because he had blundered in the law. So also in Leete v. Hart (sup.) Now, several of the cases which we have had to look at have been those in which the same officers, who are the defendants in this instance, viz., surveyors of highways, were assuming to act in pursuance of a statute. Thus in Hardwick v. Moss (sup), surveyors obstructed a highway without any power so to do, nevertheless, said the Court of Exchequer, they were surveyors acting by the directions of the parish, and they thought that they were acting under the Highway Act. So again in Wordsworth v. Harley, the question arose upon the former Highway Act, which required actions for things done in pursuance of that statute to be brought within three months. In that case, apparently very high handed things had been done by a surveyor of highways, in taking a man's field and adding it to the public road without the owner's consent. An action having been brought for the injury, Lord Tenterden said that however unfortunate the case might be for the plaintiff, yet that the action could not be maintained. The point now before us was involved and taken for granted, rather than positively decided there, but it clearly was inferentially decided that if in repairing the highways the surveyor was illegally and improperly taking a portion of land, he was acting in pursuance of the statute, and had therefore a right to notice of action. In the present case there is nothing to show that the defendants were conscious they were acting illegally; what they were doing was the essence of their employment, viz., raising money for the repairs of the road. They certainly blundered excessively, but were, I take it, acting under the Act of Parliament, and were consequently entitled to notice of action. Our ruling happens here to work justice, the result of which I am glad; it might have worked unjustly, which I should have regretted. I should not be disposed to decide that there might not have been a defence on the merits to this action, on the ground that the payment might have been voluntary, or that the surveyor had applied the money to the purposes for which it was levied before he got notice of the facts, and I therefore guard myself against being supposed to decide whether those defences would have been good or otherwise.

(a) See 1 Hale, P. C., p. 498.

LUSH, J.—I do not intend to express any opinion on all the points. It is quite sufficient to give judgment on the third. I entirely agree with my brother Blackburn in the decision which he has pronounced. The judgment of the learned judge of the County Court was "that the defendants were not entitled to notice of action, inasmuch as the Act of 13 Geo. 3, c. 78, under which the rate had been illegally made, did not require any notice of action." Now I cannot read that as a finding of the judge that, in point of fact, the defendants intended to act without supposed authority, or that they acted wantonly and in abuse of their power; but I understand him to express his opinion that as a matter of law, inasmuch as the rate appeared on the face of it to be made under the 13 Geo. 3, c. 78, and that Act is repealed, the defendants cannot be heard to allege that they had not made the rate under that statute, and cannot resort to the Highway Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50). I think that was an erroneous view. True, the rate purports to be a composition rate, but still, if it had been made under the statute of Geo. 3, it would have been bad because it has a wrong title. The question was whether the surveyors, in making it, intended to do what they were authorised to do by the Highway Act of Will. 4. I do not think it was necessary to find what was the particular enactment which gave them authority as they supposed, if they thought they were acting under an authority given them by law. They bonâ fide believed they were doing what was right, and that is all that is needed to entitle them to the protection of the statute.

HANNEN. J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is, did the defendants bonâ fide intend to make a rate as surveyors of highways. If that was their intention, though they might know nothing of the particular provisions of the Act of Parliament—if, I say, they intended to make a rate as surveyors under any Act of Parliament, giving them power to do so,—then they are entitled to notice. Now the statute which gave them power is the Highway Act, and that contains a provision that any person doing anything "in pursuance of or under the authority of this Act" shall be entitled to the protection afforded by the statute. Therefore I think the appellants had a right to notice, and that our judgment should be for them.

RUSSELL AND OTHERS v. THE TITHE COMMISSIONERS FOR ENGLAND AND WALES.

Tithe commutation—Additional rentcharge by way of extraordinary charge on land newly cultivated as market gardens—"Beyond the limits of every district," &c.—6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 71, ss. 40 and 42—23 & 24 Vict. c. 90, s. 42.

After the making and confirmation of an award for the commutation of tithes in the parish of P., by which award no district was assigned within which the amount charged upon any hop grounds or market gardens within such district by way of apportionment of tithe rentcharge was distinguished into two parts, to be called the ordinary and the extraordinary charge, some land in the same parish of P. was newly cultivated as market gardens, and thereupon the vicar of the parish requested the defendants to award and fix an extraordinary charge per acre in respect of such lands so newly cultivated, and to declare the said parish of P. a district within which the said extraordinary charge should be payable in respect of all lands which then were, or thereafter might be, cultivated as market gardens. Thereupon the defendants sent down an assistant commissioner, who made an award by which he awarded the sum of 6s. per acre as an extraordinary charge on lands newly cultivated as market gardens in the parish, and declared the whole parish a district within which such extraordinary charge should be payable. The plaintiffs, who were landowners in the parish of P., now sued in prohibition, praying the court to prohibit the defendants from confirming this award, or from taking any further steps for declaring the parish of P. a district within which such extraordinary charge should be payable in respect of lands newly cultivated as market gardens:

Held, that the last-mentioned award was good.

Held also, that the words "beyond the limits of every district in which any extraordinary charge for hop grounds or market gardens shall have been distinguished as aforesaid at the time of the commutation" (sect. 42 of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 71), are applicable to lands in any parish, no matter whether, at the original commutation, a district was or was not assigned in such parish (under sect. 40 of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 71), within which an extraordinary charge was payable (under sect. 42 of that Act), in respect of the lands cultivated as hop grounds or market gardens.

IN prohibition.

The declaration stated that the plaintiffs complained of the Tithe Commissioners for England and Wales, for that the plaintiffs were occupiers of lands in the parish of Plumstead, and they said that after the passing of the statute 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 71 (that is to say), in the year of our Lord, 1842, proceedings were had under the said Act and other Acts then in force with reference to the commutation of the tithes arising in the said parish, and the assistant commissioner duly appointed under the said Acts duly made his award as follows (the declaration here set out the award):—And the plaintiffs said that the amounts by the said award to be paid in lieu of the tithes payable within the said parish were duly appointed, and certain parts thereof were duly apportioned and charged upon the lands, held and occupied by plaintiffs as hereinbefore mentioned. And they said that the said award and apportionment were duly confirmed. And the plaintiffs said that at the time of the said commutation proceedings and the making of the said award and apportionment, no notice was given by the owners of the lands in the said parish, which were then cultivated as orchards or gardens, that the tithes thereof should be separately valued; nor was the said parish or any part thereof assigned by the tithe commissioners, or the said assistant tithe commissioner, as a district; nor was it at the time of the said commutation proceedings, within any district assigned for the purpose of estimating or separately valuing the tithes of lands cultivated as orchards or gardens; nor was the amount charged by the apportionment upon and of the lands in the said parish distinguished into two parts, to be called the ordinary and extraordinary rentcharge. And the plaintiffs said that long after the completion of the said commutation proceedings and the confirmation of the said award and apportionment (that is to say) on the 24th Nov. 1868, the defendants were requested by the vicar of the said parish to award and fix an extraordinary charge per imperial acre in respect of the lands newly cultivated as market gardens after the said commutation, and to declare the said parish of Plumstead a district within which the said extraordinary charge should be paid, subject to the provisions of the Act for the Commutation of Tithes. And the plaintiffs said that upon such request the defendants appointed Charles Wood, Esq., an assistant commissioner in that behalf who held meetings, and ultimately made his award as follows (that is to say): (The declaration here set out this award, by which the asssistant commissioner awarded that the annual sum of 6*s.* per acre should be paid on all lands then or thereafter cultivated as market gardens and being newly cultivated as such since the commutation of the tithes of the said parish, to be paid by way of extraordinary rentcharge, &c., and declared all the lands in the said parish or district within which the extraordinary charge of 6*s.* an acre should be payable for the tithes of market gardens as aforesaid.)

And the plaintiffs said that the defendants would, unless prohibited, proceed to confirm, and have threatened to confirm, the said award. Wherefore the plaintiffs prayed that a prohibition might issue from this honourable court to prohibit the defendants from confirming the said award, or from taking any further steps for fixing the said extraordinary charge, or from declaring the said parish a district within which the said extraordinary rentcharge should be payable.

To this the defendants pleaded that at the time of the said commutation and thenceforth until the proceedings sought to be prohibited, all the lands in the said parish were and still were beyond the limits of any district in which any extraordinary charge for market gardens had then been distinguished, and after the said commutation divers lands in the said parish were newly cultivated as market gardens within the said parish, wherefore the vicar of the said parish, being a person interested within the meaning of the said Acts, requested the commissioners, as in the declaration mentioned, and the proceedings which and the award the confirmation of which the plaintiffs asked the court to prohibit by their writ of prohibition, were proceedings regularly taken to comply with the said request, and to fix an extraordinary charge upon market gardens, and to declare the lands in the parish a district within which the said extraordinary charge should be payable, as they lawfully might by virtue of the said Acts, and especially the said Act 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 71, s. 42, and by the Act 23 & 24 Vict. c. 93, s. 42, wherefore the defendants pray that a prohibition may not issue.

Demurrer and joinder in demurrer.

Edlin, Q.C. (Petheram with him) for the plaintiffs.—It was the intention of the Legislature in 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 76, that the commutation of the tithes should be final and conclusive. By sect. 42, however, of the Tithe Commutation Act 1836 (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 71), it was provided that where a district had been assigned at the original commutation within a parish, and afterwards land, within the same parish, but not within the district assigned—in other words, "beyond the limits of every district"—should be cultivated as hop grounds or market gardens, the commissioners should have power to impose an "additional rentcharge by way of extraordinary charge" upon such land. But to give them power to impose such additional charge, it was essential that the land should be within a parish in which a district had been assigned. The words "every district" cannot have been intended to apply to every district in the kingdom, but every district in the parish; so that where (as was the case here) no district at all had been assigned in the parish, the words had no application. Had it been the intention of the Legislature to give the commissioners power to impose this additional charge upon any land, no matter whether it lay within a parish in which a district had been assigned or not, the provision would not have been introduced at the end of a section in this way. Sect 42 of 22 & 23 Vict., c. 93, is to be read in connection with and limited by sect. 42 of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 71. The intention of the Legislature was, that, as far as was possible, the commutation should be final and conclusive, and both parties might take their chance of gain or loss by a subsequent change of cultivation. For instance, if there were market gardens in a parish and no district was assigned, the landowners would have to go on paying a charge in respect of this higher cultivation. even if they ceased to cultivate the ground in this way. The statutes 2 & 3 Vict. c. 62, s. 28—33, and 3 & 4 Vict., c. 15, s. 18, have no direct bearing on this question, but they indirectly support this contention.

Manisty, Q.C. (F. M. White with him) for the defendants.—The words in sect. 42 of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 71, "beyond the limits of every district," have not the meaning attributed to them by the plaintiffs, but are simply equivalent to the words in 22 & 23 Vict. c. 93, s. 42, "beyond the limits of any district." It was, therefore, not necessary that a district should have been assigned within this parish for the commissioners to have power to impose an additional rentcharge in respect of the land newly cultivated as market gardens. The commissioners acted upon the request of a person interested therein within the meaning of sect. 42 of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 71. It was the object of 22 & 23 Vict. c. 91, s. 42, to enable the commissioners not only to charge the lands newly cultivated (as they might have done under sect. 42 of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 71), but to declare the lands in Plumstead parish a district within which the extraordinary charge then fixed by them should be payable.

Edlin, Q.C., in reply.

WILLES, J.—The question in this case is whether the Tithe Commissioners, in dealing with a parish in which a commutation has taken place, by which no district was assigned, within which a special payment was to be made in respect of hop gardens and market gardens, can, at the request of the vicar, in respect of new market gardens arising within the parish, proceed to make a special and extraordinary charge in respect of the tithes of such new cultivation, or whether the power to impose such an extraordinary charge on any part of the parish not within a district assigned at the original commutation is not subject to the condition precedent that they should at the original commutation have assigned a district within the parish, within which district the land so newly cultivated happens not to be—in other words, whether the last clause of sect. 42 of the Tithe Commutation Act, dealing with the case of an additional rentcharge by way of an extraordinary charge upon hop grounds and market gardens newly cultivated as such, is not limited to parts of a parish in which a district or districts were appointed at the time of the original commutation, but which parts, not being then cultivated in this special manner, did not fall within such district or districts. It appears that the Tithe Commissioners have proceeded at the request of the incumbent to assess the additional charge in respect of some newly cultivated market gardens, which appear by the plea to have been cultivated as such only since the original commutation, and which are situated in a parish in which no district was assigned under the earlier part of sect. 42 at the original commutation, and the question is whether they had power to do so. We are dealing here with a special and peculiar case, in respect of which the Tithe Commutation Act has made particular provisions, and the tithes we are dealing with are no doubt the small tithes, because all these matter in respect of which the special provisions of the Act are made, appear to be cases of small tithes. In respect of some of the cases of small tithes, such as coppice, the 41st section makes express provision by reason of their not rendering their produce annually, and by reason no doubt of the circumstances which led to the old disputes, upon which it is not now worth while to enter. But in respect to hop and market gardens, special provision was made by the 42nd section by reason of the right of the parson to receive his tenth of the extraordinary profits made by such cultivation, and it was with reference to the larger amount of tithe recoverable in respect of such cultivation that an express provision was made by the 42nd section, by which, notwithstanding that under ordinary circumstances it was intended that the commutation should be final and conclusive, it was provided that the parson should be entitled to an increased payment in respect of lands subjected to such new cultivation. Now nothing is more certain than that the award was never intended to be final and conclusive in respect of each particular piece of ground in a parish, in the event of its turning out that a new cultivation as hop grounds or market gardens was resorted to in land falling within a district, as to which this extraordinary charge had been imposed. There can be no doubt that that is so because it is provided (sect. 42) "that the amount which shall be charged by any such apportionment as hereinafter provided upon any hop grounds or market gardens in any district so to be assigned" (a claim to have a district assigned having been made under sect. 40), "shall be distinguished into two parts, which shall be called the ordinary charge and the extraordinary charge . . . and all lands whereof the tithes shall have been commuted under this Act, and which shall cease to be cultivated as hop grounds or market gardens . . . shall be charged . . . only with the ordinary charge upon such lands." Therefore in respect of the cessation of cultivation in that way, the extraordinary charge was to cease and the ordinary charge alone remained. It is not easy to see the connection between sects. 40 and 42 in any other way but this, that in respect of lands subjected to the specially productive cultivation at the time when the award was made, the owners might choose to provide for the event of their giving up that cultivation, and might, instead of allowing the valuer to put on the land a proportion of the charge which should have reference to the special cultivation and its continuance, desire to have the opportunity of returning to the ordinary charge in the event of the special cultivation being discontinued. The 42nd section then goes on: "And all lands in any such district the tithes whereof shall have been commuted under this Act, and which shall be newly cultivated as hop grounds or market gardens at any time after such commutation, shall be charged with an additional amount of rentcharge per imperial acre, equal to the extraordinary charge per acre upon hop grounds or market gardens respectively in that district." And it was finally decided in the case of Walsh v. Trimmer, in the House of Lords, that if a district has been assigned, not including the whole parish, in which district there are some common lands that produce nothing, so that the only commutation that could be suggested would be that the tithes should be commuted at nil, yet that such land, being within a district in respect of which there had been the extraordinary rentcharge assigned by reason of a claim in respect of other lands within the district, became liable to the extraordinary charge assessed upon the district in which it lay, on its being, subsequently to the commutation, inclosed and cultivated as a hop ground. Looking at the 40th section, we can perhaps understand by what accident the common lands in question fell within the district assigned; the reason probably was that a line had to be drawn, and that line happened to include a place which, at the time, no one ever thought in the least likely to become a hop ground, and, through that accident, the land in Walsh v. Trimmer became liable to the extraordinary charge. It, however, seems to me a most irrational conclusion to think that the land in that case, which was held, on its being turned into a hop ground, to at once become liable to the extraordinary charge assessed on the district in which it happened to be included, would, if it had not happened to fall within a district, have been liable to no charge at all. It was accordingly admitted by Mr. Edlin—and he could not help admitting it, else he could give no meaning at all to the latter part of the section—that, if the lands in Walsh v. Trimmer had been accidentally left out of the district which was assigned at the original commutation, the commissioners, on the lands in question being turned into hop grounds, would have had power, under the subsequent part of the 42nd section, and aided by the subsequent Act 23 & 24 Vict. c. 93, s. 42, to assign a new district in which such lands would have been included. But it is at the same time contended that if, on the original commutation, no district at all had been assigned within the parish, the waste lands in Walsh v. Trimmer would have remained exempt from the payment of tithes altogether, even after they were turned into hop grounds. Thus, according to the argument of the plaintiff, although no exemption could have been claimed for those lands by reason of the accident of their not having been included in a district, provided a district was assigned within the parish, still, if no district at all had been assigned, they would by reason of that accident have been exempt. That seems to me to be equally absurd, for, if that is the true construction of the statute, land newly turned into a hop ground or market garden, must or must not bear an extraordinary charge according to the accident of there having or not having been a district assigned within the parish at the original commutation. Putting a rational construction on the subsequent part of the 42nd section, that deals with the case of lands not within a district assigned by the commissioners at the original commutation, one would expect that the section applied not only to the case of lands accidentally or intentionally omitted from a district made at the time when the original commutation took place, but to all lands whatsoever, unless you can establish, on the construction of the section, that it was the intention of the latter part of the section to apply the machinery by which the original district was made, and the outcoming rentcharge for the extraordinary cultivation assessed, only to a case where it had become advisable to alter a district formed at the original commutation, so as to make it include land within the parish that was newly cultivated in this special manner. So if it had been made out that you were to refer to the proceedings to be taken in making an original district for the purpose of imposing the new charge on the new district or the land newly cultivated, then there would have been the connection between the former part of the section and the latter, which would have led me to think that the latter part of the section only applied to a case where such an original district had been made. If, however, there is no such connection, then the reason of the thing seems to suggest the true interpretation of the section, which is that all lands newly cultivated so as to be highly productive, are to give to the incumbent that which he would unquestionably have been entitled to receive, if no commutation had taken place. It may well be that as to all ordinary productions of the soil, the commutation of tithe is final and conclusive, but in respect of this exceptionally lucrative cultivation, these special provisions have been made. We now come, at the end of sect. 42, to the provision in question as to the additional charge on hop grounds and market gardens newly cultivated as such. It is quite obvious that the words, "shall be charged by the commissioners at the time of such new cultivation," do not refer to the charge to be made in respect of a district in the parish, if there was a district assigned in the parish at the time of the original commutation; but the section provides for a separate extraordinary charge in this case, distinct from a charge imposed on a district assigned at the time of the original commutation. It may, I think, be here observed, that the charge here spoken of in respect of a new district could not be taken to be the charge made at the time of the formation of the first district. I can understand a difference in time, in locality, and in the productiveness of the soil as having an effect on the valuation, and I can see no reason why these circumstances should not be attended to in the valuation to be made at the time of the new cultivation. It must, I think, be a new charge in respect of the new cultivation, and this new charge is not the same as the extraordinary charge imposed on land within a district formed at the time of the original commutation, it was only to be recoverable in like manner and subject to the same incidents. It thus appears to me that the charge is a new charge in respect of lands newly cultivated, and I do not see anything to connect the existence of a district in the parish with the liability of lands newly cultivated as market gardens in a parish in which no district was formed. To come back now to the words of the 42nd section, which deals with the case of "hop grounds and market gardens newly cultivated as such, beyond the limits of every district in which any extraordinary charge for hop grounds or market gardens respectively shall have been distinguished, as aforesaid, at the time of the commutation." What is the meaning of these words? I believe they do nothing more than indicate the possibility of some connection between an original district and the additional rentcharge, which, under a later Act, the commissioners are called upon to make. But when you find there is no such connection between them, you must read the words, "beyond the limits of every district," &c., as equivalent to "beyond the limits of any district," and "beyond" simply means "not within." On the construction, therefore, of the 42nd section, I should conclude that which the reason of the thing points out, that this provision is applicable to the newly cultivated land, and that the commissioners have power to proceed. I by no means disregard the able argument of Mr. Edlin on the mode in which this clause comes in at the end of a section that starts with a provision as to the original commutation; but it seems to me after all intended to fill up the measure of what was considered reasonable in respect of the right of the incumbent to the benefit of any future lucrative cultivation, and to recognise that right as extending over the parish. With regard to the sections of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 62, that were referred to, they extend to fruit plantations certain of the provisions of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 71. I do not mean to go at large into the construction to be put upon those sections, seeing that their language is different, and that market gardens are not referred to in 2 & 3 Vict. c. 62. I may further observe that in 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 71, an unquestionable distinction is made between market gardens and other gardens producing fruit. Only market gardens are put on the same footing as hop grounds and on a different footing from ordinary gardens. It was a common thing to have a modus for a house and garden, but market gardens, unconnected with houses, were differently regarded. If a man having a modus for a house and garden were to turn his garden into a market garden, he would become liable in respect of the larger produce. Whatever the reason may have been we find the Legislature has made the distinction. I do not read the sections of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 15 that were referred to, as opposed to the view that I have taken. I should read the 33rd section of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 62 as intended to put a parochial agreement on the same footing as an award made by the commissioners, and I should treat the 42nd section of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 71, as applicable to the particular case now before us. The 42nd section of 23 & 24 Vict. c. 93 confirms the view that I have taken. That section provides that, when the commissioners are requested in the manner provided by the Act to charge an additional rentcharge on market gardens (they being the species to which we ought to confine our attention), the commissioners may declare the lands within the parish newly cultivated in this way, a district. The section uses the words, "beyond the limits of any district," the word "any" being here substituted for the word "every," which is used in the 42nd section of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 71. The word "every," which might be held in one sense to include some or each of a thing actually existing, is turned into "any." "Beyond the limits of any district," clearly means "not within a district." I think that the provisions of sect. 42 of 23 & 24 Vict. c. 93, justify the conclusion at which I have arrived. I see no reason for limiting the liability of the land in this case, and I find no language in the statute which enables me to say that the commissioners are wrong in proceeding to impose an extraordinary rentcharge in respect of these lands. I think, therefore, there ought to be judgment for the defendants.

M. Smith, J. I am of the same opinion. The question is, whether the power of the commissioners to impose an additional rentcharge on hop grounds and market gardens, newly cultivated as such, under 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 91, s. 42, is by implication limited to the case of lands in a parish, in which, at the original commutation, a district or districts were assigned. There is no express limitation of their power to do so, for you can truly aver of the lands in this case that they are "beyond the limits of every district," &c. Their power, then, is not expressly limited to a case where a district was originally assigned within the parish. If, then, the power is so limited at all, it must be by implication. Is it so limited? I may remark, at the outset, that no sound reason could be pointed out for such a limitation; because, if there were such a limitation, this consequence would follow: supposing a piece of ground of twenty acres to be newly cultivated as a hop ground or market garden, ten acres being in parish A., within which a district had been assigned, and the other ten being in parish B., in which no district had been assigned, then, if such a limitation existed, this consequence would follow, that the ten acres in parish A. would be subject to an extraordinary charge, and the ten acres in parish B. would not. There seems to be no just reason why, in the case of such newly cultivated hop grounds, or market gardens, any such distinction should be made. Then, to see whether this limitation is to be found in the Act by necessary implication, we must look at the mode in which the scheme of the Legislature is framed. Now the object of having a district appointed is apparently this, that in case any of the land within a district shall cease to be cultivated as hop grounds or market gardens, they shall, on ceasing to be so cultivated, revert to the ordinary charge which lands under ordinary cultivation are subject to. Accordingly, under the 40th section of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 71, on the application of the landowner, a district was to be formed, and this provision was clearly inserted for the benefit of the landowner. The 42nd section then declared what was to be done on the commutation of the tithes—viz., that the amount which should be charged by such apportionment on any hop grounds or market gardens in any district so to be assigned should be distinguished into two parts, to be called the ordinary and the extraordinary charge, and that all lands which should cease to be cultivated as hop grounds or market gardens should be charged with the ordinary charge only. That is the first enactment. The second part went on to provide for the case of all lands that might be newly cultivated as hop grounds or market gardens after the commutation, which were to be charged with an additional amount of rentcharge equal to the extraordinary charge per acre on hop grounds or market gardens in that district. Therefore, when lands within an assigned district were brought into this new cultivation, they became liable to a rentcharge equal to the extraordinary charge in that district. Now comes the third part of the clause on which the question arises. (The learned judge here read the latter part of the 42nd section.) So far from the latter words being bound up with the existence of a district in a given parish and of an extraordinary charge upon that district, the mode of charge is left at large. If it had been intended to confine the imposition of an extraordinary charge upon newly-cultivated lands to the case of lands within a parish where a district had been assigned, I should have expected that the Legislature would have referred to the extraordinary charge imposed within the district as some standard for the commutation on the newly-cultivated lands beyond the district. But that is not done, and the charge to be made is independent altogether of the extraordinary charge to be made within a district. If that is so, why should not that be done in an adjoining parish, as well as in the parish in which a district has been formed. The later Act (23 & 24 Vict. c. 93, s. 42), which enables the commissioners to create a new district in respect of lands newly cultivated, seems to me to bring the case of newly cultivated lands in any parish into precisely the same condition as the newly cultivated land in a parish in which a district has been formed. On reading the two sections together, I can come to no other conclusion than this, that, there being no express limitation in the Act, there is nothing to show by necessary implication that we ought to confine the last provision of the 42nd section of 6 & 7. Will. 4, c. 71, to the case of a parish in which a district was formed at the original commutation. The whole argument for the plaintiffs depends on the correctness of the proposition, that the formation of a district in a parish at the time of the original commutation is a necessary condition precedent to the bringing of lands, newly cultivated as hop grounds or market gardens, under the operation of a new assessment. The argument has not satisfied me as to the correctness of that proposition, and I therefore think our judgment must be for the defendants.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by H. LEIGH and R. A. KINGLAKE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Tuesday, June 6, 1871.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. PHILLIPS.

Revenue—Stamp duty—Benefit building society—Receipt given by secretary of, for rent of premises mortgaged by a member to the society—Liability of to stamp duty—10 Geo. 4, c. 56, s. 37—6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32.

By one of the rules of a benefit building society, duly registered pursuant to the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, every member receiving an advance was to give security by mortgage to the satisfaction of the board, and repay the amount, with interest, by agreed monthly instalments. K. was the occupier of a cottage and premises as tenant to the owner, who, being a duly enrolled member of the society, had mortgaged the said premises to the trustees of the society as security for an advance made to him out of the funds of the society pursuant to the provisions of the said Act. The mortgagor having made default in his payments of interest and other moneys to the trustees under the mortgage deed, the latter, in pursuance of the powers in such deed contained, entered into the possession and into the receipt of the rents and profits of the said mortgaged premises, and whilst in such possession, and whilst the mortgage deed was in force and unsatisfied, K. paid to the defendant, as the secretary to such society, the sum of 12*l. for rent of the said premises, and the defendant thereupon gave him an unstamped receipt for the same in the following form: "Temperance Land and Building Society (enrolled as the Temperance Benefit Building Society.) No. 2667. 4, Ludgate-hill, London. 15th Oct.* 1870. Received of Mr. G. C. Knight 12*l. rent of premises, Barnhove Cottage, East Moulsey, due Michaelmas* 1870. For the trustees of the society, Henry J. Phillips, secretary."

Held, by the Court of Exchequer (Kelly, C.B., and Martin, Bramwell, and Cleasby, BB.), giving judgment in favour of the Crown, that the receipt in question was liable to and required a stamp. It did not come within any of the several classes of documents exempted from stamp duty by sect. 37 of the 10 Geo. 4, c. 36, but was to all intents a document given as between landlord and tenant, in pursuance of a contract between them, and by the express terms of the document itself was stated to be a receipt for rent received by the landlord.

SPECIAL CASE.

1. This is a proceeding brought by the Attorney-General against the defendant, for the forfeiture by him of a penalty of 10*l.* for signing the receipt hereinafter mentioned without the same being duly stamped, and by the consent of the parties, and by the order of Martin, B., dated the 6th Dec. 1870, according to the Act (22 & 23 Vict. c. 21, s. 10), this special case, without pleadings has been stated for the opinion of the court.

2. The Temperance Permanent Land and Building Society is a Benefit Building Society, duly registered under the name of "The Temperance Permanent Benefit Building Society," pursuant to the Act of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32. The defendant, who is the secretary of the said society, on the 15th Oct. 1870 received from Mr. G. C. Knight the sum of 12*l.*, and thereupon signed and gave to the said G. C. Knight the receipt set forth in this paragraph, the said receipt not being stamped.

Copy.

Temperance Permanent Land and Building Society (enrolled as The Temperance Permanent Benefit Building Society.)

4, Ludgate-hill.
No. 2667. London, 15th Oct. 1870.

Received of Mr. G. C. Knight twelve pounds, rent of premises, Barnhove-cottage, East Moulsey, due at Michaelmas 1870.

For the trustees of the society,
12*l.* HENRY J. PHILLIPS, Secretary.

3. The said G. C. Knight was, prior to the attornment hereinafter mentioned, the occupier of the cottage and premises mentioned in the said receipt as tenant to the owner thereof, who, being a duly enrolled member of the said society, had mortgaged the same to the trustees of the said society, as security for an advance made to him out of the funds of the said society, in accordance with the provisions of the Act 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32. In the mortgage deed were contained the following provisions:

And it is hereby agreed that if three of the monthly subscriptions herein provided for shall be in arrear and unpaid, or if default be made by the said mortgagor, his trustees, executors, administrators, or assigns, in observance or performance of same agreement, covenant, rule, or bye-law, herein contained or incorporated by reference, or if the said mortgagor shall be bankrupt, or in insolvent circumstances, or make any general arrangement with his creditors, whether by deed or otherwise, then, and in any and each of such events, the said trustees may at any time thereafter, and from time to time, in their absolute discretion, do all, any, or either of the following acts, that is to say, distrain for the amount of any monthly subscriptions and fines which shall be in arrear and unpaid, and of any payments made by the said trustees under the power hereby conferred upon them, as for rent in arrear upon a common demise; or enter into possession of the premises, or receipt of the rents and profits thereof, or appoint a collector of such rents or profits at a reasonable remuneration, or demise the premises, or any part thereof, for any terms, and upon any conditions, or complete any unfinished buildings thereon, or repair the said premises when and as the said trustees shall deem any repair needful or expedient, and for such purposes enter into such contracts as they may think proper and expedient, or insure any buildings on the said premises from fire in such sums as the said trustees shall deem expedient, or pay any rates or taxes due in respect of the said premises, and may, in their absolute discretion, either before or after doing any such act as aforesaid, and subject or not to any such demise, sell the premises, or any part thereof, by public auction or private contract, subject or not to any special or other conditions, as to title or otherwise, and may buy in or rescind and resell without responsibility for loss, and may do all things necessary for effectuating demises and sales, and allow the whole or any part of the purchase-money to remain on security of the premises, on such terms as they shall think fit, and shall, out of the said rents and profits and moneys arising from sales, or any or either of them (so far as the same will extend), firstly pay the rates and taxes in respect of the premises, the costs, charges, and expenses of distraining, taking possession, or of the collection of rents and profits, and of the letting and sale, and of the completion of any buildings, and the repairs and insurance of the premises, and all other costs and outgoings incurred or payable in respect of the premises, together with interest thereon respectively, at the rate of 5*l.* per centum per annum, from the respective times of any such payments; and next retain for the said society all subscriptions, interest, fines, and other moneys due or payable by the said mortgagor, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, to the said society, in respect of any share or shares therein, or otherwise by virtue of the rules or bye-laws for the time being of the said society, or of these presents, as on a redemption by the said mortgagor of the said premises, at the date of the receipt of such moneys; and pay the surplus (if any) to the said mortgagor, his executors, administrators, or assigns. And it is hereby further agreed that every such demise and sale as aforesaid may be made with or against any further consent from the said mortgagor, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns; and that the receipts of the said trustees shall discharge lessees, tenants, occupiers, purchasers, and other persons paying rents, profits, purchase, and other moneys to such trustees or to the said society, from the same and from seeing to the application thereof. And that the rules for the time being of the society shall apply to this mortgage, and be taken by reference as incorporated herein, except so far as the same has been waived by these presents.

A print of the said rules is annexed hereto, and is to be taken as part of this case.

The said mortgage was in force and unsatisfied at the time when the said receipt was signed and given by the said defendant to the said G. C. Knight, and the said member had made default in the payments to the said mortgage deed covenanted to be made by him to the said trustees, and the trustees had, by virtue of a power in that behalf contained in the said mortgage deed, entered into the receipt of the rents, and the said G. C. Knight had attorned tenant to the said trustees. The said sum of 12*l.* so received was forthwith paid by the secretary into the Union Bank, to the credit of the society's account, and was placed to the credit of the members in the society's books, and was received, and the receipt therefor was given, in exercise of the powers contained in the said mortgage-deed, and hereinbefore set out.

4. The question for the opinion of the court, which is to have power to draw inferences of fact, is, whether the said receipt was liable to stamp duty?

If the court should answer the question in the affirmative, judgment is to be entered for the Crown for a penalty of 10*l.* with costs; and if the court should answer the question in the negative judgment is to be entered for the defendant, with costs.

By sect. 37 of the old Friendly Societies Act (10 Geo. 4, c. 56) it was enacted that—

No copy of rules, power, warrant, or letter of attorney, granted or to be granted by any person as trustee of any society established under this Act, for the transfer of any shares in the public funds, standing in the name of such trustee, nor any receipts given for any dividend in any public stock or fund, or interest of Exchequer bills, nor any receipt nor any entry in any book of receipts for money deposited in the funds of any such society; nor for any money received by any member, his or her executors, administrators or assigns, or attorneys, from the funds of such society, nor any bond or other security to be given to or on account of any such society, or by the treasurer or trustee, or any officer thereof; nor any draft nor order, nor any form of assurance, nor any appointment of any agent, nor any certificate or other instrument for the revocation of any such appointment; nor any other instrument or document whatever required or authorised to be given, issued, signed, made or produced in pursuance of this Act, shall be subject or liable to or charged with any stamp duty or duties whatsoever.

And by sect. 4 of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32 (the Act for the regulation of Benefit Building Societies), it is enacted that—

All the provisions of the above-mentioned Act, 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, and also the provisions of 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 40, amending the same, so far as the same or any part thereof may be applicable to the purpose of any benefit building society, and to the framing, certifying, enrolling, and altering the rules thereof, shall extend and apply to such benefit building society and the rules thereof, in such and the same manner as if the provisions of the said Acts had been herein expressly enacted.

The object of the society, as stated by Rule 1 of the printed rules thereof, was to raise, by subscription of the members, and in shares of 30*l.* each, a fund out of which each member should receive the amount or value of his share or shares for the erection or purchase of a dwelling-house or dwelling-houses, or other real or leasehold estate, pursuant to 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32.

By Rule 11 the Board were empowered to advance to members, out of the funds of the society, the amount of their shares; and by Rule 12 every member receiving an advance shall give security by mortgage to the satisfaction of the board, and shall repay the amount, with such interest as may be agreed upon, by such monthly instalments as shall be agreed upon.

Crompton Hutton (with him were The Attorney-General (Sir R. P. Collier, Q. C.) and The Solicitor-General (Sir J. D. Coleridge, Q. C.) for the Crown.—Independently of any statutory exemption from stamp duty, the form of this instrument is such that it would be liable to the ordinary penny receipt stamp; but then the defendant claims exemption under sect. 4 of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32 (the Benefit Building Societies Act), which has been held to incorporate into it the exemption given by the 37th section of the previous Act (the Friendly Societies Act, 10 Geo. 4, c. 56). The defendant will, it is understood, contend that this instrument is exempt under this section as being a "receipt given for money deposited in the funds of any such society," &c., or at all events that it comes within the latter words of that section, "any other instrument or document," &c. (He was here stopped by the court, who called upon)

Quain, Q. C. (with whom was Crompton), for the defendant, to support the claim to exemption.—The 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32 (the Benefit Building Societies Act), clearly contemplated, in express terms (see sects. 1, 3, and 5), the carrying out its objects by the machinery of mortgages by means either of members or strangers mortgaging their property to the society. A mortgage, therefore, is the chief means and machinery upon which the society depends, and they have therefore to carry such mortgage out and enforce it in all its consequences. On such mortgages themselves it will be admitted by the Crown no stamp duty is required. One of the ways or means of enforcing such a mortgage is by the trustees becoming mortgagees in possession, and receiving the rents of the mortgaged property; and clearly if, instead of taking possession, the society had received this money from the member himself, no stamp duty could have been enforced on the receipt. All, therefore that they have done is by the machinery of the mortgage, which the Act of Parliament expressly authorises, to enforce payment of the subscriptions; and the money received from the tenant, though it may, as between landlord and tenant, be rent in a sense, yet in the hands of the society it is merely a mode of enforcing the payment of the member's subscription. It was purely a building society's transaction within and contemplated by the Act of Parliament, and entirely different from the recent case in this court of The Attorney-General v. Gilpin and others (40 L. J. 134, Ex.; L. Rep. 6 Ex. 193) with reference to the stamp duty upon a negotiable instrument, where it was held that the drafts there in question were liable to stamp duty, because the transaction was clearly a banking transaction, and not one within the operations of either a benefit building society or a friendly society. The only difficulty in the defendant's way in the present case is that the receipt was given to the tenant. [BRAMWELL, B.—By your contention the Crown would needlessly lose a penny, because, if the society had paid it, they would be entitled to deduct it as part of their mortgage costs from the mortgagor; and if the society had not entered into possession, and if the mortgagor himself had given the receipt, the Crown would have got a penny stamp upon it. The truth is that, if you are right, the mortgagor will save a penny.] The Act of Parliament meant to exempt from stamp duty, not only the mortgagor and mortgagee, but all persons dealing with the society, and it has been expressly decided that a mortgage made to a stranger, not a member of the society, did not require a stamp: (see the case in Chancery before Sir W. Page Wood, V.C., of Thorn v. Croft, 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 205; 36 L. J., 69, Ch.; L. Rep. 3 Eq. 193.) [MARTIN, B., refers to The Trustees of the Royal Liver Friendly Society v. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 721; 39 L. J. 37, Ex. s. c. nom. In the matter of the Royal Liver Friendly Society (L. Rep. 5 Ex. 78.)] That was not the case of a building society, but one under the new Friendly Societies Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 63, s, 37), in which certain words ("other security"), which were in the corresponding section of the old Act (10 Geo. 4, c. 56, s. 37) were omitted. The present case, however, was under the old Act of Geo. 4. What the Act intended was, it was submitted, to facilitate in every way the bonâ fide transactions of a society of this kind, and what was done here was an Act bonâ fide carrying out the objects of the society; and it was exempt from duty. Had the mortgagor directed the tenant to pay his rent to the society in payment of his subscriptions, it could not be contended that the receipt would be liable to duty, and how does what was done differ from that? The fact of Knight being a stranger was immaterial, according to Thorne v. Croft (ubi sup.), in which Wood, V.C. considered himself bound by the case of Walker v. Giles (6 C. B. 662; 18 L. J. 323, C. P.), the decision in which case, the Vice-Chancellor said, was solemnly affirmed in Barnard v. Pilsworth, cited in a note to Walker v. Giles. (6 C. B. 698, and 18 L. J. 330, C.P.) The words of sect. 37 of 10 Geo. 4, c. 56, cover moneys received from the society, and moneys received by the society in carrying out the purposes of the Act, and although the word "deposited" in that section may not strictly be applicable, yet it is simili casu to a benefit society. The only moneys received by a building society are the subscriptions of members in repaying advances, and the court would construe this as a receipt for money "deposited in the funds of the society." The latter words of that section too were very wide, "nor any other instrument," &c., and might be called in aid of the defendant's argument. This being clearly a document given for carrying out the machinery of the mortgage, authorised and contemplated by the Act, and if the court see it to be such a document they will hold it to come within these last words, if not within the earlier portion of the section. The construction put by the Vice-Chancellor upon that section was that it gave a general exemption from stamp duty, being drawn in the largest terms, and extending to every period of the existence of the societies formed under the Act. As a matter of fact this was the first time since the Act of Geo. 4, that the Crown had sought to charge the duty in such a case.

KELLY, C.B.—I think it is quite clear that the instrument in question in this case requires a stamp. It is not, and indeed it cannot be, contended under the Stamp Act, that a receipt between landlord and tenant for a sum of money for rent due is not within the Stamp Act, and does not require a stamp. The only question is whether this instrument comes within any of the classes of exemption to be found in the 4th section of the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32. The only exemptions which could possibly apply to an instrument of this description are, first, "any receipt given for any dividend in any public stock or fund, or interest of Exchequer bills;" it is not within those words; "nor any receipt nor any entry in any book of receipt for money deposited in the funds of any society"—it is not within those words; "Nor for any money received by any member from the funds of such society,"—it is clearly not within those words. Then comes this further exemption, "Nor any bond nor other security to be given to or on account of any such society." It is clear that this is not a "bond or any other security" given to the society. But it has been contended by Mr. Quain that, because a mortgage given to a society, or on account of a society, of this description, does not require a stamp, therefore this receipt does not require one. I am quite at a loss to understand the connection, or even to see the slightest resemblance between the one and the other. It is quite clear that a mortgage, whenever it is executed, on account of a society of this description, is a "security" given to or on account of that society. That, however, has nothing to do with this receipt. Then come these final general words of the section, "nor any other instrument or document whatever required or authorised to be given or signed, made, or produced in pursuance of this section." Is this a document made in pursuance of the Act? It has nothing in the world to do with the Act; and has not the remotest connection with it. It is a receipt given between the landlord and tenant, in pursuance of the contract which they had entered into, creating a tenancy between them, and in pursuance of that only. Under that contract the tenant is, at certain periods, liable to pay a certain amount of rent to his landlord; he has paid it in this case, not indeed to the landlord in person, but to somebody who has the authority of the landlord, whether in law or in fact, to receive it on his behalf, and it is simply the case of a receipt between the landlord and tenant, having nothing whatever to do with that section of this Act of Parliament. But it has to do with the operation of the Stamp Act, and therefore I am of opinion that this document requires a receipt stamp.

MARTIN, B.—I am clearly of the same opinion. In my judgment this exemption ought to be read according to its plain and ordinary meaning, namely, that those receipts are to be exempted from duty which are given for money deposited, belonging to the funds of the society. I am of opinion that this is not a receipt for money deposited, belonging to the funds of the society. The fact that this money, after it was paid by the tenant, was deposited in the funds of the society, seems to me not at all to affect the question; and, as to the concluding words of the exempting clause, "nor any other instrument or document whatever, required or authorised to be given, issued, signed, made, or produced, in pursuance of this Act," the receipt in question had nothing to do with that. It is a common receipt, as between the assignee of the landlord and the tenant, under an original tenancy. The truth is that it is not arguable.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion, and I think that all that is necessary, to show that the question is not arguable, is to read the receipt, which is as follows: "Received of Mr. G. C. Knight 12*l.*, rent of premises, Barnhove Cottage," &c. It is given as a discharge of the rent due from the tenants' landlord to a building society, because they are assignees of the lease granted to him. If the original mortgagor had given that receipt it would have borne a penny stamp. Why therefore should not the trustees pay it? As to the general words, at the end of the section, they manifestly apply to some document which is contemplated by the statute, and not to a document of this description which is given in pursuance of the requirements of the building society, apart from the purposes contemplated by the Act.

CLEASBY, B.—I am of the same opinion. The receipt is the discharge of the rent to whoever it is due, and might be an important document to him, but he has no claim on that ground to be exempted from stamp duty.

But quære, per Martin and Bramwell, BB., whether sect. 151 of the Public Health Act 1848 includes or applies to a conveyance of this kind at all?

THIS WAS a case on adjudication for stamp duty, which was stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue pursuant to the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97, on the requisition of the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the city and borough of Bath, in order that they might appeal to the Court of Exchequer against the determination of the Commissioners as to the liability of the indenture hereinafter mentioned to stamp duty.

SPECIAL CASE.

1. By an indenture dated the 19th Oct. 1870, between Sir Henry Chandos Rivers, Bart., of the first part, the Honourable Philip Pleydell Bouverie, · George Hamilton, Joseph Hoare, and Lam-ble, of the second part, John George Priestly, third part, Martin Harris and Alfred as Rackham, of the fourth part, dame Catheivers, of the fifth part, William Frederick r, and Thomas Frederick Inman of the part, and the said mayor, aldermen, and sses, being, and acting as, the local board lth in and for the district of the city

th, of the seventh part. After reciting, ıst other things, that the said mayor, en, and burgesses, acting as the said oard, and requiring the messuages and here-nts thereinafter mentioned and thereby ed, for a street improvement within their t, had agreed with the said Sir Henry ge Rivers for the purchase thereof in fee in possession for the sum of 4832*l.* It is ed that, in consideration of the sum of paid as therein mentioned, certain free-ereditaments, numbers 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and et-street, in the city of Bath, were conveyed said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses, their ors, and assigns, for the purposes of the said oard for ever.

he said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses, by olicitors, on the 10th March last, presented d indenture, which was then unstamped, to mmissioners of Inland Revenue at their e Somerset House, under the provisions of th section of the said Act of the 13 & 14
. 97, and desired to have the opinion of the mmissioners whether the said indenture was ir judgment chargeable with stamp duty, ndered and paid to the commissioners the 10*s.*, as required by the said Act.

he said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses
y "The City of Bath Act 1851," constituted al board of health, under the Public Health 48, for the municipal city and borough of y the 19th section of the City of Bath Act

; was enacted that the Public Health Act xcept certain portions thereof, including tion 151 providing exemptions from certain should be incorporated with and form part Act.

was and is alleged on behalf of the said aldermen, and burgesses that, although the ection of the Public Health Act 1848 was, ress enactment, not incorporated in the f Bath Act 1851, the said indenture was, eless, by virtue of some provisions con-in the Local Government Act 1858, and the lovernment Supplemental Act 1869 (No. 2), of them, exempt from stamp duty, under or rence to the said 151st section of the Public Act 1848; but the commissioners were of that the said indenture was not exempt amp duty, but was liable, as a conveyance for 4832*l.*, to the stamp duty of 24*l.* 5*s.*, and nine progressive duties of 10*s.* each, and essed the duty thereon accordingly.

hereupon the said mayor, aldermen, and ss paid to the Receiver-General of Inland ue the sum of 28*l.* 15*s.*, and the said inden-re thereupon stamped with the proper for denoting the said duties, and also with ticular stamp provided by the said Commisunder the said Act, to signify and denote e full amount of stamp duty with which the nture was chargeable had been paid.

7. But the said mayor, aldermen, and burgesses declared themselves dissatisfied with the determination of the said Commissioners, and having deposited with the Commissioners the sum of 40*s.* for costs and charges, pursuant to the 15th section of the said Act (13 & 14 Vict. c. 97), have required the said Commissioners to state, specify, and sign the case on which the question with respect to such stamp duty arose, together with their determination thereon, which the said Commissioners do hereby state and sign accordingly.

8. Prints of the City of Bath Act 1851 and the Local Government Supplemental Act 1869 (No. 2), are annexed, and are to be taken as part of this case.

The question to be decided by the court is, whether the said indenture is chargeable with stamp duty or not.

The following sections of the various Acts of Parliament, upon the construction of which the decision of the case rested, and which were fully discussed and commented on in the course of the arguments of counsel, and in the judgment of the court, are material to this report.

The Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63) by s. 151, enacts that:

No advertisements, &c. . . . under this Act, or for the purpose of carrying the same into effect, nor any deed, award, submission, instrument, contract, agreement, or writing, made or executed by the general or local board, the r officers or servants, under or for the purposes of this Act . . . shall be chargeable with any stamp duty whatever.

By sect. 19 of the City of Bath Act 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. civ.) (local), it was enacted that the Public Health Act 1848, except (amongst other parts of it) the above sect. 151, providing exemptions from certain duties, should be incorporated with and form part of the said City of Bath Act 1851.

By sect. 85 of the said City of Bath Act 1851, it was enacted that such Act should be subject to the provisions of any Act for amending or extending the Public Health Act 1848, passed in the present, or any future session of Parliament.

The Local Government Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98), which was An Act to amend the Public Health Act 1848, and to make further provision for the local government of towns and populous districts, enacted, inter alia—

By sect. 4:

That this Act shall be construed together with, and be deemed to form part of, the Public Health Act 1848; that words used in this Act shall be interpreted in the sense assigned to them in the said Public Health Act; bye laws framed under this Act shall be subject to confirmation, enforced and dealt with in all other respects, as bye laws under the said Public Health Act, and the provisions of each of the said Acts shall, so far as may be consistent with the provisions of this Act, respectively be applicable to all matters and things arising under the other Act.

By sect. 5:

That this Act shall take effect from 1st Sept. 1858, in places where the Public Health Act is already in force, wholly or partially. Provided always that nothing in this Act shall affect the qualification and number of the members of local boards of health in such places, or any power, right, privilege, or liability of any board of improvement commissioners, exercising powers of the Public Health Act 1848, or of any town council or local board of health, under or by virtue of any general or local Act of Parliament other than the said Public Health Act.

By sect. 6:

Local boards under this Act shall, subject to this Act, have all the powers, rights, duties, and liabilities of local boards of health constituted under the Public Health Act 1848 and the Acts incorporated therewith.

And by sect. 75:

The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 is incorporated with this Act, with an exception therein mentioned, and the steps to be taken by any local board, prior to putting the Lands Clauses Act into force with respect to the purchase and taking of lands otherwise than by agreement, are thereby prescribed.

By the Local Government Act (1858) Amendment Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 61), sect. 29, it is enacted that:

The provisions of (amongst other Acts) the Local Government Act 1858, as amended by this Act, shall extend and apply to all local boards of health constituted under or by virtue of Local Acts, subject to (amongst others) this qualification, that the provisions of the General Acts, opposed o or restrictive of the provisions, whether adopted or original, of any such Local Act, shall be of no force in the district for which the Local Act was passed.

And by sect. 30:

This Act shall be deemed to be incorporated with the Local Government Act 1850, and shall be read as if the two were one Act.

By the Local Government Supplemental Act 1869 (No. 2) (32 & 33 Vict. c. cl.) it is enacted that,

The provisional orders recited in the schedules thereunto annexed under the Local Government Act 1858, shall from and after the passing of the Act be confirmed, &c.

And in one of the schedules thereto the following is contained:

Bath. Provisional order putting in force the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 within the district of the Bath (City) Local Board of Health, for the purchase and taking of lands otherwise than by agreement, for the purposes of a street improvement.

And then, reciting that the said local board had, in pursuance of sect. 95 of the Local Government Act 1858, and after complying with its requirements, petitioned the Secretary of State for authority to put in force the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, to enable the said local board to purchase certain pieces of land for the purpose of a street improvement, and that the said petition duly set forth in the said schedule the said pieces of land (being the premises in question in this case) and all other necessary particulars required by the statute, and prayed that the said board might be allowed to put in force the said Lands Clauses Consolidation Act with respect to the purchase and taking thereof otherwise than by agreement; and that the said Secretary of State had appointed an inspector to visit the district, who had inquired into the matter and duly reported thereon. The said Secretary of State, in pursuance of powers vested in him by the Local Government Act 1858, thereby ordered and directed that from the passing of any Act confirming this order the said local board should be empowered to put in force, with reference to the said lands, the powers of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, with respect to the purchase and taking of land otherwise than by agreement, for the purpose thereinbefore set forth and described.

Murch for the appellants, the corporation of Bath.—The corporation are found by the case to be the local board of health for the district of Bath, under the Public Health Act of 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63). The City of Bath Act 1851, which incorporates portions of the Public Health Act 1848, expressly, by its 19th section, excludes from such incorporation, amongst other sections, the 151st section of that Act, which provides exemption from certain duties. At the time, therefore, when the Local Government Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98) was passed, the Public Health Act 1848 was partially in force in the city of Bath. The question then is, whether or not there is anything in the Local Government Act 1858 which is a public general Act, or in any other Act, enabling the local board of health to take advantage of the exemption from stamp duty provided by the 151st section of the Public Health Act. By sect. 5 of the Local Government Act 1858 that Act is to take effect in places where the Public Health Act was already wholly or partially in force, and therefore it took effect in Bath, and so it was unnecessary that any of the steps mentioned in the 12th and other sections of the Local Government Act should be taken for its adoption; and by sect. 24, the duty of carrying the Act into execution is vested in the local board, which, in corporate boroughs, it is enacted shall be the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses acting in council. It is solely in pursuance of and under the powers of that Act (sect. 75) that the corporation are enabled to take and purchase, in the way in which they have done it, the lands which are the subject of the present conveyance. [BRAMWELL, B.—Was this taken by agreement?] No; it was taken by a provisional order, as is shown by the Local Government Supplemental Act 1869, No. 2 (32 & 33 Vict. c. cl.) which is made a part of the case. The schedule to that Act shows that these very premises were purchased by the corporation in pursuance of a provisional order under sect. 75 of the Local Government Act 1858, which was confirmed by this supplemental Act, which is incorporated with the Local Government Act of 1858, which last-mentioned Act incorporates the Public Health Act of 1848, which contains the exempting sect. 151. The City of Bath Act 1851 gave no power whatever to the corporation to take or purchase these lands, and it is solely in pursuance of their powers, as a board of health under the Act of 1858, that they have acted in this purchase. [MARTIN, B.—The case states the purchase to have been by agreement between the corporation and Sir Henry Rivers, and not at all under any compulsory or statutory powers, and the authorities at the Stamp Office look only to the terms of the deed, and impose a stamp accordingly; and this, on the face of the deed itself, looks very like an ordinary purchase. If it is any part of your argument that the purchase was "otherwise than by agreement," you should have the case amended.] The case states that the land was acquired "for the purposes of the board," and it is submitted that, that being so, it is immaterial whether it was by compulsion or agreement. The corporation were acting under the 75th section of the Act of 1858, and in pursuance of the Local Government Supplemental Act of 1869, and so, it is contended, the conveyance is exempt from duty. [MARTIN, B.—In Aug. 1869 the corporation got power, under the Local Government Supplemental Act referred to, to compel Sir Henry Rivers to sell; but between that date and the 19th Oct. 1870, it seems to have been thought better to agree, and not to have any compulsion in the matter. If that be so, and if it be a material matter, the case had better be amended. Crompton Hutton for the Crown (contra).—My friend may take it as he likes. On the part of the Crown I do not think it worth while to send the case back. The real question of course is, whether the appellants can get rid of the clause in the Bath Act of 1851, excluding the exempting section of the Public Health Act 1848 from that Act. BRAMWELL, B.—Mr. Murch is not instructed that this was taken by compulsion, and the case states that it was not so. Why then should we trouble ourselves about it?] It is submitted that the statement in the case, that there was an agreement is not inconsistent with the grantor's having required the grantees to obtain from the Secretary of State the power to take the purchase. They were clearly acting under the provisions of the Act of 1858. As a matter of fact, the conveyance was executed by them, whether that was necessary or not, and then, it appearing on the face of it to be for the purposes of their Act, it would be a deed within sect. 151 of the Public Health Act 1858. [BRAMWELL, B.—I doubt very much whether the words of that section include a conveyance such as the present. MARTIN, B.—So do I. I doubt whether that exception has anything to do with this transaction.] But, if that section do apply, then this deed is within it. Being a board under the Local Government Act of 1858 by virtue of sect. 5, they are, under sect. 6 of that Act, entitled to "all the powers, rights, duties, and liabilities of local boards under the Public Health Act 1848, and the Acts incorporated therewith," and one of these "rights," or rather perhaps "privileges," is under sect. 151, that any deed executed by them as a local board shall be exempt from stamp duty. Then by sect. 85 of the City of Bath Act 1851, that Act is expressly made "subject to the provisions of any Act for amending or extending the Public Health Act 1848, passed in the present or any future session of Parliament," clearly contemplating alterations in the general law which might affect this local Act, and reading that 85th section with sect. 6 of the Local Government Act the effect is to make sect. 19 of the Bath City Act subject to that 6th section, and to override the exception or non-incorporation of sect. 151 of the Public Health Act in the Bath Act, the intention being that all the provisions of that Act should be subject to any public Act passed hereafter affecting the same subject-matter. Again, by sect. 4 of the Local Government Act, that Act is to be "construed together with and be deemed to form part of the Public Health Act," so that the words "under and for the purposes of this Act" in sect. 151 of the Public Health Act may be read as if they were in the Local Government Act; and, further, sect. 4 enacts that "the provisions of each of the said Acts shall, as far as may be consistent with the provisions in this Act (Local Government Act) respectively be applicable to all matters and things arising under the other Act." Now the provisions of sect. 151 of the Public Health Act are consistent with those of the Local Government Act, and should take effect and be applicable wherever the latter Act is applicable. The Crown will rely probably on the proviso at the end of sect. 5 of the Local Government Act 1858, that "nothing in this Act shall affect the qualification, &c. . . . or any power, right, privilege, or liability of any board, &c., exercising power of the Public Health Act 1848, or of any town council or local board of health under or by virtue of any general or local Act of Parliament other than the said Public Health Act." It will be contended, contra, probably that that leaves the Bath people just where they were; but I submit that it does not prevent the application of the wide words of sect. 6, nor is a liability to stamp duty a liability created by any local Act; but, if created at all, by the original Stamp Act. Moreover, the words at the end of that proviso must be taken to apply to general Acts having reference to the same subject matter. [MARTIN, B.—It is not a liability at all within the meaning of this 5th section.] Then, if that be so, sect. 5 does not touch the appellants. The Crown will also probably rely on sect. 29 of the Local Government Act (1858) Amendment Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 61), but the provision in sect. 6 of the Local Government Acts 1858 is not "opposed to or restrictive of the provisions" of the Local Act, and certainly not so when sect. 85 of the Bath Act is taken into consideration.

Crompton Hutton (with him were the Attorney-General (Sir R. P. Collier, Q.C.), and the Solicitor-General (Sir J. D. Coleridge, Q.C.), for the Crown, contra.—[BRAMWELL, B.—Do you argue this case as upon the special liability of Bath?] Yes. There has been no decision that sect. 151 of the Public Health Act would not apply to a conveyance of land to a local board, and the practice of Somerset House, as a general rule, has been, whether rightly or wrongly, to treat such conveyances as exempt from duty, where the deed has been executed by the local board. That practice, however, would not exclude the Crown from now arguing that this 151st section would not apply to a conveyance of land, and showing that the practice of the commissioners had been mistaken hitherto from 1848. The present is the first case of such a special exception of sect. 151, and it is contended that that exception is still operative, and that there is nothing in any of the subsequent general Acts which can at all take away the effect of it. The general principle is that, where a certain body, in order to bring themselves within a public Act, require to have a private Act, and that private Act contains an express exemption from a particular portion of the General Public Act, no intention or implication can be drawn from a subsequent general Act to show a repeal of that exemption. Taken by itself this deed would of course be liable, as a conveyance, to an ad valorem stamp duty, and its exemption rests entirely on this 151st section of the Act of 1848. But that Act is absolutely excluded and taken out of the private Act, and it is just as if that section had never been enacted at all, because it is entirely on their private Act that the corporation found their right to take this land. [BRAMWELL, B.—Is that so? I cannot make out that under their Act of 1851 they would have had a right to take this land for this purpose. CLEASBY, B.—They have taken it under the other Act, the Local Government Act of 1858.] That may be so, but the private Act of 1851 is the charter of the corporation, the source and fountain, as it were, from which all their powers proceed, and all subsequent general Acts must be read with reference to it, and no general sections in any subsequent Act can be read, by implication or general words, to repeal a particular enactment, such as this 19th section, which deprives them of the exemption in sect. 151 of the Act of 1848, which, according to the argument on the other side, they would otherwise be entitled to. It is not indeed contended by the appellants that the Local Government Act 1858 expressly repeals this 19th section, but it is suggested that it is done by some of the early sections of that Act; but it is plain from the words of the 4th section that the Local Government Act is to be read with the Public Health Act, which is the basis of all this legislation, and not that the Public Health Act is to be brought down to, and read with the Local Government Act. Sect. 29 of the Local Government Act (1858) Amendment Act 1861, referred to by my friend, clearly shows that his argument is wrong, and is, in fact, if such were necessary, a legislative declaration that any provisions of subsequent general Acts, which might have the effect of qualifying or repealing this particular exception, shall be of no force whatever, for that purpose. As to the point whether this is a deed within sect. 151, the words of that section are certainly very general, and, considering the past practice of the commissioners, with regard to the question, and relying most strongly on the other point, I will not at present argue the question whether this deed comes within that section.

March, in reply, relied strongly on sect. 85 of the City of Bath Act 1851, as removing any repugnancy or inconsistency arising from sect, 29 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 61, and urged that there was nothing to deprive sect. 6 of the Local Government Act 1858 of its effect to extend the provisions of the Public Health Act to all matters which local boards had to deal with, and which, in this case, the appellants dealt with "under" the Local Government Act 1858; at any rate, if there was a doubt, the court, in the case of the imposition of a tax, would decide in favour of the subject.

Kelly, C. B.—There is a good deal of perplexity and complexity about this case, in consequence of the numerous Acts of Parliament, containing provisions bearing upon the particular point which is before us; but, upon carefully considering those several Acts of Parliament in the order of their dates, and with reference to the different periods of time at which they have come into operation, it appears to me that this deed is exempt from stamp duty. The appellants bear two different characters, and occupy two different positions in the city of Bath. They are the local board of health, and also the board, by whatever title it may be called or described, for the local government of the city of Bath. Looking at the course and order of legislation it appears to be this: That by the Act of 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), local boards of health were established, and were under the 151st section of that Act exempted from stamp duty in respect of the different instruments enumerated in that section. Thus things continued until the year 1851, when the city of Bath Act (14 & 15 Vict. c. civ.) was passed, which received the Royal assent on the 24th of July, 1851, and that Act incorporated, to some extent and for certain purposes, the Public Health Act of 1848; yet nevertheless, by the 19th section clearly, and in express terms, excluding from such incorporation the 151st section of the Public Health Act of 1848. Consequently, the operation of the two Acts, taken together, clearly and undeniably is that, the local board of Bath was not, at that time, exempted from stamp duty with relation to these specified matters. But then that very Act, which thus excludes the City of Bath from that exemption, contains a clause (the 85th section) which is in these terms, "That this Act shall be subject to the provisions of any Act for amending or extending the Public Health Act 1848, passed in the present or any future sessions of Parliament." Then comes the Local Government Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98), and the question is what is the operation of that Act upon the matter now before the Court? We find in the 4th section that there is this provision "This Act shall be construed together with and be deemed to form part of the Public Health Act 1848." Now, if this Act of 1858 forms part of the Act of 1848, the Act of 1848 forms part of this Act of 1858, and they must be read as one Act of Parliament, and one only, that passed on the 2nd Aug. 1858. Therefore here will be an Act of Parliament of the 2nd Aug. 1858, including within it and containing this 151st section, the exemption section of the Act of 1848, and the question is whether that does not of itself, without anything more, override the exclusion of that exemption in the 19th section of the Bath Local Act of 1851, and apply that exemption to the local board of health, which comes within the provisions or the operation of this Act of 1858, for the local government of the city and borough of Bath. I think that it does. But the language of the 4th section goes farther, and says: "Words used in this Act shall be interpreted in the sense assigned to them in the said Public Health Act. Bye-laws framed under this Act shall be subject to confirmation, enforced, and dealt with in all other respects as bye-laws under the said Public Health Act," and then follows these remarkably effective words: "The provisions of each of the said Acts shall, so far as may be consistent with the provisions of this Act, respectively be applicable to all matters and things arising under the other Act." Then here we have it, in express terms, enacted by the Legislature, that this 151st section shall be, and form part of, this latter Act of the 2nd Aug. 1858. What then is the operation of all these various enactments on the question now before us? When we look at the section in question, sect. 151 of the Public Health Act 1848, the exemption is to apply to deeds, and so forth, "made or executed by the said general or local board, or any officer or servant under or for the purposes of this Act." We come now to the case of the instrument in question. Is it an instrument "made or executed under or for the purposes of" this Act of 1858? When we look at the Local Government Supplemental Act 1869 (No. 2) (the 32 & 33 Vict. c. civ.), we find that it is clearly and distinctly made to appear that this purchase was made under, and for the purposes of the Act of 1858, and that it was preceded by all the steps necessary to be taken in order to clothe the transaction with the protection, and the character, of a transaction under that Act and under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, which is incorporated therewith. Under these circumstances, it appears to me (though it may not be absolutely clear and free from doubt), that this transaction having taken place under the Act of 1858, which Act contains the exemption clause of the Act of 1848, by the operation of sect. 4 this deed does come within that exemption clause, and consequently that the appellants are entitled to be exempted from the stamp duty. Though it may not be perfectly clear, on account of the complicated provisions to be found in succession in these several Acts of Parliament, yet, where the question is whether a tax should or should not be levied upon the subject, I always feel inclined to pronounce judgment in favour of the subject and he Crown, though I really do not myself t there is any such doubt in the present impose upon me the necessity of acting . Under these circumstances the appeal llowed.

, B.—I do not see my way quite so clear rd Chief Baron does, but, nevertheless, I t all mean to differ from him. My own n rather was that that exception in section of the Local Act of 1851, in fact hat, in all procedings with regard to this rd of health, the corporation of Bath in the same condition as the rest of Her subjects with respect to stamp duty. I concur in thinking that the appeal allowed.

ELL, B.—I think that this appeal should l. I think that one may collect from the this property was taken by the board for ses of their public duties, and under the of the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98, as put into he particular statute of 1869. Now, as he Local Government Act (21 & 22 Vict. my Lord has said, we are to read it as he Public Health Act of 1848 were it. If we do so it is quite clear that section would be in the 21 & 22 Vict. ppose, then, that it is there. Then here ses which are taken under the authority e purposes of that Act, the conveyance would have been exempt from stamp ey had been taken under the authority of c Health Act, and for the purposes of as they are under this Act, which in udes that 151st section within it. But said that there is a previous private Act nent (as we may call it), that is to say, f 1851, applicable to the city of Bath, s that sect. 151 of the Public Health Act all not be a portion of that private Act ough certain other sections are said to That then is the consequence? Does t the subsequent general Act conferring same body, which existed under the ct of 1851, certain additional duties and r does it merely continue to affect that y in so far as it is exercising the nd performing the duties which it ed upon it under the local Act of 1851? to me, in all reason, that it continues to that which the board shall do under the 51, their private Act, and not to that y shall do under the powers and in per- f the duties imposed upon them by the ct of 21 & 22 Vict. I cannot see why e otherwise. I cannot see why the city ould be more liable to pay stamp duty eyances to it for the purposes of an Act ent which is applicable to the whole of y, than any other place in the country. o me that it would be an injustice to were otherwise, and I can see no reason uing the statutes in such a way as to injustice upon them. If it should be ll, but it was so with reference to Bath ir private Act of 1851," the reason of to me to be obvious, and the answer is, was a particular Act which they got for purposes. It was an Act for the im- of the city and borough of Bath, hat improvement it incorporated cer- es of the Public Health Act of 1848. But it was also an Act for the regulation of markets, and for supplying the city of Bath with water, &c. Why then the corporation of Bath having, for their own profit, and the profits of the ratepayers of that particular place, made a lease of their tolls in the markets, should be exempt from duty, I can see no reason, and consequently I can well understand why the Legislature said that sect. 151 of the Public Health Act of 1848 should not apply to this private Act of the city of Bath. Whatever the corporation may do under the powers and authorities of their private Act of 1851 is as subject to duty as though sect. 151 of the Public Health Act of 1848 had never been passed, but whatever they do under the powers and authorities of the Act of 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98), the Local Government Act, they do, and ought to do, as free from stamp duty as any other corporation or body, carrying into effect the powers and objects of that Act, would do. I think that on that ground this appeal should be allowed, always, however, with this reservation. I must not be understood as expressing an opinion that this case is within sect. 151 of the Public Health Act of 1848, even if it had occurred in any other place than Bath; but, as the Crown does not ask for judgment upon the ground that this is not a deed within sect. 151, I do not give it to them. On the other point I think the appellants are right, and, consequently, that the appeal should be allowed.

CLEASBY, B.—I am of the same opinion. The City of Bath Act of 1851 introduces, by its 19th section, the Public Health Act of 1848, but it introduces it with (I may call it) a certain exemption, it takes something out of it. But then we have in that Act of Parliament (the City of Bath Act) the 85th section, and that section enacts that "this Act shall be subject to the provisions of any Act for amending or extending the Public Health Act 1848, passed in the present or any future session of Parliament." Therefore, if an Act of Parliament had passed in that, or any subsequent session, enacting that all the clauses of the Public Health Act 1848, including the 151st section, or that all the clauses, should be applicable to local boards, then we should have found this 85th section acted upon and carried into effect. There is an enactment to that effect in the Local Government Act of 1858. I do not propose to add anything to what my Lord and my learned brethren have said upon that subject, because I agree with what I have said, and I am satisfied with the reasons which they have given; but it does appear that, afterwards, considerable doubts arose as to how far local boards of health, acting under local Acts, were controlled by the General Local Government Act. That appears by the Act of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 61, and sect 29 is found in that Act for the purpose of removing those doubts. I think it is tolerably clear that, but for the words at the end of that section, the effect of the 29th section of the Act would have been to have made the Local Government Act 1858 apply to all the local boards. There is certainly this exception, which has been referred to by the learned counsel for the Crown, and, if that applied, I think it would carry him to the conclusion to which he asked the court to come; but I do not think that it does apply. I think, if we look at what the effect of that exception is, that it comes to this: if there had been in the Local Act a provision that a particular building should not be improved or touched, and then there had been in the General Local Government Act a provision that all buildings might be taken, then the provision in the Local Act would have prevailed over the provision in the General Act, for this reason, that "provisions of general Acts opposed to or restrictive of the provision, whether adopted or original, of any Local Acts shall be of no force in the district" (these are the words made use of) "for which the Local Act was passed." That shows that the provisions referred to are provisions applicable to the particular district, and I do not think that that qualification of the Act of Parliament prevents the General Local Government Act from applying; but that section has the effect of removing the doubt, if any exists, as to the General Act overriding in this case the local Act.

Reported by JOHN ROSS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Saturday, June 10, 1871.

REG. v. THE JUSTICES OF DERBYSHIRE (on the Prosecution of the London and North-Western Railway Company.)

Poor rate—Valuation list—Appeal against amended rate—Renewal of notice of objection to list—27 & 28 Vict. c. 39, s. 1.

Sect. 1 of 27 & 28 Vict. c. 39, enacts that before any appeal shall be heard by any sessions against a poor rate, the appellant shall give twenty-one days' notice, with the grounds, to the assessment committee; provided that no person shall be empowered to appeal to any sessions against a poor rate made in conformity with the valuation list approved by the committee, unless he shall have given to the committee notice of objection against the list, and shall have failed to obtain such relief in the matter as he deems just.

The appellants were assessed to a poor rate. They gave notice of objection to the valuation list deposited, but did not appear on the day fixed for hearing objections. The list was approved, and a rate made in conformity with it. On the following day the appellants gave notice of their intention to dispute their liability to pay the sum at which they were assessed. The assessment committee heard the objection made by them and reduced the rate, whereupon the list and rate were amended. Being dissatisfied with the amount of reduction, the appellants gave notice of appeal against the rate as it was made in the first instance. The quarter sessions, however, declined to hear the appeal on the ground that the appellants were not "persons who had failed to obtain relief" within sect. 1 of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 103, as they had not given to the assessment committee notice of objection to the amended list and rate.

On a rule for a mandamus,

Held, that the appellants, having objected to the valuation list, and having failed to obtain such relief as they deemed just, were entitled to have their appeal heard, and need not repeat their notice of objection, although some reduction in the amount of the assessment had been made by the committee, and the list and rate amended.

On the 9th July 1870, a union assessment committee duly deposited a valuation list made by them for the parish of Fairfield.

On the 14th July the London and North-Western Railway Company, deeming themselves to be assessed too highly, served a notice of objection to the list upon the assessment committee, pursuant to 27 & 28 Vict. c. 39, s. 1.

On the day appointed by the committee for hearing objections to the list, viz., 25th July, no one appeared to object to the same, and it was approved.

On the 13th Aug. a poor rate was made in conformity with the list, and upon the following day the company gave notice to the parish officer of their intention to dispute their liability to pay the sum at which they were assessed. The 3rd Oct. was then appointed by the assessment committee for hearing the objection, and they ultimately reduced the rate. Whereupon the list and the rate were amended.

The company being still discontented, gave due notice of appeal against the rate of the 13th Aug.

At the April sessions 1871 the appeal came on for hearing, but the court declined to entertain it on the ground that the company were not "persons who had failed to obtain relief" within the terms of sect. 1 of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 103, as they had not given to the assessment committee any notice of objection to the amended list, or any notice of appeal against the rate made in conformity with the list.(a)

A rule nisi having been obtained, calling upon the justices to show cause why a mandamus should not issue commanding them to enter continuances and hear the appeal.

S. C. Bristowe and Buzzard showed cause, and contended that the appellants should have given notice of objection to the amended list, and of appeal against the amended rate by which they alleged that they were aggrieved. In Reg. v. The Great Western Railway Company (20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 481; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 324) the appellants, having been assessed to a poor rate in conformity with a valuation list, gave notice of their objection to the list, but the committee refused to alter the list, and on appeal the rate was confirmed subject to a case. While the case was pending, a second rate was made in conformity with the list which

(a) 27 & 28 Vict. c. 39 (Union Assessment Committee Amendment Act 1864), sect. 1 enacts that: "Before any appeal shall be heard by any special or quarter sessions against a poor rate made for any parish contained in any union to which the Union Assessment Committee Act 1862 applies, the appellant shall give twenty-one days' notice in writing previous to the special or quarter sessions to which such appeal is to be made, of the intention to appeal, and the grounds thereof, to the assessment committee of such union: Provided, that after the 1st Aug. next no person shall be empowered to appeal to any sessions against a poor rate framed in conformity with the valuation list approved of by such committee, unless he shall have given to such committee notice of objection against the said list, and shall have failed to obtain such relief in the matter as he deems just; and which objection, after notice given at any time in the manner prescribed by the said Act with respect to objections, the committee shall hear with full power to call for and amend such list, although the same has been approved of and no subsequent list has been transmitted to them, and if they amend the same shall give notice of such amendment to the overseers, who shall thereupon alter their current rate accordingly."

ed unaltered as to the appellants, and the nts having given twenty-one days' notice of against the rate to the committee, applied quarter sessions to enter the appeal against cond rate, without having given a fresh to the committee of objection to the list; was held that a fresh notice of objection to was a condition precedent to the right to he appeal against the second rate. A fortiori, otice of objection should be given when the s been altered. The provision in sect. 1 notice of objection against the list "ap- by the committee" shall have been given any appeal shall be heard against the rate. re there was no objection to the amended ich was in fact the one approved by the ttee.

Mellor in support of the rule.—If there en a new rate there must also have been notices, as in Reg. v. The Great Western y Company (sup.). But this rate was not a e. It was the rate of the 13th Aug., although d, and against that rate the proper notices al were given. REG. v. THE JUSTICES OF MIDDLESEX.

9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 14—32 & 33 Vict. c. 27 (the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869)—New tenant—Change of occupancy—Special sessions.

R. the occupier of a beerhouse with respect to which a licence was in force on the 1*st May* 1869, obtained, at the general annual licensing meeting holden for Middlesex in March 1870, a certificate for the renewal of the licence. He was afterwards fined for keeping his house open for the sale of beer during the prohibited hours of Sunday, and consequently yielded up possession of the premises to the appellant. R. applied, however, at the general annual licensing meeting in March 1871, and again at the adjourned meeting, for a renewal of the certificate, which was on each occasion refused, and, as he did not appeal, the certificate and licence lapsed.

The appellant having entered into occupation of the premises on the 14*th April* 1871, and not being in time therefore to apply at the general meeting in March, gave the proper notices, and applied at a special session, under 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 14, for a certificate for a licence that would enable him to carry on the business until the ensuing general annual licensing meeting. The justices dismissed his application on the ground that as a new certificate had been refused to R., and as his former certificate and licence had lapsed, the provisions of the 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 14, did not apply.

An appeal to quarter sessions was dismissed for the same reason. A rule nisi for a mandamus having been obtained:

Held that the unsuccessful applications of R. did not affect the appellant, who, being a new tenant of the premises within the terms of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 14, was entitled to apply at the special sessions; and that, in the absence of any objection to his character, or to that of the house, a certificate should have been granted.

RULE calling upon the justices for the county of Middlesex to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue commanding them to enter continuances and hear an appeal by Joseph Parsons against a refusal of justices for the said county to grant to him a certificate for a licence for the sale of beer.

James Rose, the keeper of a beerhouse that had a licence in force on the 1st May 1869, obtained at the general annual licensing meeting, holden on the 4th March 1870, a certificate for a licence under the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 27, s. 5 (the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869).

In the following Oct. he was fined 5*l.* for the offence of selling beer within the prohibited hours of Sunday, and his landlord consequently compelled him to transfer his interest in the house and licence to the appellant. Upon the 14th Feb. 1871 the latter entered into possession of the beerhouse, Rose undertaking to use his best endeavours to cause the licence to be transferred to him.

At the next general annual licensing sessions holden on the 6th March, Rose applied for a renewal of his certificate for a beerhouse licence, but the application was refused, as was also a subsequent application made by him at the adjourned meeting on the 20th March. He did not inform the justices on either occasion that he had transferred his interest to the appellant, and had ceased to be the occupier of the house.

After issuing the requisite notices, and stating therein that Rose had removed from and yielded up possession of the house, the appellant applied under 9 Geo. 4, c. 6, s. 14, to special sessions held for the St. Pancras division on the 12th April for a certificate for a licence, and it was argued on his behalf that as there was on the 1st May 1869 a beerhouse licence in force with respect to the same house, it was the duty of the special sessions to hear the application on the merits, and to grant a certificate, if neither the appellant nor his house were within the four exceptions in sect. 8 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869.

The justices dismissed the application on the ground that the question had been decided on the application of Rose, and that, as he had not appealed, sect. 14 of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61 did not apply.

On appeal from the decision of the justices at special sessions to those at quarter sessions, the latter were of opinion that the refusal to entertain the application of the appellant was right. (a)

(a) 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 1 enacts that general annual licensing meetings shall be holden in the county of Middlesex within the first ten days of March.

Sect. 14 enacts that if any person licensed to keep an inn under this Act . . . "shall remove from, or yield up the possession of the house specified in such licence, or if the occupiers of any such house being about to quit the same, shall have wilfully omitted, or shall have neglected to apply to the general annual licensing meeting, or at any adjournment thereof, for a licence to continue to sell excisable liquors by retail to be drunk and consumed in such house . . . . it shall be lawful for the justices assembled, as aforesaid, at a special session holden under the authority of this Act for the division or place in which the house so kept, or having been kept, shall be situate . . . to grant . . . . to any new tenant or occupier of any house having so become unoccupied . . . a licence to sell excisable liquors by retail to be drunk or consumed in such house or on the premises thereunto belonging. . . . Provided always that every such licence shall continue in force only from the day on which it shall be granted, until the 5th April or the 10th October then next ensuing, as the case may be. . . ."

32 & 33 Vict. c. 27 (Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869), s. 4, enacts that, "From and after the 15th July 1869, no licence or renewal of a licence for the sale by retail of beer . . shall (save as in this Act otherwise provided) be granted, except upon the production and in pursuance of the authority of a certificate granted under this Act."

Sect. 6 enacts that such certificate shall be in force for one year from the date of its being granted.

Sect. 8 enacts that, "All the provisions of the said Act of the 9 Geo. 4, as to the terms upon which and the manner in which, and the persons by whom grants of licences are to be made by the justices at the said general annual licensing meeting, and as to appeal from any act of any justice, shall, so far as may be, have effect with regard to grants of certificates under this Act.

Sect. 19, enacts that "Where on the 1st May 1869, a licence under any of the recited Acts is in force with respect to any house or shop for the sale by retail therein of beer . . . to be consumed on the premises, it shall not be lawful for the justices to refuse an application for a certificate for the sale of beer . . to be consumed on the premises, in respect of such house or shop except upon one or more grounds" . . . which are stated in sect. 8, and are shortly these: first, that the applicant has failed to produce satisfactory evidence of good character; secondly, that the house or any adjacent house is of disorderly character, thirdly, that the applicant has previously forfeited a licence for the sale of beer, &c., for misconduct; fourthly, that the applicant or the house is not duly qualified as by law is required.

38 & 34 Vict. c. 29 (Wine and Beerhouse Act Amendment Act 1870), s. 9, enacts that "Where the renewal of any certificate granted under the principal Act is refused, any licence held under any authority thereof shall, if the person aggrieved do not give notice of appeal . . . within the time limited for such notice, or if such notice having been given the appeal be not prosecuted or be dismissed, become void to all intents from the time of such failure to give notice of or to prosecute the appeal or of such dismissal as the case may be. . . ."

The above rule having been obtained,

Poland showed cause.—The certificate obtained by Rose in March 1870, being in force for one year, lapsed in March 1871, and with it the licence. Consequently the house was unlicensed in April 1871, when the appellant sought to obtain a certificate at special sessions, and the provisions of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 14, do not apply to such a case; they were intended to operate only where a licence is actually in force but the tenant of the house has died or given up possession. Then an interim certificate may be granted to the new occupier authorising him to continue the business until the ensuing licensing meeting. If a certificate expires, a fresh one must be obtained, but it cannot be granted at the special sessions, which would be converted into general annual licensing meetings at once if applications for new certificates were allowed thereat. A certificate having been refused to R., no subsequent application could be made until the next general annual meeting. The justices were right in coming to the conclusion that they had no power at special sessions to grant such a certificate.

McMahon for the appellant.—The Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869, attached a kind of vested right to houses having a licence which was in force on the 1st May 1869, by enacting that it should not be lawful for the justices to refuse an application for a certificate for the sale of beer, &c. to be consumed on the premises in respect of such house or shop, except upon certain grounds. This house was licensed on the 1st May 1869, and the occupier was therefore entitled to a certificate, as no objection upon any of those grounds was raised to himself or the house. It matters not that the former certificate had lapsed. A very similar case to the present was Reg. v. The Justices of the West Riding (21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 490; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 33). There B. applied at a general annual licensing meeting for a certificate for a certain house. It was proved that he had been convicted of misconduct in another house. The justices refused the certificate. At an adjourned meeting D. applied for a certificate for the first house. Held, that the fact of the certificate having been refused to B. was no bar under sect. 8 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869, to the application by D. Now, Rose was duly licensed when he gave up possession of the premises to the appellant on the 14th Feb. There was not time, however, between that date and the following 4th March, for the appellant to give the notices necessary to found an application to the general annual licensing meeting holden on the last-mentioned day. Therefore, he was entitled to apply at the next special sessions, under 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 14. [HANNEN, J.—You say, then, that he was in no worse position through Rose having made a wrongful application when he, Rose, had ceased to be in possession of the premises?] I do. The Legislature did not intend that these houses, licensed on the 1st May 1869, should be disfranchised by the wrongful act of an individual. The certificate was refused to Rose because he failed to produce evidence of good character, but that was no ground for refusing to grant a certificate to the appellant.

MELLOR, J.—I think that Mr. McMahon has succeeded in showing that the appellant was a new tenant of the house within the meaning of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 14. Time did not admit of the appellant giving the necessary notices in order to apply at the general annual licensing meeting, and I do not think he was bound to apply at the adjourned meeting, but I am of opinion that as he succeeded a person who had yielded up possession of the house to him, and he had therefore become a new tenant, he was entitled to make his application to the special sessions for a certificate, after giving the proper notices of his intention so to do. I cannot think it necessary that there should be a space of time during which the house is actually vacant, but that the statute is equally applicable to such a case as the present, where possession of the premises has been yielded up to a new occupier with the landlord's assent, and the incomer occupies the house, and carries on the business at the time he applies for the certificate. Moreover, it is to be observed that the certificate for a licence which he obtains at the special sessions, is merely available until the next general meeting. There was no objection to the character of the appellant, and under the circumstances, therefore, he was entitled to a certificate. Nor is that inconsistent with the general legislation on the subject referred to in argument, for the requirements of sect. 19 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869 are fulfilled. Where a house is an old one, and has been previously licensed, it is therefore of such a character as to be suitable for the sale of beer by retail therein. There is neither inconsistency nor is there any hardship in enacting that in such case the objections to be made at licensing sessions shall be confined to the personal character of the applicant. I think, therefore, that the appellant was entitled to a certificate for a licence.

HANNEN, J.—To my mind, the chief difficulty in this case was the fact that Rose made an application to the general licensing meeting. Now at first I did not fully appreciate the effect of that circumstance, but I come to the conclusion that it did not affect Parsons at all, who was not shown to have been a party to it. The application might have been made by Rose for his own purposes, and on his own account. Putting that matter out of the question, the case stands thus: Rose being licensed, removed from and yielded up possession of his house to Parsons under an arrangement which he (Rose) had made with the landlord. Parsons therefore became the new tenant and occupier, to whom the privilege is given by sect. 14 of applying to special sessions in order to obtain a licence. Mr. Poland has said that he was affected by what was done at the general meeting, but I do not think that he was so affected. Could he have applied at the general meeting? It is admitted that he could not. It is said that he might apply at the adjourned meeting; but I do not think that he was bound to do so, and it made very little difference, for the matter would be brought before the justices at some time in any case. I think, therefore, there was nothing to prevent him availing himself of the provisional facilities given by the 14th section, and that therefore this rule should be made absolute.

Rule absolute.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Reported by THOMAS BROOKSBANK and E. STEWART ROCHE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Feb. 15, 22, and March 8, 1871.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Hatherley), and the LORDS JUSTICES.)

THE MERCHANT TAYLORS' COMPANY v. THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

Charitable devise—Whether on trust or condition—Surplus income—Application—Resulting trust—Cy près—Where reparation to be executed.

A testator in 1570 devised certain lands, tenements, and gardens in the city of London to the plaintiffs' company, "to this intent, and upon this condition," that they should yearly, "of and with the rents and profits of the said lands, tenements, and gardens," provide and give to twelve poor men and twelve poor women of the parish of St. Botolph, Without Bishopsgate, certain articles of clothing mentioned in the will, the materials of which were to be of the respective cost or value therein stated; and to the intent that such garments might be the better seen, performed, and delivered, according to his mind and the condition in that behalf appointed for ever, he required and prayed the Chamberlain and Town Clerk of the city of London yearly to call upon and put in mind the plaintiffs' company, and look that the said garments should be justly and truly bestowed. And he gave to the Chamberlain and Town Clerk for their labour and pains to be taken in that behalf 10*s. apiece yearly for ever, to be received at the hands of the company out of the same issues, rents, and profits, "and so that the whole residue of the said rents and profits they should maintain and gather yearly into an whole stock, and therewith keep the reparations of the tenements to them devised, and, if need were, new build the same, as to their discretion need should appear as the same stock would fall out." And in case the company should be remiss in performing and delivering the garments acording to the meaning in his testament declared, then he willed that the parson, churchwardens, and parishioners of St. Michael's, Cornhill, should enter upon the devised hereditaments, and the same should hold to the like intent and upon the like condition.*

The cost of the materials was 13*l.* 8*s., and at the death of the testator the yearly value of the property was* 26*l. only. But this value increased very largely, and for many years the company retained the surplus after making the payments directed and maintaining the houses in repair:*

Held (affirming the decision of the Master of the Rolls), that the company were not entitled to such surplus, but that the whole rents were devoted to charitable purposes, and must be applied cy près.

The Attorney-General v. The Mayor of Bristol (2 J. & W. 219), and The Attorney-General v. The Wax Chandlers' Company (L. Rep. 5 Ch. App. 503, and 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 173), considered.

The dictum of Turner, L.J., in The Attorney-General v. The Corporation of Beverley (6 De G. M. & G., at 265), that "if a portion of rents, &c., not given to a charity be wholly dedicated to the exoneration of the portion of rents which is so given from burthens which would otherwise fall upon it," the charity is entitled to the benefit of the whole, questioned and dissented from.

Per James, L.J.: In cases of gifts to a city company upon express trusts exhausting the whole income, there is no rule of law that, if one of such trusts is for the repair and rebuilding of the property devised, any surplus that may not be required for the purposes expressed is given to the company for its own use and benefit.

THIS was an appeal of the plaintiffs' company from a decision of the Master of the Rolls, which is reported in 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 480, where the will of the testator, devising lands for charitable purposes, and all other circumstances are sufficiently stated. The bill was filed for the purpose of establishing an absolute right claimed by the plaintiffs to all surplus of the rents and profits, after satisfying the purposes expressly mentioned in the will; and to this bill the Attorney-General put in a demurrer, which was allowed by Lord Romilly.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q.C., Sir Richard Baggallay, Q.C., and Cookson supported the appeal.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q.C. having been heard in reply, judgment was reserved until the 8th March, when

The LORD CHANCELLOR said:—This case is an appeal from a judgment of the Master of the Rolls, which has in effect declared that the property which was given by the will of one Robert Donkyn to the Merchant Taylors' Company in the year 1570 is wholly applicable to charitable purposes; and the decree thus appealed from is questioned on the ground that, according to the authority of The Attorney-General v. The Wax Chandlers' Company, and the class of cases which that authority professed, at all events, to follow, the property here is given to the Merchant Taylors' Company, subject indeed to a charge on behalf of the objects which are mentioned in the bequest, but subject to that charge only, and that the remainder is given to the company absolutely for their own use.

I confess that the case has appeared to me to be one of very considerable difficulty. I believe that it does not so appear to the Lords Justices; but I feel that, regard being had to the previous authorities, and especially to the very important dicta of Lord Eldon in The Attorney-General v. The Mayor of Bristol, sanctioned and expanded as these dicta have been by Lord St. Leonards in the case of the Southmolton Charity, it has become a matter of considerable difficulty to know where the precise line is to be drawn with reference to bequests of the character of that which we now have before us, made at the epoch at which this bequest was made. The real point to be ascertained is easy enough to be defined, but the application of any definition which may be given to the particular case before the court is always the great point of difficulty.

Now I apprehend that the rule is a very simple and plain one, applicable alike to charitable and other bequests, and that there is a distinction between a charge and a trust; that if you are satisfied that by the instrument, whatever it be, whether a deed or a will, an out-and-out gift is made to the persons who are the immediate objects of the gift, subject only to a charge for certain specified objects who are to be entitled to receive the amount of that charge, and to have a valid remedy against the land for the purpose of enforcing that charge, then the devise stands good, and the charge only has to be carried into effect. On the other hand, if you find that the will implies trust, and that trust, and trust only, is the object of the testator, then, whether there be a positive gift to the particular objects who are mentioned in the will as having to receive a benefit out of the property so devised, or whether there be simply a direction generally as to trusts, and trusts are declared which do not exhaust the whole estate, still the trust remains; and there is then one of these two things—either a resulting trust to the devisor or grantor, who has not expressed the whole of his views upon the subject, but has expressed sufficiently his will that those who take are not to take beneficially; or, if there be not a resulting trust, then the question arises under the general rule whether the charities are not entitled to have the augmented fund, or the fund not specifically disposed of, for the purpose of promoting the general objects of the charity, whose benefit is supposed to form in that case the testator's paramount intention.

Now, with regard to cases which are not cases of charity, King v. Denison (1 V. & B. 260) and Dawson v. Clarke (18 Ves. 247) are well-known instances. It has been found that there are cases of extreme difficulty bordering on the line, as of course in cases of charity there are cases of like difficulty. In Dawson v. Clarke the case was very remarkable, because the property was chargeable on a trust, and it was held ultimately to be a case not on trust. In King v. Denison I think the reverse took place, and the trust was declared to have effect.

With regard to charities a rule has been established; it was laid down by Lord Eldon in The Attorney-General v. The Mayor of Bristol, and somewhat expanded by Lord St. Leonards in the Southmolton case. Lord Eldon, after saying that he had made himself as well acquainted as he could with cases of this description—which means, no doubt, that he had read everything upon the subject with which he was not previously acquainted—refers to the Thetford School case, and, after referring to the reasons given for that decision, he says: "And then the following passage occurs, and with reference to many public bodies it is one of great consequence: 'And the Lord Coke said that this resolution did concern all the colleges in the Universities and elsewhere; for when the lands were first given for their maintenance, and that every scholar should have a penny halfpenny a day, this was then a competent allowance for a scholar in respect of the price of victuals then and yearly value of the land; and now the price of victuals being increased, the first maintenance for scholars is not competent for them, and as the value of the lands increase, so ought the allowance for the scholars to increase.'" Upon which passage Lord Eldon's comment is: "If the text is to be understood thus, that where property has been given for the foundation of a college, and a distribution has been at the same time made of all the rents to given members of that college, there must be an increase, as the times require, for all these purposes; of that there can be no doubt. But, unless I am mistaken, there are many cases to be found in both the Universities where land has been given of a greater value than the amount of the charges (which have been for scholars, exhibitioners, and so on) upon that land, and where, in point of fact, the enjoyment has been thus—the charges have been made good from time to time, and the surplus has been taken by the college itself; and I believe, if this were considered an improper application of the funds, it would have the effect of disturbing the distribution of the revenues of many of the colleges in both Universities."

Lord St. Leonards bears out that doctrine in the Southmolton case, and adds his judgment that where there is de facto a surplus, and nothing whatever has been said about residue or surplus or anything of that kind, where the gift is to a corporate body (as he there expresses it), that corporate body takes the gift, and takes it subject only to the charges to be paid out of that gift; and that when these charges have so been satisfied, then, though nothing is said about what remains, it remains simply for the benefit of the corporate body, or, in other words, is not a resulting trust for the donor.

Now in the Wax Chandlers' case there were certainly features of material difference in two or three respects from the case which we have here before us. In the first place there was what I think may be called an absolute charge upon the property irrespective of the payment of rents, which itself would go far towards the conferring of the fee-simple. There was further in that case, in the event of a breach of duty on the part of the first takers, a gift over to a person individually there named, who evidently was intended, subject to the charge, to take for his own benefit; and therefore there was an inference more readily afforded that the interest, subject to the charge, was a beneficial interest in the first takers from whom it was to go over; and, further than that, in addition to a direction that the particular sums there mentioned should be paid out of the rents, there was a direction to pay the residue of the rents (simpliciter in these words, I think) towards repairs, it being perfectly clear in that case that the testator could have no conception whatever of what the residue of the rents would be, because we find the rents a hundred years afterwards rising. The circumstances in that case pointed to its being a charge instead of a trust imposed upon the parties taking. What I then held, and what I still hold, is, that where there is simpliciter a direction to apply the rest of the fund in repairs, the case is entirely distinguishable. In substance it is to say, "I give so much to these objects, and no more; I give the property out and out to you; out of the rents you will pay these objects, and the residue of the rents you will employ in repairs;" and it is as if the testator had said, "The residue of the rents will suffice for repairs," or, "You will have the residue in hand for repairs." I apprehend that there is no substantial distinction, and that what was meant was that the company should take the property, and that it should not be allowed to go out of repair, because if it were allowed to out of repair the persons who were to have the benefit which was specified would thereby lose that benefit, but that, subject to what was necessary for repair, the company would take the property. It seemed, in fact, ludicrous to suppose that the testator intended to impose the necessity of repairing the houses, and laying out for those repairs all the surplus, even though that surplus should be ten or twenty times what was wanted for the particular purpose. The question we have always to ask ourselves is—Did the testator give it to the particular objects of the charity?

Now, it was said there was no difference between the repairs directed to be made out of the rents with reference to an almshouse, in which people were to live, and the repairs directed to be made of houses, subject to a charge of the kind which we have here. It seems to me that there is the widest difference. The almshouse itself is given to the inmates, the payments are to be made to them, the property is to be occupied by them; it is to be for them, and the whole property is given to them. Whereas it seemed to me in the Wax Chandlers' case, as I said upon that occasion, that it was begging the question to say that the whole property was given to the charity, when but a definite sum was given to the charity, and all that was said about the rest was that the residue would go to repairs. I was, I think, pressed then, as we have been pressed upon the present occasion, with a dictum of Turner, L. J., in The Attorney-General v. The Corporation of Beverley, in which he said that he believed, although he knew of no authority to that effect, that if a property were devoted to the payment of burthens which a charity would otherwise have to bear, that property was given to the charity. I cannot thoroughly agree with him that such a property would be given to the charity. As far as it is given, of course it is so; but if it be meant to say that the whole property is given to the charity because it is to be applied in satisfaction of a charge, I humbly venture to differ from him, and to say that it is varying the whole distinction which has heretofore been made between charity and trust; and if it be only a charge upon a certain amount of lands to pay off certain other charges upon the charity, I apprehend that, where these other charges have been paid, that gift, whatever it is, would be a resulting trust.

Having said so much, I think that I have quite explained the reason for my very great doubt and hesitation in this particular case. I think that it is one of very great nicety, but upon the whole I am not inclined, nor am I strongly enough pressed by the contrary construction—regard being had not only to the decision of the Master of the Rolls, but to the views of both my learned colleagues—to say that that decision is erroneous. The differences between the present case and the Wax Chandlers' case are not to my mind so clear and satisfactory, as, having to decide the case upon a difficult will, I should wish them to be. We must do the best we can upon the testator's expressions, and the matter would not have come here if they had been easy to construe.

In this particular case the property is described by the testator as being within a certain district of London, St. Botolph's, "rented yearly at 26*l.* or thereabouts." Then out of that he gives a certain property which we need not pursue, a property of 4*l.* a year to "the parson and churchwardens of the parish church of St. Michael, in Cornhill, in London, for the time being, and to their successors, parsons and churchwardens of the said parish church, for ever, to this intent, that they shall with the profits thereof give every week" a certain quantity of bread. By the custom of London he, in fact, gave the property to these persons as a corporation; they were a corporation by the custom of London, and they were a corporation for the general purposes of the parish, subject to this particular charge which he had here imposed upon them; and there can be no doubt, regard being had to the nature of that body, that the whole would go in charity, though I apprehend that even then it would be difficult, if it stood there alone, to say that the quantity of bread would have to be augmented because, the value of his property being 26*l.* or thereabouts, it is found that at the date of his will there would be a surplus of somewhat between 4*l.* and 5*l.*, and not more. I do not think that that has very much to do with the case, but such is the fact if it be of importance. It is not as if the testator distinctly described the value of the property; he says "26*l.* or thereabouts," and there is nothing to indicate, as in the cases of apportionment, that he intends a direct and definite sum to be apportioned.

But then, the testator having done this, the part of the will which to my mind creates the principal difficulty and distinction between this case and the Wax Chandlers' case is the following. I should, however, first observe that in the devise of the house to St. Michael's he gives a very curious direction to the parson and churchwardens and their successors. The words which he then uses, are: "And the whole rest of the rent I will shall be reserved to the maintenance of the said house." But no direction is given there with reference to the rebuilding, and there is no gift over, as there is in the devise which we have immediately to construe.

[His Lordship then read the devise to the plaintiffs' company, and the gift over to St. Michael's, the whole of which will be found in the earlier report, and continued:] That is to say, they are to expend the money upon the gifts to the poor people, 20*s.* a year to the Chamberlain and Town Clerk for their trouble in jogging their memory, and "upon the reparations of the same tenements and gardens."

Now the two things here which certainly make a difference are these:—It is not merely said in an off-hand way, as in the Wax Chandlers' case, "The residue of the rents shall go towards repairs," but here undoubtedly is a very definite trust (which the Attorney-General could at any time have enforced) to accumulate the property; anything over and above what is wanted for the immediate repairs is not to be spent, but it is to form a fund for the purposes of repairs, and of rebuilding these premises "as to their discretion need shall appear," for the purpose of this trust which has been here created. And further than that, if the Merchant Taylors' Company do not do what is here required, there is a gift over, not, as in the former case, to a person who was to take beneficially, subject to the performance of the particular trust, but to persons who are only to take for a distinct and separate and charitable purpose. I quite allow the force of Sir Roundell Palmer's argument upon that part of the case in which he said that the fact of the property being given over to another corporation does not show that there was any intention to give any more to the people (who were to have the gowns and the cassocks and the shirts), or to augment their number; but at the same time the whole question upon the will is this, Did the testator intend a resulting trust? That, I think, he clearly did not. Did he intend an out-and-out gift to the persons who were to take, subject only to a charge? That is the main question to be decided, and I confess that I have arrived at a conclusion with considerable hesitation—a hesitation somewhat, in truth, augmented by the direction to the Chamberlain and the Town Clerk of the city of London, who are never directed to jog the company's memory to give more gowns and other articles than a certain amount to particular individuals, but simply to give these articles, and as to whom nothing at all is said about reparations. I say that all these matters create considerable doubt in my mind as to what the intent and purpose was; but at the same time, looking to the right which the Attorney-General would have had to have kept this fund accumulated, and to have said, "You shall not touch one farthing of the rents and profits; I do not know what may happen" (the system of fire insurance did not then exist); "a fire may happen any day; this fund must be appropriated for keeping up these houses, in order that the gift to the twelve poor men and twelve poor women may not fail;" and looking to the gift over in case the poor men and poor women were not provided for, I come with considerable hesitation to the conclusion that there is enough upon this will, though it is a very difficult one to construe, to show that the testator did not intend a benefit to the company; and if he did not intend a benefit to the company, I certainly think that there is no question that he did not intend a resulting trust, and therefore the only alternative is that all the property should be given to charity.

Lord Justice JAMES said.—I am also of opinion that the decision of the Master of the Rolls ought to be affirmed.

It is possible that, during the many years in which I acted as counsel for the Attorney-General in charity cases, and had to advise on such documents as the one before us and to consider the authorities bearing on their construction, I may unconsciously have acquired a bias in favour of the claims of charity. But, making every allowance for that possible bias, I feel that I should have been exceedingly startled if the decision of his Lordship had been other than it is.

To my mind, the only thing which we have to deal with is the meaning of the testator's words in this particular instrument; and it is to me clear that the plain, natural, ordinary, grammatical construction of these words is so free from all ambiguity and doubt as not to require, and not to admit of, any assistance or control from the authority of cases decided on the construction of any other will or instrument.

As a general rule of law, it is clear that where there is a gift to trustees of property merely as trustees, they cannot take any benefit from the fact that the expressed trusts do not, whether originally or from any subsequent event, exhaust the whole estate. In ordinary trusts the result is that there is an implied trust for the donor's representatives; in short, in cases of gifts for charitable purposes, there is an implied trust for charity. But there is a class of cases, not confined or peculiar, as it seems to me, to gifts to colleges, municipal corporations, or city guilds, in which it is a fairly moot question whether in a gift of property to trustees they take merely as trustees solely for the purposes of the trust, or whether they take the property subject only to the due execution of the specified trusts. And in considering that question, where it fairly arises, all the surrounding circumstances, the character and position of the donor and donee, the more or less probability of one intention or another, and the current of authorities in similar or nearly similar cases, are matters which the court of construction not only may, but must, look to for aid and guidance.

But where the testator or donor has in express words devoted the whole of the property, or the whole of the rents and profits, to purposes which exclude all beneficial interest in the donee, and those words are not controlled or interpreted by plain implication arising from other parts of the same instrument, there is, in my judgment, no legitimate power in any court of construction to resort to surrounding circumstances, or the character or position of the parties, or the probability of intention, or the current of authority, or to do anything but give effect to the very words. This is, in my opinion, the case with the present will. The gift is of a large number of small houses in the City, upon trust out of the rents and profits to make certain specified gifts to certain charitable objects, and proceeding thus, "and so that the whole residue" shall be gathered into one fund, and so on. I need not repeat the words. It seems to me that, if ever there was a plain gift to trustees solely for the purpose of the trust, and in terms excluding any beneficial interest in the trustees, this is such a gift.

It was contended, but I am afraid I was unable rightly to apprehend the argument, that, independently of those words, omitting those words, there would have been a gift to the company, subject only to the performance of the charitable obligations; and that, starting with that, those words are idle and superfluous, as they merely direct an owner in fee simple of house property to provide a fund for the proper reparation and maintenance of his own estate. You may do anything with any instrument in that way—omit certain words, then arrive at the conclusion, and then deal with the omitted words, being bound by the conclusion which you have arrived at by their omission. But can it be with any reason contended that the testator's intention was by these words to give such idle and superfluous direction? Did he, or did he not, so far as intention goes, intend an obligation which it was incumbent on his devisees to perform, to accumulate the surplus, the whole surplus? I cannot doubt that he did so intend; and if there was an obligation intended by the testator and expressed by him as extending to the whole surplus, then the obligation and the trust extended at the first, and from the first, to the whole rents and profits of the property, so as to exclude any beneficial interest in the devisees. And for whose benefit was that obligation as to the surplus intended? Plainly, as it seems to me, for the benefit of the charity. The property being house property, cottage property in fact, bringing in a rental of about 30*s.*, a house and garden, or the equivalent of fifteen pairs of poor men's shoes, it is reasonably certain that the property would require considerable repairs, and was liable to the then not uncommon peril of fire at a time when insurance against fire was unknown; and the direction to accumulate the whole surplus into a stock for the purposes of reparation and rebuilding, as occasion should require, was obviously a provision to secure against all contingencies to the charitable objects the bounty intended for them, and was, therefore, a devotion of the whole surplus for the benefit of those charitable objects. It was simply what in commercial companies is known as a depreciation and reserve fund. I cannot myself doubt that if, upon or after a testator's death, in any similar gift at this day the devisee were to spend the surplus instead of accumulating it, the Attorney-General would obtain from this court on behalf of the charity a proper decree for the execution of the trust, whether the devisee were an individual, a municipal corporation, or a city company.

It was said, indeed, that it could never have been intended by the testator that any surplus, however large, was to be expended in unnecessarily expensive repairs or reconstruction. The answer to that is, that the testator never supposed that there would be any large surplus. To him house property producing 26*l.* a year represented 26*l.* a year. He no more dreamt, on the one hand, of the change in the value of money and the value of houses and land in London, than he dreamt of the whole property being swallowed up by an earthquake, or the corporation itself destroyed by some revolutionary measure. Historically we know that from the time of Edward III. to the time of Elizabeth the value of money had been stationary, and there is no reason to suppose that there had been any change in the value of house property in the metropolis. The testator was making a moderate and reasonable provision for the security of his charities, by devoting the surplus, and the whole surplus, to a reserve fund. The fact that the surplus, centuries after his death, has grown to its present amount, no more entitles the company to it, than, in the converse case of there being a clear gift to the company of a surplus supposed by him to be small, it would have deprived them of any portion of such surplus. It is the very case to which the doctrine of cy pres applies.

In the view which I therefore take of this case, it is not necessary that I should refer in detail to the authorities which have been cited. I think that I may, however, properly refer to two, viz., the Bristol case and the Wax Chandlers' case, both of which cases I take to be authorities in favour of the decision of the Master of the Rolls. In the Bristol case the Master of the Rolls came to the conclusion that he might imply the words found in this will, and proceeded to decide accordingly in favour of the charity; and it is reasonably probable, I think, that, if there had been such express words, Lord Eldon's subsequent elaborate examination of every clause and word in the instrument, would not have induced him to depart from the decision of the Master of the Rolls. In that case there were introductory words, "and for no other end, intent, or purpose," which, it was contended, threw such a difficulty in the way of the construction ultimately arrived at as to show what length this court has gone in favour of corporation devisees. Now the danger forcibly pointed out by Mr. Jessel, of making the decision on one instrument into a canon of construction for the interpretation of another, is strikingly illustrated by those words and the argument deduced from them; for to me those words are about the strongest thing in the whole document in favour of the Bristol corporation. The donor said: I give you the property; there are certain trusts which you are to perform, and I have no other trust, intent, or purpose whatever in view. There is to be no implied trust, no resulting trust; and if you do the things which I have told you to do, and nothing more, you will fulfil every obligation which I mean to impose on you. As to the Wax Chandlers' case, it is enough to say that the learned judge who first decided that case also decided the case under appeal, and he has told us that he decided it on the very special context and very special circumstances in that case; that his ratio decidendi was in fact on the things which constitute the differences between that will and the present, and I do not think that there was any substantial distinction between the two judgments in that case. The court was enabled or compelled, by the context and the surrounding circumstances, to put what I humbly conceive to be a somewhat strained and non-natural meaning on the residuary clause in that will. If, in the total absence of any such context or of any surrounding circumstances, the court were to extend that construction to the will under consideration, it would be in my judgment to lay down, not a canon of construction, but a positive rule of law, that in cases of gifts to city companies upon expressed trusts exhausting the whole income, if one of such expressed trusts is of the surplus for the reparation and rebuilding of the property, such trust shall, in all cases be read as if it were a gift of the surplus to such companies for their own use and benefit. In my judgment it is beyond the province of a court of construction to lay down any such rule of law.

Lord Justice MELLISH said:—This case appears to me entirely to depend upon the question whether, according to the true construction of the will of Robert Donkyn, his lands, tenements, and gardens in the parish of St. Botolph are devised to the Merchant Taylors' Company beneficially, subject to the charge of having to fulfil certain charitable objects, and repairing and from time to time rebuilding the premises, in which case the surplus profits would belong entirely to them; or whether the premises are devised upon trust to apply the whole of the existing net profits of the lands to charitable purposes, in which case, according to the well-known rule established by the Thetford School case, the whole of the surplus rents will belong to the charity.

Now, I am of opinion, after considering the whole of the testator's will, that he intended to devote all the property devised by it to charitable purposes. The property principally consisted of houses, and it was obvious that a portion of the rents must be reserved for repairs and rebuilding, and the testator seems to me to have calculated how much of the rents he could safely devote to charitable purposes, so as to have a sufficient residue for repairs and rebuilding. The language of each of the devises seems to me directly to negative any intention on the part of the testator to leave any residue for the benefit of his trustees. In the first devise of a house to the parson and churchwardens of the parish of St. Michael, in Cornhill, the words are, "and the whole rest of the rent I will shall be reserved to the maintenance of the said house." In the devise in question the words are, "and so that the whole residue of the said rents and profits of the said lands, tenements, and gardens, they do maintain and gather yearly into an whole stock, and therewith do and keep the reparations of the said tenements to them devised, and, if need be, new build the same as to their discretion need shall appear, as the same stock will fall out." And in the gift over of the same property to the parson, churchwardens, and parishioners of St. Michael, Cornhill, the gift is expressed to be made "to this intent and upon condition that they, the said churchwardens, shall bestow the yearly rents and profits" (which must mean the whole of the rents and profits) "of the said lands, tenements, and gardens, in and upon" the charitable purposes specified, "and the reparations of the same tenements and gardens."

The real question seems to be, did the testator really mean what he has said, that the whole residue of the rents should be gathered into a common fund and applied to the repairing and rebuilding of the premises devised, and that, therefore, no part of it should go to the Merchant Taylor's Company? or is that construction so absurd that the testator could not have meant that the whole residue should go into a repairing and rebuilding fund, and be applied to repairs and rebuilding, but that he must have meant what he has certainly not said, that so much only of the residue as was wanted for repairs and rebuilding should be applied for that purpose, and that the rest should belong to the Merchant Taylors' Company.

I cannot see that any such absurdity is involved in giving its natural construction to the language of the testator as to justify the court departing from it. There is nothing to prove that at the time when the will was made the surplus rents, after providing for the charitable objects, formed more than a sufficient fund for the repairs and rebuilding; and the Thetford School case, and numerous other cases, prove that founders of charities about the time when this will was made acted upon the assumption that rents would remain at the same amount at which they were in their time; indeed, the present testator seems to have thought that a penny would always buy a loaf of the same size as it did in his time; that Welsh frieze would always be of the price of 1*s.* 6*d.* the yard, and poor men's shoes at twelvepence the pair. Perhaps indeed the testator thought it enough to provide a scheme for carrying out his charitable objects as long as prices and rents remained the same, and supposed that, if prices and rents altered, his trustees would have power to alter the details of his scheme, so as to carry out his general object. But, however this may be, I am of opinion that, according to the true construction of the will, no benefit was given to, and no burthen imposed upon, the Merchant Taylors' Company by the devise in question, and that, therefore, the judgment of the Master of the Rolls ought to be affirmed.

CROOK v. CORPORATION OF SEAFORD.

Corporation—Agreement not under seal—Standing by—Acquiescence—Specific performance.

The Corporation of Seaford passed a resolution in Jan. 1860, agreeing to let land to C. for 300 years, to be stumped out by a committee and himself at his expense. The corporation did not stump out the land, and C. afterwards stumped out the land himself, took possession of it, erected a terrace on the land, and paid rent to the corporation:

Held (affirming the decision of Stuart, V.C.), that C. was entitled to a decree for specific performance, the corporation having acquiesced in all that he had done.

Held further, that the right of the corporation to grant such a lease could not be disputed in this suit.

The boundary of the land was, however, ascertainable from the agreement, and was not what the plaintiff had contended for. In that respect the decree must be varied.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants from a decree of Stuart, V.C., under the following circumstances:—The corporation of Seaford was created by charter in the reign of King Henry VIII. by the title of "The bailiff and commonalty of the town, parish, and borough of Seaford," and it was not included within the provisions of the Municipal Corporations Act 1835. The defendants, the corporation, were the owners of lands situate at Seaford, now vested in the other defendants as feoffees in trust for the corporation. The plaintiff was also the owner in fee of lands in Seaford. Dr. Tyler Smith was also the owner of lands in the borough of Seaford. The plaintiff and Dr. Tyler Smith were desirous for the improvement of their properties, and they handed to the corporation for their consideration a plan of an intended terrace to be made by them, and suggested that the corporation should demise the lands, at that time waste, for a term of 300 years, at a nominal rent. On the 5th Jan. 1860 a general court of assembly of the corporation was holden, and the following are the minutes extracted from the books of the corporation:—

Proposed lease to Mr. Thomas Crook. A resolution was then proposed: "That this corporation will agree to let on the following terms, viz. 1. The frontage of West Gun Field, in Seaford (the plaintiff's land) with the flat part of the beach opposite (to be stumped out at the expense of Mr. Crook), but the coach or main highroad between to be preserved at its present width at the least; also part of the West Lane at the back of the said field, to be stumped out at the expense of Mr. Crook. 2. Mr. Crook to make and build a neat concrete terrace in front of his field (as shown in his plan), at his own expense, the said terrace to be completed by ——, and to be left open as a public walk for the use of foot passengers at all times. 3. The corporation to grant a lease for 300 years to Mr. Crook at 10*s.* per annum; Mr. Crook to pay the whole expense and all legal charges and costs whatever for the said lease and plan for the same, and also for the counterpart for the corporation, and every expense attending the execution thereof. 4. The town clerk to prepare the lease on application of Mr. Crook. 5. The hiring to commence from the 14th Feb. 1860. 6. No building (except the said public terrace), to be erected on the land or flat of the beach. These terms are offered without prejudice, and upon condition that the consent of the feoffees in trust can be obtained; but if the feoffees in trust or any of them, shall refuse to concur in this arrangement, any expense occasioned by such refusal shall be wholly borne by the proposed lessee. That the following persons (who were named) be appointed a committee to arrange the stumping with Mr. Crook, and to settle any minor details."

A copy of these minutes was sent to the plaintiff, and he accepted the terms offered. The plaintiff stumped out the pieces of corporation land, and after the same were so stumped out he entered into possession of them; and, from the 14th Feb. 1860, to 1865, in pursuance of the agreement, duly paid the rent of 10*s.* per annum to the corporation, and received receipts in respect thereof.

Upon the faith of the above agreement, the plaintiff erected a sea wall about 700ft. long, and in Feb. 1861 completed a concrete terrace in accordance with the plan submitted to the corporation and referred to in the minutes. The terrace had been left open as a public walk, as stipulated for by the minutes, and the public had enjoyed the same. During the progress of the works the bailiff and other members of the corporation visited the same in the presence of the plaintiff, who then and there pointed out and explained to them the nature of the works; and the plaintiff was allowed by the corporation to complete the works without any objection on their part. On the 30th July 1864 the plaintiff received from the bailiff, on behalf of the corporation, a notice to quit and deliver up to him the possession of the frontage land which he held as tenant to the corporation. On the 7th Sept. 1864 the solicitors of the plaintiff requested the town clerk to send a draft of the proposed lease for perusal. On the 31st Jan. 1865 the town clerk, in a letter, stated to the solicitors of the plaintiff that he had not adhered to the terms upon which it was originally proposed that the corporation should grant a lease; that the corporation had resolved that he was not entitled to such a lease, and that they would not consent to his having one. The town clerk also stated that he was authorised to say that the corporation was open to a negotiation with Mr. Crook with a view to allowing him to retain the land in question upon such terms as might be considered fair and equitable. Considerable correspondence passed between the solicitors of the parties, repeated applications for a lease in accordance with the terms of the minutes being refused. On the 25th Oct. 1869, the corporation issued a summons in ejectment from the Sussex County Court, returnable on the 7th Dec. following.

On the 10th Nov. 1869 this bill was filed, praying that the several provisions contained in the minutes of the 5th Jan. 1860 might be ordered to be specifically performed by the corporation, and that the corporation and all other necessary parties might be ordered to execute to the plaintiff a proper lease in accordance with the minutes; and for an injunction to restrain the proceedings in ejectment; and that if for any reason the specific performance should be refused, the defendants, the corporation, might be decreed to pay to the plaintiff such damages, to be assessed in such manner as the court should direct, and for costs.

On the part of the defendants the evidence was to the effect that at the meeting of the committee to stump out the land the plaintiff insisted that he was entitled to take the whole of the land of which he stated he had now taken possession; that that was objected to as not being included in the agreement; that the committee did not, in consequence of such objection, stump out the land, and that the plaintiff had encroached on the corporation land. In the court below the Vice-Chancellor said: The argument on the part of the defendants that the minutes which constitute the agreement were not under the seal of the corporation, and are therefore not binding, seems to me to be wholly untenable. This case depends upon the acts and conduct of the parties. It has been contended that the agreement is in its terms not sufficiently certain to justify the court in decreeing specific performance. But when coupled with the plan which was exhibited when the agreement was come to, it seems to me that the agreement is sufficiently certain. It has also been contended that it was of the essence of the agreement that the land should be stumped out by the defendants. The process of stumping out was to be performed by the defendants, at the expense of the plaintiff; and if, after the question arose between the committee which was appointed to arrange the stumping out, and the plaintiff, who was dissatisfied with the proceedings, the defendants had taken proceedings against the plaintiff in reference to his stumping out the land himself, a very different case might have been made. But all these things were done and completed in 1860, for it is admitted that the plaintiff took possession of the land, and arranged the stumping out in his own way, the defendants knowing what was done, and the terrace was completed in February 1861. During all the time that the plaintiff was going on with his works the defendants took no proceedings, but, on the contrary, they acquiesced in what the plaintiff was doing, and in part for the benefit of the public. The plaintiff, by the course which he took, made the agreement perfectly certain, and I cannot, in 1870, in reference to what the plaintiff did in 1860 with the knowledge of the defendants, say that they shall be at liberty to eject him, and that he is to forfeit all the money which he has expended upon the land and terrace. The argument in reference to the length of time before the plaintiff came to this court seems to me to establish his case, and in my opinion he is entitled to a decree for specific performance. As to the question whether the corporation can grant a lease for so long a period, that, in my opinion, cannot be raised in this suit.

On the appeal,

Greene, Q.C. and Waller, for the defendants, contended that no corporation could be bound but by a contract under its seal, and therefore in this case the corporation was not bound by these minutes. There never was a completed contract which that court could order to be performed, and therefore the suit was misconceived, being founded upon an imperfect and uncertain contract. Further, Seaford was a borough within the provisions of the statute 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76; and by sect. 93 the corporation was prevented from demising land for a longer period than twenty-one years. It was submitted that, having regard to the fact that the plaintiff had included within his stumping out, land which was intended for the public use; andalso to the lapse of time since the minutes were entered in the corporation books, and no proceedings taken on the part of the plaintiff, the bill ought to be dismissed with costs. They referred to Dickinson, Q.C. and Pontifex for the plaintiff.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Hatherley).—I confess when this case was first opened I felt great difficulty in the form of the decree, which, I agree with Mr. Waller, is one I do not remember before to have seen. The form of the decree is this: it is a decree for specific performance, and either of the parties are to be at liberty to apply to the judge at chambers for any further directions as to the performance of the agreement. I apprehend that it is clearly the duty of the court to ascertain whether there is or is not an agreement and not make it afterwards at chambers; and that if there is not an agreement made, the only alternative is to dismiss the bill. [His Lordship considered the terms of the agreement, and held that it referred to all land between the frontage of the plaintiff and the beach proper, within two lines drawn vertically down towards the sea. After referring to the works done by the plaintiff his Lordship proceeded:] I have no hesitation in saying that if a bill had been then filed by this plaintiff, the bill would have been dismissed, and most properly dismissed unless he chose to adopt the construction given by the corporation. I am quite clear he was wrong in the view he took, and that he could not have sustained a bill for specific performance. But unfortunately, matters do not rest here, for he is allowed to build this wall, and it is in evidence that it cost him 700*l*. This occurred in 1860, and he is allowed to remain in possession of that he has improperly taken. No doubt it did nobody any harm at the time, unless it interfered with Dr. Tyler Smith in making arrangements of his own. It interfered with nothing. He could not build anything on it but the wall, and so far as the corporation of Seaford was concerned, the greater length of the wall did them good rather than harm. They took no notice of it and he paid his rent until 1863 without the slightest disturbance or question being raised about his being right or wrong. In 1863 Dr. Smith makes a certain proposal of his own to the corporation, which they are disposed to listen to, and then they begin to think they will question the propriety of this gentleman's line of conduct, and will decline to grant him any lease; and some intimation to that effect is made in the same year, but in 1864 they again receive his rent, and so on, until May 1865. Then they take up a new point of view, and it is the point on which it is difficult to decide what is right and just to be done, principally with reference to the cost of the litigation. They say: "You have not confirmed your agreement in any respect; you have not only taken too much ground, but you have built a wall which is of no use to the inhabitants, and we will not grant you any lease at all." That is said in 1865. There he remains, and no steps are taken to remove him. They behaved very civilly to him, as, of course, it was quite right to do; but certainly he had no reason to suppose that they were going to take the extreme measures which they ultimately took. He does not answer letter until 1866, and that is in part ated for by saying that he was ill, and the ration, kindly enough, did not take any steps id not wish to trouble him while he was in a of bad health. There is a very reasonable sition on the part of the corporation which I they had adhered to all through, namely, of ıg all disputed matters between the parties bitration. The plaintiff makes an equally ıable answer when he says that he is per- ready to refer every everything to arbitra- ɔut would wish to be informed of what are sputed matters. It is quite reasonable to ask ɔecause it certainly appears that there was stion as to that. Nothing had been done the stumping, but they have raised other ions now about the non-sufficiency of the and the non-completion of the agreement. laintiff did, at one time, raise a wrong con- n, but he was afterwards willing to submit atter to arbitration, and then this course was of bringing an action of ejectment. When s get to controversy they raise every point an. Two or three things are raised as points ; one that this is a corporation, and the that they could not grant so long a lease. I opinion that they are not within the Muni- Corporations Act, and that they are not pro- d from granting a 300 years' lease. Mr. e, however, put it in a different form, and was an improvident lease altogether. I do ıink it was, because they got a wall built and which was of no use, and they encouraged to build houses; and it does not appear he evidence that there was anything better lone with the land. Then it is said that the nent was not under seal. It is quite sufficient r to that to say that the corporation, like bodies, although they have not eyes, yet they gents who have eyes to see for them, and if llow a wall to be built and money to be led, they must be answerable certainly for erformance of the contract which has been rly entered in their books by a formal reso- on the faith of which an expenditure has nade. Then it is said one of the terms was ıis was not to be done without the concurrence feoffees, and that Mr. Crook was to pay the ses of that concurrence. That he must pay. feoffees had really any duties to perform— is admitted that they are dry trustees of the ration, and have nothing else to do but to obey rporation—it would have been necessary to their consent. If there were any question of might have been necessary for Mr. Crook e a bill. The feoffees might have said point is too doubtful for us; we do now whether this is a lease which we l have been right in executing under all rcumstances." But if the court holds, as I at the agreement is a proper agreement to formed, they have nothing to do but to per- it. The difficulty I feel is as to the costs. the costs, I shall make an alteration in respect. I shall strike out the reference ambers to settle the decree, and substitute laration as to the meaning of the agree- That will save the appellants the costs of peal. As regards the costs of the original I do not think the court has been in error recting them to be paid by the defendants, se the course taken of bringing an action of ejectment in the County Court in such a matter as this, where the thing might have been so easily adjusted, is one, in my opinion, which was not justified. I think they cannot be saved from the costs, because in one stage of the controversy this gentleman raised a contention which he was not right in raising. The plaintiff said he would submit to arbitration if they would tell him the points. He said in an early affidavit before the hearing that he would make no difficulty in giving up the lawn he had taken, and yet the case still went on. I do not think, under all those circumstances, I can say the court below has been wrong in directing the costs of the suit to be paid by the parties to the litigation. That includes the feoffees, who will be indemnified by the cestui que trusts. The feoffees brought the action. It is necessary to bring them here as parties, and if they bring that action on behalf of their cestui que trusts, they can only look to their cestui que trusts for indemnification. The total result is this, that I propose to vary the decree of the court below by prefacing it in this way: Let the decree be varied, by declaring that, according to the true construction of the resolution of the defendants, the corporation of Seaford, of the 5th Jan. 1860, the corporation agree to demise to the plaintiff such portion of their property as forms the frontage of the plaintiff's field called the West Gun Field, and also the flat part of the beach comprised between two lines drawn from each extremity of such field perpendicularly towards the sea, such lines being continued until they reach high water mark. Then the declaration will go on as it stands in the decree, and the court orders that there shall be specific performance subject to that, and orders and decrees the same accordingly. It will also order that the defendants should make out and execute to the plaintiff a lease of the premises, subject to the above declaration, mentioned and described in the said resolution. I will put the words "subject as therein mentioned" at the end of my declaration, for one of the points in the case was that there was no road to be made. The conveyance will be settled at chambers if the parties differ. I think that is all that is necessary. There will be no costs of the appeal.

V.C. BACON'S COURT.

Reported by the Hon. ROBERT BUTLER and T. H. CARSON, Esq., Barristers-at-Law.

Saturday, July 29, 1871.

Re THE DURHAM COUNTY INVESTMENT AND BUILDING SOCIETY; DAVIS'S CASE.

Benefit building society—Power to borrow—Certificate of barrister—Lien on deeds of depositors—6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32.

The trustees of a benefit building society, having no power to borrow, were, by an alteration of its rules, adopted at a meeting, and certified by Mr. Tidd Pratt as being in conformity to the provisions of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, empowered to borrow for the purposes of the society. The trustees borrowed very large sums of money, and spent them in assisting other societies and in the purchase of land. Subsequently the society was ordered to be wound-up. The trustees had, amongst others, borrowed 100l. from D., for which they had given him a deposit note, and he now claimed to recover this 100l. from the official liquidator. They had also borrowed 200l. from W., and they had given him a deposit note, and also had handed to him certain deeds of depositors as collateral security, and the liquidator now claimed to have these deeds handed to him without payment of the money for which they were deposited as security.

Held, as to D., that the society having no power to borrow, and having spent the money for purposes not beneficial to the society, he could not recover; but as to W., it was held that the court had no authority to compel him to give up the deeds without payment of the money.

THE above named society was constituted in the year 1862, on the permanent principle, for the following purposes—namely, to raise a fund for the purpose of enabling the members to purchase freehold land or other real or leasehold estate on which to erect suitable cottages and dwelling houses; to provide the means for profitable investment of small savings; and in cases of accidental death to relieve the widows and families of deceased shareholders by adding the interest and estimated profits of the current year on the withdrawal of their shares at the time of death.

The 57th rule of the society defined the powers and duties of the directors, but did not give them any power to borrow money.

At a special general meeting of the society, held at their offices on the 15th Aug. 1867, certain alterations and additions to the rules were considered and resolved on, and (inter alia) the following alterations in the 57th rule, namely, "To omit clause 4, and to substitute the following: The directors shall have power from time to time to borrow for the purposes of the society such sums and at such rates of interest, and under such terms and conditions as they may think proper and expedient."

The said alterations were certified as being in conformity to law and within the provisions of the Act 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, by John Tidd Pratt, the barrister appointed to certify the rules of the savings banks on the 28th Aug. 1867.

Previously to the winding-up order the society had borrowed largely from depositors, bankers, and others, and most of the money so borrowed had been either lent to other societies or spent in the purchase of a freehold estate at Middlesborough.

On the 29th Jan. 1868, Mr. Davis deposited 200*l.* with the society, but 100*l.* of this was returned on the 1st of Feb. 1870.

On the 15th Feb. 1871, the court ordered the society to be wound-up, and Mr. Davis at once gave notice of his claim to the official liquidator for the balance of the money due to him. This claim was disputed by the official liquidator, and Mr. Davis made an application, which was adjourned into court, and now came on for hearing, "that his claim in respect of 100*l.* balance of the sum of 200*l.* deposited with the society," with interest thereon might be allowed and paid by the official liquidator.

Eddis, Q.C. appeared for Mr. Davis, and contended that the money was in reality borrowed for the purposes of the society, and that it was for the benefit of the society that it was invested in the lands at Middlesborough, and further, that a building society is entitled to invest its funds in the purchase of real estate. He referred to—

Hill's case, L. Rep. 9 Eq. 605;
Laing v. Reed, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 773; L. Rep. 5 Ch. 4.

And that as the society were in possession of an estate which they had purchased with money lent by Mr. Davis, therefore Mr. Davis was entitled to follow the money, and to stand in the position of a vendor of land, and claim a lien upon it:

Fry, Q. C., and N. Higgins for the official liquidator, were not called upon.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that the question whether the society had power to borrow money was one depending entirely on the authority granted to it under the statutory enactments in that behalf. In his opinion the objects of the society were to allow the members to lay out their money and savings, and so far the objects were beneficial, but he thought it was clear that it was out of their power to borrow money. In any case he considered that, even if the alteration in the rules had given the power it purported to do, they had transgressed the rules as so altered, and had borrowed money for purposes which it was evident were not conducive to the benefit of the society. The cases cited did now show that Mr. Davis was entitled to follow his money, and that for that purpose he had an interest in the land, and he was of opinion that on neither of the grounds relied upon could the claim be maintained. The summons would be dismissed, but as this was a representative case he thought it right that the costs of both parties should come out of the estate.

WILSON'S CASE.

THIS was another representative case in the same winding-up matter as the above. It came on for hearing on an application of the official liquidator that the Rev. William Wilson might be directed, within seven days, and without payment of any sum of money, to hand over to the official liquidator the deeds deposited with him in July 1862, as a security for the loan of 200*l.*

The position of the lender was, however, materially altered. In this case deeds of depositors with the society, which had been left in the hands of the trustees in trust for such depositors, were handed over to him as a collateral security for the amount lent by him. The memorandum of deposit given to Mr. Wilson with the deeds was as follows:

Memorandum.—We, William Henry Hills, bookseller, Thomas Scott Turnbull, draper, Anthony M'Donald, grocer, and Joseph Ridley, builder, all of the borough of Sunderland, and trustees of the Durham County Permanent Benefit Building Society, established within the said borough, and who, and their successors, are hereinafter called the trustees, have borrowed of the Rev. William Wilson, of Ryhope, in the said county, clerk, the sum of 200*l.*, in trust for the said society, at interest on security of the promissory note of the said A. McDonald and Joseph Ridley, trustees as aforesaid, and we have deposited with the said Wm. Wilson the mortgage deeds mentioned in the schedule hereunder written, and the several other deeds and writings relating to the premises mentioned and set forth in the said schedule as a collateral security for the payment of the said sum of 200*l.*, with interest after the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum, payable half-yearly, clear of all deductions whatsoever: Provided that, if any member of the said society shall at any time be of paying off and satisfying any security or s given by him to the trustees which shall be in session of the said Wm. Wilson, he, the said ilson, doth hereby agree that he will, on receiving of adequate value, redeliver to the trustees all rtgage and other deeds and writings relative to erty or properties intended to be discharged from urity or securities as aforesaid.

the schedule contained a list of the deeds to Mr. Wilson. The question, in addition power of borrowing, was whether the direc- d the power to deposit the members' secu- n order to secure an advance of money to iety.

scott, for Mr. Wilson, contended that though ng society had no right to borrow money ; an express power to do so, still a creditor h a lien on the deeds that he was entitled them till he was repaid his money. Mr. carried in no claim, he rested on his r.

Q. C., and N. Higgins, for the official liqui- contended that the society received no from the money lent by Mr. Wilson; also, e deeds were placed in the hands of the trus- the benefit of the depositors, and that, as re improperly handed over by such trustees, on of detinue could have been properly t for their recovery. Further, that the position rtgaging member of a building society and are of the contract shown in the mortgage ould prevent any depositor of such mort- lding it as a security for a debt, so long as nber paid his contributions and conformed ules.

e v. Sparrow, 18 W. R. 400.

VICE-CHANCELLOR said that the official or could not claim more than the society, t it was quite clear he could not compel lson to return these deeds to the society the money for which he held them as was returned to him. He considered that no authority to order Mr. Wilson to give leeds, and that the summons must there- dismissed, but without costs.

Where, re, by an order of the Board of Trade, the of the port of Hull were extended and de- and the sea between Flamborough Head and Spurn Point was placed within them, and persons were prohibited from taking ballast or shingle from certain parts of the shore so extended as the port of Hull:*

Held, that a person so taking ballast or shingle from such parts was guilty of an offence within the meaning of sect. 14 of the 54 Geo. 3, c. 159.

THIS was a case stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, by the stipendiary magistrate of Hull, upon a conviction by him of the appellant, under the 54 Geo. 3, c. 159, s. 14, for taking shingle from the shores of the port of Kingston-upon-Hull. The case stated, among other things, as follows :—

The information against the appellant in this case was laid by the collector of customs at Hull, by direction of the Board of Trade, and charges that the appellant did on the 11th April 1870, at the parish of Owthorn in the county of York, unlawfully take shingle from the shores or banks, or from a portion of the shores or banks of the port of Kingston-upon-Hull, whereby the said port was, and is, in danger of being damaged contrary to the 54 Geo. 3, c. 159, thereby incurring a penalty of 10*l*.

The offence thus brought under consideration, was committed on the seashore at Withernsea, in the parish of Owthorn, and county of York, Withernsea being a village about fifteen miles to the north of the Spurn Point, and several miles south of Flamborough Head, and lying also between Spurn and a village called Hornsea. On the 1st Aug. 1868, the Board of Trade issued an order which prohibited the removal of shingle from the shore or banks or any portion of the shore or banks at Spurn Point, from the low lighthouse southward to the extreme of the point at low water, and northward two and a half statute miles on both sides of the Spurn Point. In July 1869 proceedings were taken by the board against several parties for infractions of this order at a place called Kilnsea, two miles from Spurn Point, and they pleaded guilty, no professional gentleman having appeared for them; the result being, that the practice of taking shingle within the limits defined by the order was stopped.

After the proceeding in July 1869, the Board of Trade issued a second order, bearing date the 6th Sept. 1869, prohibiting the removal of shingle or ballast from the shores and banks of the port of Kingston-upon-Hull, and the works thereof between the northernmost boundary of the parish of Hornsea, and the limits north of Spurn Point, defined by the said order of the 1st Aug. 1868.

The prohibition contained in this second order of the Board of Trade seems to have been the means of stopping the removal of shingle within the extended limits up to the 11th April last; but on that day the appellant, by the direction of Sir Clifford Constable, removed shingle from the shore near Withernsea, a previous intimation that he would do so having been sent to the Board of Trade by Sir Clifford Constable's solicitor.

The removal of the shingle is admitted, and it was not only admitted, but proved before me by the evidence of Mr. Code, Captain Carter, Mr. Oldham, and others, that such removal, if unrestricted from Hornsea to Kilnsea, must, by endangering the lighthouse at Spurn and the navigation and harbourage in the Humber, in the Hank roads, and under Sunk Island, to be injurious to the last degree to the port of Hull, assuming that such port (as alleged on the part of the Board of Trade) should be found to extend from Trent Fall to Flamborough Head.

Mr. O'Dowd (who appeared for the Board of Trade), after quoting various authorities, proceeded to the Acts, Orders, &c., of more modern date, which authorise the Board of Trade to proceed against parties removing shingle from the coast at Withernsea, and he submitted the mode under which a port can now be created, and the only mode is under the provisions of an Act, commonly called the Customs Consolidation Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 107), but the full title of which is an Act to Amend and Consolidate the Law relating to the Customs of the United Kingdom and of the Isle of Man, and certain Laws relating to Trade and Navigation and the British Possessions. Under that Act the Treasury may by their warrant appoint any port or sub-port in the United Kingdom, and declare the limit thereof, and appoint proper places within the same to be legal quays for the lading and unlading of goods, and declare the bounds and extent of any such quays, or annul the limits of any port, sub-port, haven, creek, or legal quay already appointed, or to be hereafter set out and appointed, and declare the same to be no longer a port, sub-port, haven, creek, or legal quay, ... or alter and vary the names, bounds, and limits thereof, &c. Mr. O'Dowd then contended that under the powers of this Act Hull was appointed a port by the Treasury, as appears by the Gazette of 17th March 1848 (No. 20,837), hereto annexed, and that such port commences at the confluence of the Trent and Ouse, and extends to Spurn Point at the entrance of the Humber, and from thence northerly along the coast of Yorkshire to Flamborough Head. The 54 Geo. 3, c. 159 (which creates the offence alleged to have been committed by appellant) enacts that, in order to prevent damage being done to the shores or banks of the ports, harbours, or havens of the kingdom, no person shall take ballast or shingle from the shores or banks, or any portion of the shores or banks, of any port, harbour, or haven of the kingdom from which the Commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral shall find it necessary, for the protection of such port, harbour, or haven, or the works thereof, by order published in the Gazette, to prohibit the taking or removing of such shingle or ballast upon pain of forfeiting ten pounds for every such offence.

By the Harbours Transfer Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 69, s. 17) it is enacted that from and after the 31st Dec. 1862, sects. 14 and 16 of the 54th Geo. 3, c. 159, and all provisions relative thereto shall be read and construed as if the Board of Trade were named in the said section instead of the Admiralty.

In pursuance of the powers thus conferred upon them, the Board of Trade issued the two orders already referred to, A and B, and for the breach of the observance of the second of those orders the proceedings against appellant have been taken.

In reply to the case for the prosecution, Mr. Kemplay admitted that if the Board of Trade have power to make an order that will include Withernsea, the defendant must be convicted, but contended that the port of Hull, alleged by the prosecution to extend from Trent Falls to Flamborough Head, and thus or otherwise to include Withernsea, is only a port for Customs purposes, and not a port within the meaning of the 14th section of 54 Geo. 3, c. 159, and that that statute applies only to ports as defined by Lord Hale.

The only case referred to by Mr. Kemplay in support of this argument was the Hull Dock Company v. Browne (2 Barn. & Adol. 43), and I find that it was noticed in a subsequent case, Beilby v. Raper (3 Barn. & Adol. 284); but upon examining those cases they do not appear to me to lead to the conclusions Mr. Kemplay was contending for. I failed to satisfy myself, having regard to the mode of creating ports in ancient and more modern times, and to the various authorities on the subject of ports, to which reference has been made, that it would be safe for me to coincide in the conclusion that the port of Hull can only be said to include the coast near Withernsea for Customs purposes, so as to exclude that part of the coast from the protection of the 54 Geo. 3, c. 159, s. 14.

I can find nothing in the title or object of the Act of 1853 that indicates any intention to circumscribe the ports created under its provisions to merely revenue purposes, or in any manner whatsoever, but on the contrary, the ports referred to would seem to be capable of limitation only in accordance with the terms of the order creating them, nor do I find in the order of 1848 any words circumscribing the creation of the port of Hull, so as to limit its provisions to merely revenue purposes, nor is it a fact that the duties of the Customs in reference to the port of Hull, using that term in the extended sense contended for by the Board of Trade, are limited to revenue purposes, as I find that the Customs have jurisdiction over the port of Hull as thus extended for various purposes wholly independent of revenue, such as cases of stranding, registry of vessels, &c., being the ordinary agents of the Board of Trade in matters not belonging to the Customs as a revenue department. It has not been suggested by the appellant that there is any other mode of creating a port in the present day than that adopted as to the port of Hull under the order of 1848, and it has not been shown by evidence or otherwise that there is or ever was a port of Hull in accordance with the definition of Lord Hale, though it would seem from the case referred to by Mr. Kemplay that there was formerly a port of Sayer Creek, which was sometimes called the port of Hull. No reasons were adduced by the appellant when before me for contracting materially the benefits to be derived from the 54 Geo. 3, c. 159, s. 14, though such a result must follow if that Act is confined to such ports only as come literally within the definitions contained in Lord Hale's work.

On a review of the various legal authorities adduced before me, I decided in favour of the view taken by the Board of Trade, and held that, according to the proper construction of the authorities referred to of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, the 54 Geo. 3, c. 159, s. 14, and of the Prohibitory Orders of the Board of Trade, an offence had been committed by the appellant as charged against him in the information before me, and I found him guilty accordingly.

The only question of law that I propose to submit on the above statement for the opinion of this court is, whether the orders of the Board of Trade, having date the 1st Aug. 1868 and the 6th Sept. 1869, are valid in point of law?

If the court should be of opinion that the said orders are valid, then the said conviction was legally and properly made, and the appellant is liable as aforesaid, and the said conviction is to stand; but if the court should be of opinion otherwise, then the said information is to be dismissed.

Attached to the case were an extract from the London Gazette of the 17th March 1848 (No. 20,837), purporting to be an order of the Lords of the Treasury, annulling the limits of the port of Bridlington, and defining the limits of the port of Hull; also an order prohibiting the taking of ballast or shingle from the shores or banks of the said port. Reference to these will be found sufficiently made in the statement of the case, and in the judgment of the court.

Sir John Karslake, Q. C. (Kemplay with him) appeared for the appellant, and in the course of his argument cited the following statutes and authorities:—

The Attorney-General (Beasley with him) appeared for the respondent, and in addition to the above authorities quoted,

The arguments of counsel are so fully adverted to in the following elaborate judgment, that it is unnecessary further to refer to them.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 27.—LUSH, J.—The question submitted to us by the case is, whether two orders of the Board of Trade, dated the 1st of Aug. 1868, and the 6th Sept. 1869, are valid in point of law. The first of these orders, after reciting that the board had found it necessary for the protection of the harbour or haven of the river Humber, and of the shores and banks thereof, and of the works thereof, to prohibit the taking or removing of any shingle or ballast from the shore or bank thereinafter specified, prohibited all persons from taking or removing any description of shingle or ballast from the shore or banks, or from any portion of the shore or banks, at Spurn Point, from the Low Lighthouse southward to the extreme of the point at low water, and northward two and a-half statute miles on both sides of the Spurn Point. The second order, after reciting the first, and that for the further protection of the said harbour, haven, or port, and also for the protection of the shores and banks of the port of Kingston-upon-Hull, and of the works thereof, the Board of Trade had found it necessary to extend the limits mentioned therein, went on to prohibit the taking of shingle or ballast from the shore or banks, or from any portion of the shore or banks of the said harbour or haven, or from the shores and banks of the port of Kingston-upon-Hull, and the works thereof, between the northernmost boundary of the parish of Hornsea and the limits north of Spurn Point, defined by the order of the 1st Aug. 1868. These orders were professedly founded on the statute 54 Geo. 3, c. 159, s. 14, by which it is enacted that, in order to prevent damage being done to the shores or banks of the ports, harbours, or havens in this kingdom, no person or persons shall take any ballast or shingle from the shores or banks or any portion of the shores or banks of any port, harbour, or haven of this kingdom from which the Commissioners for executing the office of Lord Highe Admiral of the United Kingdom for the time being shall find it necessary for the protection of such port, harbour, or haven, or the works thereof, by order under their hands, &c., to prohibit the taking or removing of such shingle or ballast, upon pain of forfeiting for every such offence the sum of 10*l*. By the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 69, s. 16, the powers vested in the Commissioners of the Admiralty by this section were transferred to the Board of Trade. The place where the shingle was taken by the defendant, and for which taking he was convicted, is not upon any portion of the shore or banks of that which is popularly known or which would be geographically described as the harbour or haven of the Humber, or the port of Kingston-upon-Hull, but upon a part of the coast fifteen miles to the north of Spurn Point, and lying between Spurn and a village called Hornsea. This was not in any sense part of the port of Kingston-upon-Hull, or of the haven of the Humber at the time of passing the 54 Geo. 3; but it was, at the date of the offence, within the limits of the port of Kingston-upon-Hull, as those limits were appointed and defined by an order of the Commissioners of Customs made in 1848, and published in the London Gazette on the 17th March in that year. By that order, made under the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 102, the coast from Spurn Point to Flamborough Head, which in the fourth year of Geo. 2 had been assigned to the port of Bridlington, and which, at the passing of the 54 Geo. 3, was within the limits of that port, were transferred to and directed to form part of the port of Hull. On behalf of the appellant it was contended that the powers of the Board of Trade under the 53 Geo. 3, c. 159, s. 14, are confined to what is geographically within part of the port or haven which is popularly known as such, or at all events, as regards this case, to so much of the shore as formed part of the port of Hull at the time when the Act passed. The title of the Act is, "An Act for the better Regulation of the several Ports, Harbours, Roadsteads, Sounds, Channels, Bays, and Navigable Rivers in the United Kingdom, and of His Majesty's Docks, Dockyard, Arsenals, Wharfs, Moorings, &c.," and it contains various enactments, some of which apply to the whole coasts of the kingdom, others only to places frequented by ships for the purpose of loading and discharging. The two sections immediately preceding the 14th belong to the former class. They prohibit the unlading on any part of the shore, except at a wharf constructed for the purpose, of any ballast, stone, gravel, &c., except at or within two hours before, or two hours after, high water, and the depositing of such matters at any time below low water mark at neap tides, &c. The 14th section belongs to the latter class, and applies only to ports, harbours, or havens, its object being to prevent disturbance of the shore of these places or resort for shipping which might result in injury to the navigation and consequent detriment to commerce. It is therefore clear that the jurisdiction of the Board of Trade to prohibit the taking of shingle extends not over the whole of the coast of the kingdom, but only over such portions thereof as are within the ambit of a port, harbour or haven. Whatever is done beyond those limits is left to be dealt with at common law, but within those limits the jurisdiction of the board to prohibit the public from taking shingle or ballast is absolute and without appeal. What may be the meaning and operation of the saving clause, the 28th section, it is unnecessary to consider, because the defendant did not bring himself within its provisions. On the other hand, it is equally clear that their jurisdiction is not limited to ports or havens for which regulations have been made under the earlier sections of the Act. The enactment applies, as the object and purpose of it require that it should apply, to "any" and every port, harbour, and haven in the kingdom. Ports and havens are not mere geographical expressions. They are places appointed by the Crown for persons and merchandises to pass into and out of the realm, and at such places only is it lawful for ships to load and discharge cargo. The assignment of such places to be "the" inlets and gates of the realm is and always has been a branch of the prerogative, resting, as Blackstone remarks (vol. 1, p. 264), partly upon a fiscal foundation, in order to secure the king's marine revenue. Their limit and bounds are necessarily defined by the authority which creates them, and the area embraced within those limits constitute the port. Having once granted the franchise, the king had not at common law the power of resumption or of narrowing and confining their limits when once established, but any person had a right to load and discharge his merchandise in any part of the haven, whereby, as observed by Blackstone in the same volume, "the revenue of the Customs was much impaired and diminished by fraudulent loadings in obscure corners." This occasioned the statutes of 1 Eliz. c. 11, and 13 & 14 Car. 2, c. 11. The latter statute (sect. 14) enables the Crown by commission to appoint all such further places, ports, havens, and creeks (except the town of Hull) as shall be lawful for loading or discharging, lading or shipping of any goods, wares, or merchandizes within the Kingdom of England, and to set down and appoint the extents and limits of every port, haven, or creek within the kingdom, whereby the extents, limits, and privileges of every port, haven, or creek may be ascertained and known. The town of Hull, which was a legal port time out of mind, having been excepted out of the operation of this Act, a private Act was passed in the 14 Geo. 3 (c. 56), whereby his Majesty was empowered to assign necessary places and quays at Kingston-upon-Hull, and to settle the extents and limits of the same; and by the 45 Geo. 3 (private), the rights and privileges which then belonged to the port of Kingston-upon-Hull were extended to new docks and basins then made, which were deemed and held to be part of the port: (see Hull Dock Company v. Brown, 2 Barn. & Ald. 43.) The Act of Charles II. remained in force down to the year 1825, when it was repealed, together with a large number of other statutes relating to the Customs, and a new Act passed (6 Geo. 4, c. 108, s. 135), whereby a similar power was given to appoint by commission out of the Court of Exchequer any port, haven, or creek in the United Kingdom, and to set out the limits thereof; but this section contained a proviso in affirmance of the common law, that all ports, havens, and creeks, and the respective limits thereof, and all legal quays appointed and set out and existing as such at the commencement of the Act under any law till then in force shall continue to be such ports, havens, creeks, limits, and legal quays respectively as if the same had been appointed under the Act. This provision was re-enacted in the subsequent Consolidation Acts (the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 52, and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 86), and each contained the saving in favour of existing ports and quays. But the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 102, which dispensed with the commission out of the Exchequer, and vested the appointment of ports, sub-ports, and quays in the Commissioners of Customs, abrogated the right which existed at common law which had been preserved by all the previous Acts. Sect. 15 empowers the commissioners to annul the limits of any port-sub-port, haven, creek, or legal quay, or to alter or vary the names, bounds, or limits of any such port, sub-port, haven, creek, or quay. Sect. 16 requires the appointment, annulment, or alteration to be published in the London Gazette. It was under this statute that the order was made in 1848, annulling the port of Bridlington, and assigning the limits formerly of that port to the port of Hull. From these considerations it appears to us to be beyond a doubt that the word "port" in 54 Geo. 3 is used not in a geographical, but in its legal and proper sense, as denoting a place to which ships were or should be authorised to resort for loading and discharging. Its object and purpose being the preservation and protection of these places from injury for the sake of shipping and commerce, it cannot have been meant to refer to places where ships are not allowed to resort, nor can it refer to the mere geographical limits of such places. Ports and havens are not bounded by such limits, but by limits arbitrarily defined by the authority by which the port is constituted. Bridlington, which was created a port under the statute of Car. 2 extended along this very line of coast at the time the 54 Geo. 3 was passed. Can it be said that this spot was not at that time a part of the shore or bank of the port of Bridlington? It had as a port no other limits than those which were assigned to it when it was created a port. But it was further argued that as Hull is an ancient port, and the power to vary its limits was given for Customs purposes only, the limits of the port remained for all other purposes as they were at the time the 54 Geo. 3 passed, and that the 14th section must be read as applying to the port as it existed at that time. We cannot accede to this argument. It was for Customs purposes that ports were at first instituted, and it is for such purposes they are allowed to retain their franchise, and although at common law the Crown could not revoke an appointment once made, it is clear that under the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 102 the Crown now has the power to annul and take away the franchise from any port, whether it be an ancient port like Hull, or a comparatively modern one like Bridlington. When this, however, is done, the place ceases to be a port, and the 54 Geo. 3 no longer applies to it. If, instead of annulling the port, the commissioners were to contract its ancient limits, the port would consist of the area embraced in those new limits and the coast outside, though formerly subject to, would no longer be within, the jurisdiction of the Board of Trade; so if instead of annulling or contracting, the commissioners extend the limits of the port, the parts newly taken in become as much a part of the port as was the part originally within it. If the question were whether a right to anchorage or other dues claimable in the port as it existed before the order of 1848, is by virtue of that order extended over the new area, the case would be widely different. The answer that the enlargement was made for Customs purposes and not to benefit the grantee of the dues, would be conclusive; but that has no bearing on the question we have to decide, which is, whether the extended limits form part of the port within the meaning of the 54 Geo. 3, c. 159. For the reasons given we are of opinion that they do, and that the port intended by that Act is the port as it is constituted for the time being by the orders of the Commissioners of Customs. We therefore affirm the conviction. Conviction affirmed.

25 & 26 Vict. c. 66; 31 & 32 Vict. c. 56 (The Petroleum Acts 1862—68)—"Petroleum"—Mode of testing—Storage.

25 & 26 Vict. c. 66 (the Petroleum Act 1862), s. 1, enacts that "'petroleum,' for the purposes of this Act, shall include any product thereof that gives off an inflammable vapour at a temperature of less than 100*deg. of Fahrenheit's thermometer.*" 31 & 32 Vict. c. 56 (the Petroleum Act 1868), s. 6, empowers inspectors to test petroleum kept for sale contrary to the provisions of the Acts, and provides "that if the person in whose possession such petroleum shall be found shall claim to have a further test made, a public analyst shall be called in who shall test it."

The schedule prescribes the mode of testing, directing that outer and inner vessels shall be used, the latter being 2*in. deep; that the inner vessel shall be filled with the petroleum, and the outer with cold water. A small flame shall be applied to the bottom of the outer vessel, and a thermometer with a bulb,* 1½*in. in diameter, inserted into the oil, so that the bulb shall be immersed about* 1½*in. beneath the surface; and when heat has been applied to the water until the thermometer has risen to about* 90*deg. Fahrenheit, a very small flame shall be quickly passed across the surface of the oil until a flash is produced.*

An inspector in making this test, allowed the bulb of the thermometer to rest on the bottom of the inner vessel, and passed a "very small flame" across the oil, but a still smaller one might have been employed. The petroleum gave off an inflammable vapour at a temperature of less than 100*deg. Fahr., and the owner was summoned for keeping such petroleum within fifty yards of a dwelling-house or building where the goods were stored.*

He objected to the mode of testing; but the justices thought that the test was properly applied, and they ruled that the only way in which he could displace the test was by calling in a "public analyst." He declined to do so, and was convicted.

On a case stated, the Court Held, that it did not appear that there had been such a substantial departure from the mode of testing prescribed by the statute as to lead to the conclusion that the decision of the justices was wrong.

CASE stated by justices of Kent under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

The respondent laid an information against the appellant under sect. 6 of the Petroleum Act 1868, charging that the respondent, being inspector of weights and measures for the district, on the 8th Nov. 1870, at the parish of Tunbridge, did enter a certain building within his jurisdiction, wherein petroleum was then kept, offered or exposed for sale; and that he did inspect and test all the petroleum there; and that the building was occupied or used by the appellant; and that upon such inspection and test it appeared that certain of the petroleum gave off an inflammable vapour at a temperature of less than 100deg. of Fahrenheit thermometer, the said building being within fifty yards of a dwelling-house or building in which goods were stored, the appellant not not having a licence by the local authority, contrary to the statute. The appellant was convicted of the said offence, and adjudged to pay a penalty of 10*s.* (a)

(a) 25 & 26 Vict. c. 66 (The Petroleum Act 1862), s. 1, declares that "'Petroleum' for the purposes of this Act, shall include any product thereof that gives off an inflammable vapour at a temperature of less than 100deg. of Fahrenheit's thermometer."

Sect. 4 provides for the granting of licences to keep petroleum.

31 & 32 Vict. c. 56 (the Petroleum Act 1868) enacts that . . . . "no petroleum shall be kept otherwise than for private use within 50yds. of a dwelling-house or of a building in which goods are stored, except in pursuance of a licence given in accordance with the Petroleum Act 1862."

Sect. 6 enacts that it shall be lawful for any inspectors of weights and measures . . . . to inspect and test all petroleum kept, offered, or exposed for sale; and, if upon such inspection and test, any description of petroleum shall be found, kept, offered, or exposed for sale as aforesaid, contrary to the provisions of this Act, or of the Petroleum Act 1862, the same shall be liable to be seized, and upon conviction forfeited, and such person so examining the same shall retain a sample thereof, and the person or persons so offending shall be liable for any such offence to any penalty not exceeding 5*l.*, provided always that if the person . . . . in whose possession such petroleum shall be found as aforesaid, shall claim to have a further test made on their behalf, the magistrate before whom complaint of the said offence may be laid, shall call before him the public analyst provided by the 2nd section of 23 & 24 Vict. c. 84, or if no such analyst has been provided some other person having competent chemical knowledge, who shall test a portion of the sample so retained as aforesaid, in the manner hereinafter provided, and shall give evidence of the result of such test."

Sect. 8 enacts "The temperature at which petroleum gives off an inflammable vapour shall, for the purposes of the Petroleum Acts, be tested in the manner set forth in the schedule hereto."

Schedule. Directions for applying the flashing test to samples of petroleum oil.

The vessel which is to hold the oil shall be of thin sheet iron; it shall be 2in. deep and 2in. wide at the opening, tapering slightly towards the bottom; it shall have a flat rim with a raised edge ¼in. high round the top; it shall be supported by this rim in a tin vessel 4½in. deep and 4½in. in diameter; it shall also have a thin wire stretched across the opening, which wire shall be so fixed to the edge of the vessel that it shall be a ¼in. above the surface of the flat rim. The thermometer to be used shall have a round bulb about ½in. in diameter, and is to be graduated upon the scale of Fahrenheit, every 10deg. occupying not less than ¼in. upon the scale.

The inner vessel shall be filled with the petroleum to be tested, but care must be taken that the liquid does not cover the flat rim. The outer vessel shall be filled with cold or nearly cold water: a small flame shall be applied

Upon the hearing of the above information, at a petty sessions at Tunbridge Wells, it was proved, on the part of the respondent, that on the 8th Nov. 1870 he had visited the appellant's shop, and had there found a certain oil, which he had tested for the purpose of ascertaining whether it was petroleum within the meaning of the Act, that is to say, whether it gave off an inflammable vapour at a temperature of less than 100deg. of Fahrenheit's thermometer, and found that, according to the test used by him, the oil did give off an inflammable vapour at a temperature of less than 100deg. Upon cross-examination by the attorney for the appellant, the respondent produced the apparatus by means of which he had made the test, and it appeared that such apparatus was not provided with any means by which the thermometer could be suspended in the oil, so that the respondent, in making the test, was obliged to, and did in fact, rest the bulb of the thermometer upon the bottom of the inner vessel containing the petroleum, whereby the bulb of the thermometer was inserted in the petroleum to the full depth of the inner vessel, which was 2in. deep, as required by the schedule of the Act. Whereupon the attorney for the appellant objected that the test had not been made in a legal manner—that is to say in the manner required by the schedule; and in support of such objection he called as a witness B. Redwood, Esq., a Fellow of the Chemical Society, and a person experienced in the testing of petroleum, as an expert, who deposed that the apparatus of the respondent was not in a complete state, for want of a standard with fastening screws, which ought to be attached thereto for the purpose of holding the thermometer inserted in the petroleum at the depth required by the Act, viz., about 1½in.; and he pointed out to the justices a screw hole attached to the brim of the apparatus, which, he explained, was intended for the purpose of attaching a standard for suspending the thermometer. The same witness also deposed that the insertion of the bulb of the thermometer to the very bottom of the oil vessel might, in his judgment, fail to give an accurate result, for that, when oil is heated quickly, the heated particles rise to the surface, and until the whole of the oil contained in the inner vessel is heated equally throughout, the lower part thereof is of a lower temperature than the surface which gives off an inflammable vapour, and that a thermometer inserted in such lower part would indicate such lower temperature, instead of the higher temperature of the surface at the time the flashing point was reached; but he admitted on cross-examination that he was unable to state whether the placing of the bulb at the bottom of the oil vessel would cause any different result in the test, as he had never tried the experiment. Upon this point the justices decided that the requirements of the Act had been complied with, because, although the schedule prescribes that the thermometer shall be inserted in the oil, so that the bulb shall be immersed about one and a half inches beneath the surface, yet that exact depth is not required; and because the time stated to have been occupied by the respondent in heating the oil appeared to the justices to be sufficient to insure the equal heating of the oil throughout.

It further appeared, upon the evidence of the respondent, that for the purpose of passing a very small flame quickly across the surface of the oil, in order to ascertain the flashing point as required by the schedule, he had used a small lamp containing spirits of wine, with a cotton wick inserted in such spirits of wine, and drawn out therefrom through a small tube, and the portion of the wick which protruded from the mouth of the tube was ignited, in order to supply the very small flame required; and upon cross-examination the respondent stated that such lamp had not been furnished to him by the philosophical instrument mak r who had supplied the rest of the apparatus, but that he had subsequently procured the same elsewhere. Whereupon the same witness for the appellant deposed that in his opinion such means of producing the very small flame required by the Act was improper, inasmuch as the size of the flame produced by the spirit lamp would vary according to the extent to which the cotton wick might be pulled out from the tube, so that it was almost impossible the flame would ever be of the same size in any two instances of testing. Also that the flame of the lamp would be apt to vary, as the spirit would flow down the tube more or less freely, so that the inclination at which the lamp might happen to be held would make a difference in the result. Also, that the spirit flame produced by the lamp was but indistinctly visible in daylight, so that the real size thereof could not be clearly discerned; also that the heat of a flame from spirits of wine was very much greater than that of most other flames, and too great for the purpose in question; and that in passing such a flame over the petroleum, it would, if passed too slowly, communicate its own heat to the surface, and thus raise the temperature of the surface to a higher degree than that of the body of petroleum heated only by the hot water in the outer vessel. On the other hand the witness stated that the proper mode, in his opinion, of producing the very small flame required, was by a piece of very fine waxed twine, the flame from which was necessarily uniform in size and brilliancy, and could not vary at the pleasure or by the mistake of the operator, and that the heat thereof was very trifling, so that it could not impart an exceptional temperature to the surface of the petroleum under test. Also that the waxed twine was the means actually in use by Dr. Letheby and other eminent analysts; and he supposed that the reason why philosophical instrument makers did not supply with the apparatus any lamp or other means of producing the very small flame in question, was because it was well understood that such flame was to be produced by such fine waxed twine. The witness exhibited a piece of such fine waxed twine ignited in comparito the bottom of the outer vessel, and the thermometer shall be inserted into the oil so that the bulb shall be immersed about 1½in. beneath the surface.

A screen of pasteboard or wood shall be placed round the apparatus, and shall be of such dimensions as to surround it about two-thirds, and to reach several inches above the level of the vessels. When heat has been applied to the water until the thermometer has risen to about 90deg. Fahrenheit, a very small flame shall be quickly passed across the surface of the oil on a level with the wire. If no pale blue flicker or flash is produced, the application of the flame is to be repeated for every rise of 2deg. or 3deg. on the thermometer. When the flashing point has been noted the test shall be repeated with a fresh sample of the oil, using cold or nearly cold, water as before, withdrawing the source of heat from the outer vessel when the temperature approaches that noted in the first experiment, and applying the flame test at every rise of 2deg. in the thermometer.

son with the flame from the respondent's spirit lamp. The justices find as a fact that both the flames so produced were very small flames, although that from the waxed twine was the smaller of the two.

The attorney for the appellant then contended that the Act not having defined the flame required otherwise than as a very small flame, and not having prescribed the mode of producing it, it was competent to the appellant to show by evidence what was the proper size of flame, and the proper mode of producing it; and called upon the justices to declare, upon the evidence before stated, that the flashing of the petroleum by the respondent, by means of a flame produced by a spirit lamp, was not in accordance with the Act and the schedule thereto.

The justices, however, decided that as the Act did not prescribe the manner in which this testing flame shall be produced, the respondent was at liberty to use any means by which a very small flame could be produced. And as the justices found on the evidence that he had in making his test used such a flame, they held that on this point he had satisfied the requirements of the Act.

The attorney for the appellant then called witnesses for the defence, by whom it was sworn that the appellant had purchased the petroleum from a wholesale dealer, who had received with the oil a certificate that it had been tested, and that its flashing point was 104deg. of Fahrenheit's thermometer; and also that a portion of the appellant's petroleum had since been carefully tested by another competent person, who had used fine waxed twine to produce the very small flame required for flashing the oil, and that upon such subsequent test the oil did not give off an inflammable vapour at less temperature than 100deg. of Fahrenheit's thermometer. And also that other parts of similar petroleum, part of the same consignment, and bought of the same wholesale dealer under the same certified test, had been tested by the respondent himself upon the premises of two other retail dealers in Tunbridge Wells, and had been passed by him as not giving off an inflammable vapour at less temperature than 100deg.

The justices having heard the evidence were of opinion that the respondent's test had been made legally in accordance with the statute; and decided that the only way in which the appellant could displace such a test was by claiming to have a further test made by a public analyst or competent chemist, as mentioned in the proviso to sect. 6; and they inquired of the appellant if he claimed to have such further test, whereupon the attorney for the appellant answered that he could not do so without admitting the legality of the test made by the respondent, which he disputed, and that he preferred to rely on the evidence already given for the defence, or proof of the oil not being petroleum within the meaning of the statute, than to refer that question to an unknown person, by whose decision the appellant would have to be bound, without having the right to be present while such further test was made, or the opportunity of cross-examining the person who should make it, as to the means and manner of performing the same. It was contended by the appellant, first, that the insertion of the thermometer in the petroleum to the full depth of the inner vessel in the manner stated in the case was not a compliance with the mode of testing required by the Act, but was a material variation therefrom, such as was shown by the evidence might affect the result of such test, and that not being therefore in conformity with the statute no convictions would take place founded on such test. On the other hand, respondent contended that as the statute prescribes the depth of the immersion of the bulb of the thermometer to be "about one and a half inches," without defining the exact depth, the insertion of the thermometer in the manner stated in the case was not a departure from the requirements of the statute, and therefore the test so made was valid in law. Secondly, the appellant contended that the statute not having defined with precision the size of the very small flame required for flashing petroleum, or the proper means of producing it, the justices were bound to consider the evidence tendered on the part of the appellant on those points, and that such evidence, having shown that the flame used by the respondent in making his test was not produced in the same way as that said to be ordinarily used by eminent analysts, nor such as is required and intended by the statute, the justices should have dismissed the information on the ground that the mode of testing required by the Act had not been complied with. On the other hand, the respondent contended that the Act having left the exact size of the "very small flame" in question and the mode of producing it undefined, the justices were at liberty to disregard the evidence offered by the appellant on the point, and to decide whether the flame used by the respondent was in fact a very small flame, and that therefore that the test made by the respondent was in that respect valid in law so as to ground a conviction. Thirdly, the appellant contended that the two justices should have taken into consideration the evidence given in the defence for the purpose of showing that the oil in question was not, in fact (if properly tested), petroleum within the meaning of the Petroleum Act 1868, and that the appellant was not bound to claim, under the proviso contained in the 6th section, that a further test should be made by a public analyst or other competent chemist, as the only means of displacing the test made by the respondent. On the other hand, the respondent contends that the justices were right to refuse to take such evidence for the defence into consideration, and alleges that there is no other way of avoiding a conviction (if the test by the inspector has been legally made) than by the defendant claiming such further test to be made, and that the result of such further test when made, and that only, would be conclusive for the purpose of acquittal or conviction. If the court should be of opinion that upon the facts before stated, the justices were right in deciding that the test made by the respondent was made according to law, both upon the first and second points, and that they were therefore bound to convict the appellant unless he claimed to have a further test made pursuant to sect. 6, then the conviction was to stand, otherwise the information was to be dismissed.

Grantham for the appellant argued the objections aforesaid.

Anderson, for the respondent, was not called upon to argue.

COCKBURN, C. J.—The justices having heard the evidence (and I think they were quite right to hear the testimony offered on the part of the appellant for the purpose of satisfying them that the test under the Act of Parliament had not been properly applied), came to the conclusion that the provisions of the statute had been substantially complied with; and I confess that I cannot see that there had been such a substantial departure from the mode of testing prescribed by the enactment as to lead us to the conclusion that the magistrates were wrong. That being so, the only kind of appeal given by the Act in case the parties are dissatisfied with the test, is the one afforded by the proviso in sect. 6, directing if the person shall claim a further test that an analytical chemist shall be called in to apply the test again—at all events to use his skill to ascertain whether the petroleum is of such a character as to come within the terms of the statute. In this case not only did the applicant not claim to have a public analyst called in, but on being offered that he declined it. I think the magistrates were quite right in saying that when once they had arrived at the conclusion that there had been a proper test, that was the only course for the appellant to pursue, and that they were not bound to adopt the view of his witnesses that the test had not been properly applied; and unless we could see our way very clearly to think they were wrong, we ought not to interfere with their decision.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The first Petroleum Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 66, s. 1), provides that "'petroleum,' for the purposes of this Act, shall include any product thereof that gives off an inflammable vapour at a temperature of less than 100deg. of Fahrenheit's thermometer." Whether or no the product gave off an inflammable vapour at that temperature had to be proved as it best might be, for there were no provisions in the Act for testing it. That was found inconvenient, and therefore the Amendment Act (31 & 32 Vict. c. 56, s. 6), says that, "It shall be lawful for any inspector of weights and measures . . . at all reasonable times, to inspect and test all petroleum kept, offered, or exposed for sale; and if upon such inspection and test any description of petroleum shall be found kept, or offered, or exposed for sale as aforesaid, contrary to the provisions of this Act, or of the Petroleum Act 1862, the same shall be liable to be seized, and, upon conviction, forfeited." I can only understand from that, that the authorised officer is to go and test, and if upon his test petroleum is found contrary to the Act of Parliament, primâ facie, it would be forfeited. Then the same section provides that, if, when before the magistrate, the person in whose possession such petroleum shall be found shall claim to have a further test made, "the magistrate shall call before him the public analyst, provided by the 2nd section of the Act 23 & 24 Vict. c. 84, or if no such analyst has been provided, some other person having competent chemical knowledge, who shall test a portion of the sample . . . and shall give evidence of the result of such test"; thereby providing very well for the case of a dispute as to the former test. Then sect. 8 directs that "the temperature at which petroleum gives off an inflammable vapour shall, for the purposes of the Petroleum Acts, be tested in manner set forth in the schedule hereto." Then follows the schedule directing how it shall be done. Next comes the question whether the proper officer to test has tested in the proper manner as described in the schedule. The justices have said that he has. He really applied the test, and the only objection here is, that whereas the Act says "a small flame" shall be applied, a smaller one was used, and whereas the Act says, "The thermometer shall be inserted into the oil, so that the bulb shall be immersed about 1½in. beneath the surface," the person inserting the thermometer did so in such a manner that it quite touched the bottom of the vessel. I cannot think that was deviating from the prescribed mode of testing in such a substantial point as to warrant the conclusion that the inspector was not properly applying the test. If it was so, and an analytical chemist had been called in, the magistrates would have quashed the conviction. I cannot think the magistrates were wrong in coming to the conclusion that the test was properly applied, and I am therefore of opinion that the conviction was right.

BOWDITCH (app.) v. THE WAKEFIELD LOCAL BOARD OF HEALTH (resps.)

Public Health Act 1848—Assessment of owner for works done under sect. 69—Charity school—Trustee—Owner.

A charity school was established in Wakefield on premises granted under the provisions of the 4 & 5 Vict. c. 38 (an Act to afford Facilities for the Conveyance and Endowment of Sites for Schools), of which the appellant was a trustee, receiving no rent, and deriving no profit therefrom. The Local Board of Health of Wakefield, acting under sect. 69 of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63 Public Health Act 1848), gave proper notice that certain works therein mentioned should be done in a street upon which the school abutted, which works not being effected the board themselves did them, and charged the expenses to the appellant as "owner," as described by the 2*nd section* (interpretation clause) of the said Public Health Act 1848:

Held, that they were justified in so doing.

THIS was a case stated by the justices of the borough of Wakefield, under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, upon an order made by them upon the appellant to pay the sum of 44*l.* 6s. It appeared that complaint had been made against the appellant for the nonpayment of the foregoing sum, which the respondents claimed as due in respect of expenses incurred by them in the execution of works under sect. 69 of The Public Health Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), in connection with certain premises in the occupation of the appellant. The premises alleged to have been in the occupation of the appellant consisted of a building erected for and used as elementary schools for the education of the poor in the district of St. Andrew, in the parish and borough of Wakefield, and of two dwellings erected for the teachers of the schools abutting upon the street, in respect of which the expenses were incurred. The appellant was one of three trustees, and he held the premises subject to the trusts of a deed which vested the property in the Bishop of ese of Ripon, the Archdeacon of Craven and as incumbent of the ecclesiastical district Andrews, Wakefield, and their successors, for the purposes of the 4 & 5 Vict. c. 38, s. 10, rust to permit the premises and all build- e erected thereon, to be for ever appropriated d as a school for the education of poor per- and in the district of St. Andrews, and for dence of the schoolmaster or schoolmistress aid school, and for no other purpose what- the school to be always in union with the l society for promoting the education of the the principles of the established church, herance of its ends and designs, and to be he direction, &c., of a committee. The hich was dated the 10th November 1845, was i pursuance of the 4 & 5 Vict. c. 38. The it and the other trustees derived no rent or enefit from the property, nor would they any, having no power to let the pre- a tenant, and the premises being incapable let to a tenant.

ct. 69 of the Public Health Act 1848 it is that in case any present or future street, art thereof, be not sewered, levelled, paved, he satisfaction of the local board of health, ard may by notice to the respective owners iers of the premises fronting, adjoining, or upon such parts thereof as may require wered, &c., require them to sewer, &c., the thin a time to be specified in such notice, uch notice be not complied with the said rd may execute the works, and the expenses by them in so doing are to be paid by the in default, according to the frontage of spective premises, &c., and such expenses recovered from the last-mentioned owners mary manner, &c.

2 of the same statute, which is the inter- n clause, says: "The word 'lands' and d 'premises' shall include messuages, s, lands, and hereditaments of any tenure." e word 'owner' shall mean the person for being receiving the rack rent of the lands ises in connection with which the said word whether on his own account or as agent ee for any other person, or who would so he same if such lands or premises were rack rent."

e 4 & 5 Vict. c. 38 (an Act to Afford Facilities for the Conveyance and Endow- Sites for Schools) it is enacted by sect. 2 person being seised in fee simple , . . . any manor or lands of freehold, copyhold, mary tenure, and having the beneficial therein . . . . may grant, convey, or en- . . . . any quantity not exceeding one uch land as a site for a school for the edu- poor persons or for the residence of the aster, or schoolmistress, or otherwise for the of education of such poor persons in and useful knowledge . . . . y appeared for the appellant.—The appel- t liable to be assessed to these charges, as he is neither the owner nor the occupier of them; the premises are, in fact, a charity school, producing no rent, and incapable of producing any. [COCKBURN, C. J.—Do you mean that the school qua school is exempt, or that some one else is liable?] No one, under existing circumstances, is liable. The appellant is not "owner" within the meaning of the interpretation clause, nor does he come within the last part of the description as a person "who would receive the same" (rent) "if such lands or premises were let at a rack rent," since the premises could not be so let. The appellant receives no rent, and cannot possibly receive any, and he has therefore nothing out of which he can pay this demand; if the premises are applied to any other purpose, they revert to the grantor. [LUSH, J.—If you look at the amending Act, the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 98, there is a clause, the 38th, which expressly exempts the minister of any church or chapel or place appropriated to public worship from this liability; and as schools are not mentioned, it is a strong argument that they were not intended to be exempted.] Here there is no income out of which this payment can be made. He is neither the owner in the receipt of rent nor capable of being one. Can it with propriety be said that the appellant is in any sense an owner of these premises? [BLACKBURN, J.—As a trustee, he necessarily incurs some liability, and must have some means of recouping himself.] The term "owner" has hitherto always been applied to some one who can receive a rent or derive a benefit for the premises. He referred to

Angell v. Paddington, L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 714.

Milward, Q.C. (Wills with him.)—The appellant, as trustee, is the legal owner of the premises which, unless they are expressly exempted, are liable to these expenses. It is quite immaterial that they produce no rent in fact. Suppose the application were to be for a poor-rate it would be made to the trustee. [COCKBURN, C.J.—There is certainly some difficulty in saying that this gentleman comes within the definition of an "owner."] As the property is not exempt, there must be some one liable to pay.

Hannay was heard in reply.

BLACKBURN, J. (a). — I think that our judgment must be for the respondent. The burthen of making these works is cast upon the owners of the property having the frontage. The property here consists of premises fronting the street, and the appellant is the trustee, or, in a popular sense, the owner. Now, the interpretation clause says that the word "owner" shall mean the person for the time being, receiving the rack rent of the lands or premises in connection with which the said word is used, whether on his own account or as agent or trustee for any other person, or who would so receive the same if such lands or premises were let at a rack-rent. The clause does not say that the word "owner" shall include such persons, but that it shall mean such persons. Now, it is true that the school cannot be let, yet, if any benefit could arise from it, it would attach to the owner. Therefore, I think the appellant is within the words of the section, and there is no reason why the premises should not bear the burthen. And as to the payment falling upon the trustee, he must get recouped out of the funds, whatever they may be.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. The owners of premises fronting the street are to pay the expenses, and there is no exception of property. In the subsequent Act there is a specific exception from liability in certain cases which does not include the present one. I cannot read the Act without thinking that the appellant comes within the description of "owner."

LUSH, J.—The statute upon which the case of Angell v. The Paddington Vestry was decided, was very different to this. The appellant here is undoubtedly an owner within the meaning of the Act, and it is no answer for him to say that he has accepted an office which forbids him from letting the premises.

FLIGHT (app.) v. THE VESTRY OF ST. GEORGE THE MARTYR, SOUTHWARK (resps.)

Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings Act 1868—Reports of medical officer of health and the surveyor—Including a row of houses in one report—Particulars of defects.

By the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 130 (The Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings Act 1868) ss. 5 & 6, if the officer of health finds that any premises are in a condition or state dangerous to health, so as to be unfit for human habitation, he is to report the same to the local authority, and the local authority are to refer such report to a surveyor or engineer, who is thereupon to consider such report, and to report to the local authority what is the cause of the evil and the remedy, and if such evil is occasioned by defects in any premises, whether the same can be remedied by structural alterations and improvements, or otherwise, or whether such premises or any and what part thereof ought to be demolished.

A medical officer of health reported that certain premises in Marsh's-court, in the parish of St. George the Martyr, Nos. 1 to 12 and 13, were in a condition or state injurious to health, so as to be unfit for human habitation; and upon this report the surveyor reported that he had surveyed the said premises, and was of opinion that the causes of the evil were structural defects in the said premises, and that such defects cannot be remedied by structural alterations or improvements, or otherwise, but such premises ought to be demolished. The whole of the said premises belonged to the appellant. The vestry subsequently made an order that the said premises should be totally demolished.

Held, first, that it was not necessary that there should be a report, and an order in respect of each house, but that one report and one order were, under the circumstances, sufficient; secondly, that as the report of the surveyor stated that the structural defects could not be remedied, but that the premises ought to be demolished, it was unnecessary to specify in detail in what the structural defects consisted.

THIS was an appeal against an order of the respondents under the provisions of the Artisans' and Labourers' Dwellings Act 1868 for the demolition of certain houses the property of the appellant, situate in the parish of St. George the Martyr, Southwark, in the county of Surrey, and known as Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13, Marsh's-court.

The appeal was tried at the Midsummer Quarter Sessions for the county of Surrey, and upon the hearing it was proved by the respondents that upon the 16th Nov. 1869 Henry Bateson, doctor of medicine, medical officer of health to the respondents' parish, made in writing and delivered to the clerk to the respondents a report in the words and figures following:

Artizans' and Labourers' Dwelling Act 1868.

To the Vestry of St. George the Martyr, Southwark.

I have to report that I find the premises situate in Marsh's-court, in the parish of St. George the Martyr, Southwark, Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13 are in a condition or state dangerous to health so as to be unfit for "human habitation."

HENRY BATESON, M.D.,
16th Nov. 1869. Medical Officer of Health.

Which report was referred by the respondents to William Berriman, of Buckland House, Wilson-road, Camberwell, surveyor, who thereupon considered the said report, and did on the 13th Dec. report to the respondents as follows—namely:

Having considered the report made to you the said vestry, as the local authority, by Dr. Bateson, in the following terms: [sets out the report] which report was referred to me on the 16th Nov. last, I have to report to you, the said vestry, that I have surveyed the said premises, situate and being Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13, Marsh's-court aforesaid, and I am of opinion, and report accordingly, that the causes of the evil so reported on by Dr. Bateson are structural defects in the said premises, and that such defects cannot be remedied by structural alterations, or improvements, or otherwise, but such premises ought to be wholly demolished.

That upon the 8th March 1870 the respondents made the following order the subject of appeal:—

In the matter of the Artizans' and Labourers' Dwelling Act 1868, and in the matter of premises situate and being Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13 Marsh's-court, in the parish of St. George the Martyr, Southwark, in the county of Surrey.

Whereas in pursuance of the above-named Act, Henry Bateson, doctor of medicine, medical officer of health for the above-named parish of St. George the Martyr, Southwark, on the 16th Nov. 1869, made and delivered to the undersigned, Daniel Birt, the clerk to the vestry of the said parish, a report in writing as follows, namely: [sets out the report.]

And whereas on the 16th Nov. 1869, the said vestry referred the said report to William Berriman, of Buckland House, Wilson-road, Camberwell, in the said county of Surrey, surveyor. And whereas the said William Berriman, having considered the said report of the medical officer of health, did on the 13th Dec. 1869, report to the vestry as follows, viz.: [sets out the report referred to.]

And whereas upon receipt of the report of the said William Berriman, the vestry caused copies of both the said reports to be given to John Etherington Welch Rolls, of the Hendree, in the county of Monmouth, Esquire; Joseph Cleaver, of Guildhall-chambers, Basinghall-street, London, surveyor; and Thomas Flight, of Bond-court, Walbrook, London, Esquire, as the owners or owner of the above-named premises, with notice that [after reciting appointments and postponements] the vestry had appointed Tuesday the 1st March, 1870, at seven o'clock in the evening at the Vestry Hall, Borough-road, Southwark aforesaid, for the consideration of the said two reports. And whereas at the time and place last aforesaid, the said John Etherington Welch Rolls, and Joseph Cleaver did not attend, but the said Thomas Flight attended by his solicitor and agent and stated the following objections to the said two reports, namely, first, that Mr. Flight has never received a copy of the report of a surveyor and of an engineer; secondly, that the report of the surveyor is not sufficient inasmuch as it does not state sufficiently explicitly the cause of the evil reported on and the remedy thereof; thirdly, that the premises are not in a condition or state dangerous to health so as to be unfit for human habitation; fourthly, that there are no structural defects upon the said premises; fifthly, that there are no defects upon the premises that cannot be remedied by structural alterations and improvements, or otherwise; and thereupon the vestry having considered the said two reports, and the above-mentioned objections thereto resolved as follows, namely, that the defects in the said premises cannot be remedied by structural alterations or improvements or otherwise, and the said premises require, therefore, to be totally demolished, and the vestry clerk is hereby directed to draw up an order accordingly, to be made by the vestry, and signed by the clerk at the next meeting. Now, therefore, in pursuance of the authority conferred on them by the said above-mentioned Act, the said vestry do by this their order in writing, signed by their clerk, hereby order and direct that the said premises, Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13, Marsh's-court, in the parish of St. George the Martyr, Southwark, in the country of Surrey, be totally demolished. Dated this 8th March 1870.

DANIEL BIRT,
Clerk to the Vestry of the Parish of St. George the Martyr, Southwark, Surrey.

It was further proved by the respondents that the said premises were unfit for human habitation, by reason of structural defects therein, causing unhealthy and defective ventilation, and from the smallness of the rooms.

It was thereupon contended, on behalf of the appellant, that the order of the respondents appealed against was made upon an insufficient and incomplete report of the officer of health, and upon an insufficient and incomplete report of the surveyor, to whom the report of the officer of health was referred, and is bad in law.

The court overruled these objections.

It was then proved by the appellant that the said premises could be rendered fit for human habitation by structural alterations, according to a plan marked C., produced by the appellant and attached to the order of this court.

The court, therefore, made an order that the appellant should carry out the said alterations as set forth in the said plan, and that each party in the appeal should pay his own costs.

The counsel for the appellant requested the court to state the facts specially for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench, and the order of the court was made subject to the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench upon the validity of the respondent's order of the 8th March 1870.

If the court should be of opinion that the respondent's order was good in law, then the order of the Court of Quarter Sessions aforesaid shall stand confirmed; but if the court shall be of a contrary opinion, then the said order shall be quashed, and judgment upon the appeal be given for the appellant, and the order of the respondents be quashed.

By The Artisans' and Labourers' Dwellings Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 130) it is enacted, by sect. 5, that:

If in any place to which this Act applies the officers of health find that any premises therein are in a condition or state dangerous to health, so as to be unfit for human habitation, he shall report the same in manner hereinafter provided to the local authority.

Sect. 6 enacts that:

Every report made under this Act by the officer of health shall be in writing and delivered to the clerk of the local authority, and the local authority shall refer such report to a surveyor or engineer, who shall thereupon consider the report so furnished to him, and report to the local authority what is the cause of the evil so reported on and the remedy thereof, and if such evil is occasioned by defects in any premises, whether the same can be remedied by structural alterations and improvements or otherwise, or whether such premises, or any, and what part thereof ought to be demolished.

By the interpretation clause (sect. 3) the word "premises" means any dwelling house, house, or inhabited building, and the site thereof with the yard, garden, outhouses, and appurtenances belonging thereto or enjoyed therewith.

Robinson, Serjt., and Hurrell, appeared for the respondents in support of the order.—The order of the quarter sessions is good. The sessions had jurisdiction to make a fresh order, and they have in fact altered the order of the board. It is contended on the other side that there should have been a separate order in respect of each house, but there is no reason why this should be so, especially as all the houses are in a row and belong to one owner. [LUSH, J.—I observe that in the 3rd schedule to the Act the order mentions "one or more house or houses, or buildings."]

E. Clarke for the appellant.—There should have been an order in respect of each house, since it might be that it is not every house that is dangerous to health and each house therefore should be pointed out. The interpretation clause states that the word "premises" is to mean any dwelling-house. [LUSH, J.—It does not say "only one house."] It must mean only one house. The officer of health does not say that each house is defective. [MELLOR, J.—He says that all are. This is not a question of special demurrer; we must look at the facts stated in a comprehensive point of view.] The quarter sessions have found differently to the officer of health and the surveyor. The owner has a right to know what is required for each house. [MELLOR, J.—If you are right, Mr. Flight would have required twelve notices. There could have been no use in this, and it would have been a great inconvenience.] He would then at all events have been enabled to have ascertained what repairs each house required. The report moreover is bad, as being too general; it does not state what are the structural defects. The defects themselves ought to be pointed out.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I think the report was quite sufficient. If you find a lot of houses together, all of which are not in the same condition, and the report is intended to apply to some of them only, it should specify which. But in the present case the surveyor intended that his report should apply to all the houses, and he was right, therefore, in so applying it. Then, as regards the objection that the report has not gone sufficiently into detail—that depends upon what he intended to report. If he meant that the whole were equally bad, it would be sufficient to include them in this way. If the surveyor thought that the whole of the premises required demolition, he was quite right in including all in one general report.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with one observation of the counsel for the appellant, that the report of the officer of health is in the nature of an accusation which is referred to the surveyor, who examines into the cause, and according to his judgment he finds that nothing will remedy the defects but their demolition. If he had reported that some particular alterations were requisite he should have stated the nature of those alterations. But as there was, in his judgment, nothing that could be improved, he could have no particulars to state, and he was therefore right.

in reporting generally. Then as to the objection that there should have been a separate report in respect of each house, we should not interpose unnecessary obstacles in carrying out this statute, but should construe it in a liberal manner, and I cannot but think that it would be very unnecessary that there should be separate notices and orders in such a case.

LUSH, J. concurred.

Order of sessions affirmed.

GRIFFITHS v. LONDON AND ELDERSFIELD DRAINAGE BOARD.

24 & 25 Vict. c. 133 (Land Drainage Act 1861) ss. 29, 31, 38—Abortive scheme—Expenses of plans—Rate on occupiers.

The defendants a drainage board, having, under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 133, the powers of commissioners of sewers within their district, contemplated executing some drainage works.

Sect. 29 of the above-mentioned statute enacts, that previously to commencing any improvements in existing works, or any new works which involve an expenditure of more than 1000*l.*, the commissioners shall cause plans of the proposed works, and an estimate of the expense thereof, and of the area of land to be rated for such expense, to be made, and shall publish their intention to execute such works two months before commencing the same.

By sect. 31, if within such period the proprietors of one half of the area of land declare by notice in writing that they are unwilling that such work should be executed, the commissioners shall take no further steps therein.

By sect. 38, "rates may be levied by commissioners of sewers for defraying all costs, charges, and expenses incurred or to be incurred by them . . ." and "a rate . . . for the purposes of defraying the expense of any improvements in existing works, or any new works, when such improvements or new works involve an expenditure of more than 1000*l.*, shall be deemed to be a tax on the owners of property; but, except such special rate, rates leviable by the commissioners shall be payable by the same persons, in respect of the same property, and in the same manner as they are now by law payable."

The defendants caused plans to be prepared, and duly published their intention of making certain new works. The proprietors of one-half the area gave notice that they were unwilling that such work should be executed. The plans, consequently, proved useless, and the expense of preparing them was charged in a general rate on the occupiers, of whom the plaintiff was one. He, being assessed in respect of a house and land, objected to the rate, on the grounds that it should have been an acreage rate on land only, and laid upon the owners:

Held, that as the owners had negatived the proposed scheme, they were not chargeable with the preliminary expenses, which must, therefore, fall on the occupiers, and that the rate was rightly made.

THIS was an action of replevin for taking the plaintiff's horse. The defendants denied the taking, and justified it as a distress, first for a land drainage rate, and, secondly, for a sewers tax. The plaintiff joined issue thereon. The cause which had been removed from the County Court of Gloucestershire into this court was entered for trial at the Spring Assizes 1870, for the County of Gloucester, where by consent the record was withdrawn upon the terms that the questions between the parties should be raised by the following

CASE.

1. The plaintiff is a farmer living at and occupying a house and land (of part of which land, namely, 1 rood 30 perches, as appears in the rate hereinafter set forth, he is the owner) in Elderfield in the County of Worcester. The defendants are a drainage board, incorporated under the provisions of the Land Drainage Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 133), (a) for a separate drainage district comprising lands in several parishes, including the parishes of Longdon and Elderfield in the said counties of Gloucester and Worcester.

2. Previous to 1863, costs, charges, and expenses were incurred by the board in and about the setting out, and surveying, and mapping the land to be included in their drainage district (such survey, plans, &c., were made by Mr. Swinburne), and costs, charges, and expenses were incurred by the Inclosure Commissioners in relation to the issue of the provisional order constituting the drainage board, dated Jan. 28 1863, and obtaining the said local Act confirming same, and there were also other necessary costs, charges, and expenses incurred by the board. The total of such costs,

(a) 24 & 25 Vict. c. 133 (the Land Drainage Act 1861), s. 29, enacts that: "Previously to commencing any improvements in existing works, or any new works where such improvements or new works involve an expenditure of more than 1000*l.* the commissioners shall cause plans of the proposed work, and an estimate of the expense thereof, and of the area within which a rate will require to be levied to meet such expense, to be made, together with a list of the names and addresses of the persons reputed to be proprietors of the land within such last-mentioned area, with the addition of the number of acres of which each person is reputed to be the proprietor, and shall publish their intention to execute such works two months before commencing the same in manner" therein described.

Sect. 31. "If within such period of two months the proprietors of one-half of the area of land within which a rate is, according to the notice, proposed to be levied declare in writing to the commissioners, by notice left at their office, that they are unwilling that such work should be executed, the commissioners shall take no further steps therein; but if no such declaration of dissent is made, the commissioners may, at the expiration of such period of two months, commence the proposed work and repay out of the rates to be levied by them within the area all expenses incurred, not exceeding the estimate published in the notice."

Sect. 38. "The following regulations shall be observed with respect to rates leviable by commissioners of sewers, that is to say, first, as to the purposes of the rate: Rates may be levied by the commissioners of sewers for defraying all costs, charges, and expenses incurred or to be incurred by them under the authority of any Act of Parliament, law, or custom; secondly, as to the incidence of the rates: (1.) A rate levied by commissioners for the purposes of defraying the expense of any improvements in existing works or any new works, where such improvements or new works involve an expenditure of more than 1000*l.*, shall be deemed to be a special rate, and shall be deemed to be a tax on the owner of property; but, except such special rate, rates leviable by the commissioners shall be payable by the same persons, in respect of the same property, and in the same manner as they are now by law payable."

charges, and expenses so incurred did not amount to 450*l*. In 1863 (after incurring such expenses as aforesaid), the defendants employed Mr. J. Bailey Denton, C. E., to survey the lands within their district, and to prepare working maps, plans, specifications, and a report for the purpose of making works for the improvement of the existing drainage works of all the lands within their district, and for providing a general outfall for all such drainage, according to the provisions of the said Acts. Mr. Denton used Mr. Swinburne's survey and completed his own plans, specifications, and report in March 1864, for which the defendants paid him 112*l*., and as the plans, &c., of the improvements contemplated had then caused an expenditure of more than 1000*l*., and the completion of the improvements contemplated in accordance with such plans, &c., would cause an expenditure of about 10,000*l*., the defendants endeavoured to obtain the necessary assent required by the Land Drainage Act 1861 to the cost then incurred, and to such improvements being completed, but within the necessary time the proprietors of more than one-half of the area of land within the said district and within which a rate was proposed to be made, declared in writing in due form to the said defendants, that they were unwilling that such works should be completed in the manner proposed by Mr. Denton and everything happened which was necessary to happen to require that the defendants should take no further steps therein. The defendants necessarily incurred costs, charges, and expenses for, and incident to the matters aforesaid amounting to 2253*l*. 4*s*. 6*d*. in the whole (including the sum paid to Mr. Denton). In the year 1867 the said survey and plans prepared by Mr. Swinburne, and the plans, &c., prepared by Mr. Denton were submitted by the defendants to Mr. Curley, C.E., for the purpose of preparing a scheme of drainage for the said district. Mr. Curley used Mr. Swinburne's survey, and saw Mr. Denton's plans, but made his own plans and prepared a different and much less expensive system of drainage works, which was duly assented to by the requisite number of land owners in the district, and such drainage works have since been executed.

3. In order to provide money to meet the said costs, charges, and expenses so amounting to 2253*l*. 4*s*. 6*d*., as aforesaid, the defendants caused a valuation of the houses, buildings, and lands in the said district to be made, and, on such valuation, made a rate upon all the occupiers of the houses, buildings, and lands in the said district, according to their annual value, at 9*d*. in the pound.

The said rate, which was made on the 25th Feb. 1866, had the following heading:

Longdon and Eldersfield Drainage District, to wit.

A rate and assessment made on all occupiers of lands in the Longdon and Elderesfield drainage district, in the county of Gloucester, according to the quantities and qualities of the estates, for the costs, charges, and expenses incurred by the Longdon and Elderesfield Drainage Board, under the authority of the Land Drainage Act 1861, and the several other Acts of Parliament incorporated therewith, incurred in causing plans and estimates to be prepared of works proposed to be done under, and by virtue of the said Act, and otherwise complying with the said Act with respect to the said works.

Dated this 25th Feb. 1866.

5. The plaintiff, who was only an occupier (and not an owner) of a house and a certain quantity of land, was assessed thereon as occupier, to the said rate at the sum of 8*l*. 6*s*. 11*d*., being at the rate of 9*d*. in the pound on the said valuation of the said house and land according to their annual value, in the following form: [Copy assessment set out. It was in the common tabular form, showing the name of the occupier assessed, the owner, description of property, acreage or extent, annual value, rateable value, sum assessed at 9*d*. in the pound. The plaintiff was therein assessed as "occupier" in the above sum of 8*l*. 6*s*. 11*d*., made up of an item of 4*l*. 1*s*. 5*d*. for house, garden, and orchard, 3*l*. 3*s*. 8*d*. for one meadow, 1*l*. 1*s*. 10*d*. for another, and 5*s*. 10*d*. for a stone quarry.]

6. The plaintiff objected to pay the said rate upon the ground (among others) that it should have been an acreage rate made on land alone, and on the owners, not on the occupiers of land.

7. The plaintiff attended a meeting of the defendants on the 10th April 1866, and then objected to the validity of the rate, and refused to pay the same on the above grounds (among others), but the defendants decided against such objection.

8. The plaintiff, still refusing to pay the rate, was summoned by the defendants who afterwards, on the 15th Oct. 1868, distrained the said horse for the said rate of 8*l*. 12*s*. 9*d*.

9. The plaintiff thereupon replevied the horse. The questions for the opinion of the court were: First, whether the rate should have been an acreage rate? secondly, whether it should have been made upon lands only? thirdly, whether it should have been made upon the owners and not the occupiers of the lands.

Lord, for the plaintiff.—These expenses, being preliminary to improvements which would have cost more than 1000*l*., were such as should have been defrayed by means of a special rate on the owners, and should not fall on the general rates, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 133, s. 38. The rate, moreover, should not have been a valuation, but an acreage rate, and should not have included houses. 23 Hen. 8, c. 5, s. 3, provides that the persons to be taxed for sewers shall be assessed "after the quantity of their lands, tenements, and rents by the number of acres and perches, after the rate of every person's portion, tenure, or profit, or after the quantity of their common of pasture, or profit of fishing or other commodities there." In Com. Dig. "Sewers," E. 2, it is stated that "an order to levy ninepence per acre to be paid to the clerk, to be applied towards defraying charges in and about the execution of the commission, is good: Level of Hull's case (2 Str. 1127.) So in the case of the Isle of Ely (10 Co. 143a), it was resolved that the tax "ought to be according to the quantity of their lands, tenements, and rents, and by the number of acres and perches." There too is express mention of acreage seeming to point to land apart from houses. "And upon this" (Com. Dig. "Sewers," E. 2) "the regular course is, that the jury present the particular quantity of land, or other profit that every one, who may have benefit by the repair or prejudice by the non-repair, has within the level, and thereupon the commissioners make a decree for the assessment of every person in proportion: Cal. 82, 10 Co. 143a."

Denderswell for the defendants.—This expense was incurred for plans which never were available, as the suggested improvements were not even commenced. The surveyor, whose scheme was entertained by the commissioner, never made use of these plans, but prepared new ones entirely different. The statute clearly shows that no obligation is to be imposed on the owners where improvements are of greater cost than 1000*l.* without their consent. Here they did not consent, and therefore are not to be charged with the cost of these abortive and expensive plans.

BLACKBURN, J.—In this case we think our judgment should be for the defendant. The point raised is as to the right of the plaintiff, who has brought an action of replevin, to recover his horse, taken under a distress for nonpayment of a rate. The question to determine is whether that rate is void or not. If void, of course the distress was not good, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover his costs of the replevin. If, on the other hand, the rate is good and not void, however much it might possibly have been reduced in amount on appeal, we must give judgment that the distress was right, although it was for a quantum which, being too great, might have been set right as I say. We have to look at what the rate was for. On its face it is stated to be—"A rate and assessment made on all the occupiers of lands in the Longdon and Eldersfield Drainage district, in the county of Gloucester, according to the quantities and qualities of the estates, for the costs, charges, and expenses incurred by the Longdon and Eldersfield Drainage Board under the authority of the Land Drainage Act 1861, and the several other Acts of Parliament incorporated therewith, incurred in causing plans and estimates of works proposed to be done under and by virtue of the said Act, and otherwise complying with the said Act with respect to the said works." And then the rate itself gives the names of the occupiers assessed, the owners, the description of property, acreage, annual value, rateable value, and the sum assessed at 9*d.* in the pound, the payment of which sum is imposed on the occupiers. One or two objections made in the course of argument may be at once disposed of. It is said that if made under the Lands Clauses Act, the rate ought to be an acreage rate, and ought only to be on the land, and not on the house; but that seems to me to be quite untenable, for the Sewers' Act of Henry VIII. appears from the earliest times to have received the construction that the rate was to be an equal rate on the persons liable according to the benefit they derived from the sewers; and Lord Tenterden, in Rex v. The Commissioners of Sewers for the Tower Hamlets (9 B. & C. 520), speaks of an equal poundage rate. It would be monstrous if the Act had been construed so that the persons should be assessed according to the superficial area of the land drained, but not according to their present value. The present statute directs that the assessment shall be on the rateable value according to that fixed for the poor rates, thereby plainly having regard to the rateable value of the land. Then comes the real question to be determined: What is the rate laid for? For works proposed to be done for improvements in drainage. Now, under the Act the drainage board have the same power to drain as the sewers commissioners had. That brings us back to the powers of the commissioners of sewers, and we see 7 sect. 38 that "rates may be levied by the commissioners of sewers for the purpose of defraying all costs, charges, and expenses incurred or to be incurred by them under the authority of any Act of Parliament, law, or custom; secondly, as to the incidence of the rates, a rate levied by the commissioners for the purposes of defraying the expense of any improvements or new works where such improvements or new works involve an expenditure of more than 1000*l.* shall be deemed to be a special rate, and shall be deemed to be a tax on the owners of property; but, except such special rate, rates leviable by the commissioners shall be payable by the same persons in respect of the same property, and in the same manner as they are now by law payable." That clause enacts plainly enough that where the purposes are such that the rate would come within the definition of a special rate, it shall be "deemed to be a tax on the owners of property." The present rate expresses itself to be in respect of expenditure incurred in causing plans, &c., to be made for works proposed to be done, and the real question is whether those expenses ought to be defrayed by a special rate on the owners of land, or whether they were incurred for the general purposes of the Act, and ought therefore to be defrayed by a general rate on occupiers, in which latter case this rate is good on the face of it, and although the amount of it seems excessive and on appeal the auditors might have disallowed a great part of it as extravagant, at present we can only see whether this expense, whatever it may be, is a matter which ought to fall on the occupiers as a general tax, or on the owners as a special rate. Now it is tolerably clear that if the sum expended cannot be properly levied as a special rate, it must be recoverable as a general rate to fall on the occupiers. Therefore, it was requisite for the plaintiff's argument to show that the expenses were such as would fall on a special rate; and the difficulty presenting itself is, that the Legislature has used language which is not very explicit, and leads me to the conclusion that they were not thinking of this particular thing when they used it. In sect. 29 it is enacted that "Previously to commencing any improvements in existing works, or any new works where such improvements or new works involve an expenditure of more than 1000*l.*, the commissioners shall cause plans of the proposed work, and an estimate of the expense thereof, and of the area within which a rate will be required to be levied to meet such expense, to be made, together with a list of the names and addresses of the persons reputed to be the proprietors of the land within such last mentioned area, with the addition of the number of acres of which each person is reputed to be the proprietor, and shall publish their intention to execute such works two months before commencing the same in manner following." It is plain that there the Legislature directed that the local board of drainage—(the commissioners—as the board was then constituted)—before commencing works, shall make plans of the proposed works and an estimate of the expenses thereof, and it would almost follow that before commencing such works they should sit down and calculate the cost. But this Act most clearly says it is a part of their duty. They are to do this and to publish their intention to execute such works; then by sect. 31, "If within . . . two months the proprietors of one half of the area of land within which a rate is according to the notice proposed to be levied declare in writing to the commissioners . . . that they are unwilling that such work should be executed, the commissioners shall take no further steps therein." That was the event which happened here. Then the section proceeds: "But if no such declaration of dissent is made the commissioners may at the expiration of such period of two months commence the proposed work, and repay out of the rates to be levied by them within the area all expenses incurred, not exceeding the estimate published in the notice." Now had the majority of proprietors not intimated their dissent the board would have gone on to execute the work, and then would have been clearly entitled to recover the expenses incurred which did not exceed the estimates. It is not now necessary ot decide whether all the matters in the statement could have been included in the expenditure—speaking for myself only, I should say that most of the works were necessary. But these preliminary expenses were absolutely necessary for the execution of the proposed works, and might have been charged on the rate. We need not, however, inquire into that, as machinery is provided by sect. 31 for the payment of preliminary expenses where there has been no dissent, and the scheme has been carried out; there is an express statement that they are to be repaid out of the rates to be levied within the area. Then comes the question what is to be done with respect to abortive preliminary expenses. I cannot but consider that where the work is done the expenses fall on the owners, but where the owners do not come in and concur in the work being done those expenses are to fall on the ordinary rate, subject to auditors looking into the matter, or to any extravagant expenditure being disallowed on appeal when those by whom it was incurred must defray it themselves. But in this case whatever might be done by auditors or quarter sessions does not come into question in the present proceedings. The matter for us to determine is whether the expenses of preparing plans for works proposed, but not carried out were such as the board could charge in a general rate, or in a special rate on the owners only. For the reasons above given I think such expenses must be defrayed by a general rate, and therefore that the rate in question is good on the face of it, and that the defendants had jurisdiction to make it.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is unnecessary to decide whether, if the works had been done, the preliminary expenses might have been added and made a charge on the owners, or whether the expense of these plans must be considered part of the prescribed 1000*l.*, for I come to the conclusion that where the works are not done, as here, these preliminary expenses are not chargeable upon the owners of the lands. Now general expenses are chargeable on the occupiers. These, however, were preliminary expenses for laying a scheme before the owners; and it is only where they exceed 1000*l.* that the commissioners are to charge the owners at all. Then by the 31st section, before the owners are chargeable they must be consenting parties to the execution of the works, because after the scheme is laid before them, "if within the period of two months, the proprietors of one half of the area of land within which a rate is, according to the notice, proposed to be levied, declare in writing to the commissioners, by notice left at their office, that they are unwilling that such work should be executed, the commissioners shall take no further steps therein." There the evident intention of the Legislature is that the owners shall not be chargeable except in cases where the works involve an expenditure of more than 1000*l.*, and then only if half the number of proprietors assent to the work being done, but they are not to be chargeable without their consent. In all other cases the expense must be defrayed by a rate on the occupiers. Therefore, I come to the conclusion, that as this expenditure was incurred in respect of works which were not done, the owners having dissented, that the owners are not chargeable with the preliminary expenses, which must consequently be paid by a rate on the occupiers.

HANNEN, J.—I am also of the same opinion. I think it was in the highest degree improbable that such a state of things as is now under our consideration was not contemplated by the Legislature, for when the second division of sect. 38 is looked at, it seems clear that the only contingencies justifying the making of a special rate is when the improvements or new works themselves involve an expenditure of more than 1000*l.*, and therefore until there has been an execution of the works themselves the cause of imposing a special rate has not arisen; and consequently, as the case is not brought within the particular words of the second division of sect. 38, it must be within the first part of it, and the commissioners must be provided with funds to defray this particular expenditure by means of a general, as distinguished from a special, rate.

BAIL COURT.

Reported by JOHN ROSE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

June 10 and 12, 1871.

REG. v. THE JUSTICES OF DERBYSHIRE.

Order of removal — Appeal — "Next practicable sessions"—Appellant's delay—Reg. v. The Justices of Sussex (11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 740).

It is for the justices at quarter sessions to decide on the facts, in the first instance, whether an appeal against an order of removal has, or has not been brought at the next practicable sessions after notice of the order has been received by the appellants; and mere proof that there has been some delay on the part of the appellants in taking steps to avoid the order does not preclude the justices from exercising their discretion in the matter, nor compel them to dismiss the appeal.

Reg. v The Justices of Sussex (11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 740), cited and considered.

RULE calling on the justices of Derbyshire to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue commanding them to enter continuances and hear an appeal against an order of removal.

The order was made on the 6th and received by the appellants on the 8th Dec. 1870. Upon the 24th of the same month they applied for a copy of the depositions, which they obtained on the 28th.

Upon the 7th Jan. 1871 they gave notice of appeal for the Easter Sessions, to be holden on the following 4th April, and on the 18th March served their grounds of appeal.

At the hearing of the appeal the respondent contended that according to the case of Reg v. Justices of Sussex, the Epiphany Sessions, which had been held on the 3rd Jan. 1871, were the next practicable sessions, and that the appeal should have been entered and respited, or tried at those sessions.

The court were of that opinion, and dismissed the appeal. The counsel for the appellants thereupon indorsed his brief thus: "The Court decide that the case of Reg v. Sussex precludes them from exercising any discretion as to hearing the appeal, and deciding whether these are the next practicable sessions;" and the chairman of quarter sessions expressed his approval of that indorsement as correctly conveying the ground upon which the refusal was based. A letter of the clerk of the peace from which it also appeared that the justices declined to hear the appeal on the above ground, was by consent read as evidence, during the following arguments:

11 & 12 Vict. c. 31, s. 7, enacts that "no appeal shall be allowed against any order of removal, if notice of such appeal be not given as required by law, within the space of twenty-one days after the notice of chargeability and statement of the grounds of removal shall have been sent by the overseers or guardians of the removing parish to the overseers or guardians of the parish to which such order shall be directed, unless within such period of twenty-one days, a copy of the depositions shall have been applied for as aforesaid by the last-mentioned overseers or guardians, in which case a further period of fourteen days after the sending of such copy shall be allowed for the giving of such notice of appeal." . . .

By 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 91, s. 81, the grounds of appeal must be served fourteen days at least before the first day of the sessions.

Henry James, Q.C., and J. W. Mellor showed cause.—The appeal might have been tried at the Epiphany sessions, and ought at least to have been entered and respited at those sessions, which were the next practicable sessions after the service of the notice of chargeability and statement of the grounds of removal. In Reg. v. The Justices of Sussex (11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 740; 34 L. J. 69, M. C.), it was held that the appellants have not by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 31, s. 9, twenty-one days, plus the fourteen days after the delivery of the depositions, for giving notice of appeal absolutely, so as to entitle them as of right to have the appeal entered and respited, if after those days have expired, there does not remain enough time before the sessions to deliver an effective notice of appeal according to the practice of the sessions, and the sessions may, in their discretion, refuse to respite if they deem that the appellants have been guilty of unreasonable delay in giving their notice of appeal. Here there was certainly unreasonable delay in allowing sixteen days to elapse before applying for a copy of the depositions and in giving notice of appeal. This court may review the decision of the justices, as in the Liverpool United Gas Light Company v. The Overseers of Everton (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 813; 40 L. J. 104, M. C.), and should it is submitted, decide that under the circumstances the appeal ought to have been entered at the Epiphany sessions, and was in fact brought too late.

Adams, Q. C. and Buszard, in support of the rule.—The justices were in error when they supposed that all discretion was taken from them by Reg v. The Justices of Sussex. That case did not prescribe an inflexible rule, but left the justices free to decide upon the facts what were the next practicable sessions whereat the appeal might be heard. The facts then show clearly that there was not the full period allowed by statute between the notice of removal and the Epiphany sessions, and therefore, the appellants had a right to go to the next practicable sessions, viz., Easter.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 11.—HANNEN, J.—I have looked at the case of Reg v. The Justices of Sussex, cited and relied on for the respondent, and I have arrived at the conclusion that this rule must be made absolute. The justices evidently proceeded on the assumption that they were bound by the decision in Reg. v. Justices of Sussex, and were thereby precluded from entering upon the consideration as to whether the Epiphany sessions were, in fact, the next practicable sessions or otherwise. That is shown by the note upon the brief of the counsel who represented the appellants, and by the letter of the clerk of the peace. But the justices were mistaken in their view. It was for them to decide whether the Epiphany sessions were the next sessions practicable for the trial of the appeal, and the above-mentioned case in no way prevented them from determining that question. If I could plainly see that the Epiphany were the next practicable sessions, I should not let the mandamus go, but I am unable to satisfy myself upon that point, It depends on matters of which the justices are the proper judges, but which were not gone into. By making this rule absolute the whole question will arise before the justices again, when they can inquire into the present question.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

Tuesday, Aug. 22, 1871.

(Before Mr. Serjeant Cox.)

REG. v. TAYLOR AND SMITH.

Conspiracy—Evidence.

Prisoners were indicted for conspiring to commit larceny. A second count charged an attempt to commit a larceny.

The evidence was that the two prisoners, with another boy, were seen by a policeman to sit together on some doorsteps near a crowd, and when a well-dressed person came up to see what was going on, one of the prisoners made a sign to the others, and two of them got up and followed the person into the crowd. One of them was seen to lift the tail of the coat of a man, as if to ascertain if there was anything in the pocket, but making no visible attempt to pick the pocket, and to place a hand against the dress of a woman but no actual attempt to insert the hand into the pocket was observed. Then they returned to the door-step and resumed their seats. They repeated this two or three times. There was no proof of any preconcert, other than this proceeding:

Held, not to be sufficient evidence of a conspiracy.

Serjt. Cox.—There is no evidence either nspiracy or of an attempt to steal. To con- an attempt, some act must be done towards nplete offence. Feeling a coat-tail to ascer- there is anything in the pocket is not an pt to do the act of picking a pocket, for it may nothing was found to be in it, and therefore d not proceed to the commission of the act and if there was nothing in the pocket, even g the hand into it has been held not to be mpt to steal. JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

Reported by DOUGLAS KINGSFORD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Nov. 14 and 15, 1870, and Feb. 11, 1871.

(Present: the Right Hon. the ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY, the LORD CHANCELLOR, Lord CHELMSFORD, and Sir R. PHILLIMORE.)

NOBLE v. VOYSEY (Clerk).

Heresy—Atonement—Incarnation — Justification—Divinity of Christ—Revelation—Authority of the Bible — Sentence — Canons of construction — Opinions of divines.

In proceeding against the appellant, a clergyman of the Church of England, Held, heresy to have maintained in a book written and published by him: First, that Christ did not make a reconciliation for sin; that he was not made a sacrifice to reconcile God to men; and that there was no need for any such sacrifice, nor any place for such in the purpose of God; secondly, that Christ did not bear the punishment due to men's sins, nor suffer in their stead; thirdly, that men are not by nature children of God's wrath; that men are not under a curse; that there is no curse to be removed by the shedding of the innocent blood of Christ; that the doctrine of the fall of man is contrary to the teaching of Christ; fourthly, that mankind needs no justification, or that salvation is not through justification; and that justification by faith is contrary to the teaching of Christ; fifthly, that Christ is no more Very God of Very God, begotten not made, than men are; that the worship of Christ is idolatry; that the idea of the incarnation of Christ takes its rise in unbelief; that the expected return of Christ to judge the world is an unreasonable belief; that the worship of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost is the worship of three Gods; and that the belief in the Godhead of the Son and the Holy Ghost as expressed in the Nicene Creed weakens and disguises the belief in one God, the Father; sixthly, that revelation of a knowledge of God by means of any book is impossible, and that the only true revelation is through the heart of man; that in the Holy Scriptures there are many irreconcileable contradictions; that the authority of the Gospel according to St. John is doubtful, and ought not to be applied to establish any doctrine; and that the said Gospel represents Christ as speaking words which he never spoke, and which, if spoken, could not have been believed.

These charges having been proved, the Judicial Committee pronounced sentence of deprivation, with an opportunity to the defendant to retract his errors within a week.

The canons of construction, applicable in charges of heresy, as laid down in decided cases, while they allow to the party accused a fair and reasonable latitude of opinion with reference to conformity of the defendant's language with the Articles and Formularies of the Church, afford no sanction to the suggestion that unless the defendant use language in contradiction totidem verbis of the Articles, he may express opinions repugnant to or inconsistent with the clear construction of the Articles.

Quotations from divines may be used for the purpose of showing that the doctrine in question has been held without offence, but not for the purpose of showing that other heretical doctrines, not the subject of charge, have been maintained by divines, against whom no proceedings for heresy have been taken.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Chancery Court of York (reported in 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 169) in a cause of heresy promoted by the respondent against the appellant.

The Judicial Committee having admitted the articles to proof, retained the cause at the request of both parties (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 822), and proceeded to hear the case on the merits.

Sir J. D. Coleridge, Q.C. (Solicitor-General), Sir R. Palmer, Q.C., Archibald and Cowie, for the promoter, cited:

The Gorham Case, Brod. & F. 96;
Bishop of Salisbury v. Williams, and Fendal v. Wilson, 2 Moo. P. C., N. S. 375; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 727, 9 Id. 787;
Heath v. Burder, 15 Moo. P. C. 1; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 563;
R. v. Carlile, 3 B. & Ald. 161;
R. v. Williams, 26 St. Tr. 654;
Godolphin's Ecclesiastical Law, 562.

The defendant (the Rev. Charles Voysey), in person, contended that he had not exceeded the limits of that liberty of belief which previous decisions had established. Further, on all the doctrines alleged to have been impugned by himself, eminent divines of unimpeached orthodoxy had departed from the sense and spirit, and in some instances contradicted the words, of the Articles and Creeds. The fact that these divines had not been prosecuted for heresy was at least evidence of the practice of the Church in favour of freedom of opinion. The appellant proceeded to cite various passages from the works of the Archbishop of York, Dean Stanley, Rev. F. D. Maurice, Archbishop Whately, Canon Liddon, Canon Kingsley, Dr. Pusey, Rev. J. Ll. Davies and other modern divines. In the course of these citations,

Lord CHELMSFORD observed that he understood these opinions to be quoted merely to show the freedom with which other clergymen had dealt with the Articles and Formularies, and that the defendant therefore claimed for himself a like latitude.

The Defendant: That is precisely my object.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE: The course we usually allow is that opinions similar to those of the defendant are quoted. But it would be unfair to accept the citation of opinions of divines on other points than those the subject of the charge.

The LORD CHANCELLOR: In Burder v. Heath (ubi sup.) quotations were allowed with the view of showing that "the doctrine in question had been held without offence by other divines of the Church." But when the issue to be tried is the alleged violation of certain specified Articles of Religion, the quotation of passages to show that other persons had advanced views inconsistent with other and distinct Articles of Religion serves no useful purpose, and could only launch the court on a wide inquiry, leading to no result. It would be impossible to try the case of all these persons behind their backs.

The Solicitor-General replied, after an intimation from the Lord Chancellor that the opinions cited were beside the issue, and that he might confine his reply to the question whether the defendant had contravened the Articles of Religion in the passages set out in the articles of charge.

Feb. 11.—Judgment was delivered by the LORD CHANCELLOR (who, after stating the previous proceedings, and the substance of the articles of charge, proceeded): — The charges, therefore, against the appellant are thirteen in number, which may be arranged under the following classes: 1. Alleged errors concerning the reconciliation of God to man by the sacrifice or propitiation of Our Lord Jesus Christ, and as to the necessity of such reconciliation. 2. Alleged errors as to the Incarnate Godhead of Our Lord, and the doctrine of the Holy Trinity. 3. Alleged errors as to the authority of the Scriptures or Holy Writ. Before examining the charges and comparing the proofs adduced from the appellant's publications with the charges founded thereon, and with the Articles and Formularies of the Church alleged to have been contravened, it will be well to enunciate briefly the rules of judicial exposition with reference to the Articles and Formularies of the Church. In this respect we have the guidance of previous and recent decisions of this tribunal expressed in clear and definite language. In the cases arising on the work called Essays and Reviews (Williams v. Bishop of Salisbury, and Wilson v. Fendall, 2 Moo. P. C., N. S., 425; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S, 727; 9 Id. 787), Lord Westbury, in delivering the opinion of the committee said, "Our province is, on the one hand, to ascertain the true construction of those Articles of Religion and Formularies referred to in each charge according to the legal rules for the interpretation of statutes and written instruments; and, on the other hand, to ascertain the plain grammatical meaning of the passages which are charged as being contrary to or inconsistent with the doctrine of the Church ascertained in the manner we have described." But it is to be observed, that in inquiries of the nature now before us, the committee is not compelled, as in cases affecting the right to property, to affix a definite meaning to any given Article of Religion the construction of which is fairly open to doubt, even should the committee itself be of opinion (on argument) that a particular construction was supported by the greater weight of reasoning. Thus, Lord Stowell, in the case of Her Majesty's Procurator v. Stone (1 Consist. 428), thus expresses himself: "I think myself bound, at the same time, to declare that it is not the duty or inclination of this court to be minute and rigid in applying proceedings of this nature, and that if any Article is really a subject of dubious interpretation it would be highly improper that this court should fix on one meaning, and prosecute all those who hold a contrary opinion regarding its interpretation. It is a very different thing where the authority of the Articles is totally eluded, and the party deliberately declares the intention of teaching doctrines contrary to them." We have thought it right to refer to the canons of construction thus judicially expressed, because on the one hand they allow to the party accused a fair and reasonable latitude of opinion with reference to his conformity to the Articles and Formularies of the Church, and on the other they afford no sanction whatever to the contention of Mr. Voysey, that unless there be found in the publication complained of a contradiction totidem verbis, of some passage in the Articles, he is at liberty to hold, or rather to publish, opinions repugnant to or inconsistent with their clear construction. As regards those Articles of Religion as to the construction of which a reasonable doubt exists, the question may arise how far opinions of a similar character to those charged to be heretical have been held by eminent divines without challenge or molestation, because the proof of their having been so held may tend to show the bona fides of the doubt. In this respect also we have ample guidance from authority: and it will be found that where the Article in question is subject to reasonable doubt, and eminent divines have held opinions similar to those impugned in the case before the court, that circumstance alone has been held to be of great weight in inducing the court to allow a similar latitude of construction to the party accused, without itself deciding upon the construction of the Articles. Thus, in the case of Williams v. The Bishop of Salisbury (ubi sup.), the judgment of the committee contains this passage: "It is obvious that there may be matters of doctrine on which the Church has not given any definite rule or standard of faith or opinion; there may be matters of religious belief on which the requisition of the Church may be less than Scripture may seem to warrant; there may be very many matters of religious speculation and inquiry on which the Church may have refrained from pronouncing any opinion at all. On matters on which the Church has prescribed no rule there is so far freedom of opinion that they may be discussed without penal consequences. Nor in a proceeding like the present are we at liberty to ascribe to the Church any rule or teaching which we do not find expressly and distinctly stated, or which is not plainly involved in or to be collected from that which is written." To proceed, then, to the particular offences charged to have been committed by Mr. Voysey. In the passages cited from his publication called The Sling and the Stone, in the 7th, 8th, and 9th articles of charge, he is alleged to have maintained the following positions: —1. That Christ has not made an atonement or reconciliation for sin, and has not been made a sacrifice to reconcile the Father to us: (10th art. of charge.) 2. That there is no need of any atonement or sacrifice, nor any place for such in the purpose of God: (11th art. of charge.) 3. That Christ did not bear the punishment due to our sins, nor suffer in our stead, and that to think that he did, or that it was necessary that he should suffer, is the most revolting of all the popular beliefs: (12th art. of charge). The 13th article of charge we have rejected. Now, the 2nd Article of Religion expressly asserts that Christ "truly suffered, was crucified, dead, and buried to reconcile His Father to us, and to be a sacrifice, not only for original guilt, but also for all actual sins of men." The 15th Article of Religion declares that Christ "came to be the Lamb without spot, who, by sacrifice of Himself once made, should take away the sins of the world." And the 31st Article of Religion declares that "The offering of Christ once made is that perfect redemption, propitiation, and satisfaction for all the sins of the whole world, both original and actual, and that there is none other satisfaction for sin but that alone." We cannot doubt that these lastly-mentioned Articles of Religion assert in plain language that Christ was crucified to reconcile His Father to us (that is, to mankind), and was a sacrifice, and that He came by the sacrifice of Himself to take away the sins of the world—that the offering of Himself once made, is a perfect "propitiation and satisfaction for the sins of the whole world"—and that there is none other satisfaction for sin but that alone. Neither can we doubt that it is plainly inconsistent with such statements to say that Christ has not made a reconciliation for sin, or has not been made a sacrifice to reconcile His Father to us; or that there is no need for any sacrifice, nor any place for such in the purpose of God. It will only remain, then, to inquire as to the first two charges against Mr. Voysey, whether he has in the passages of his work cited in that behalf, asserted the propositions therein charged. Before doing so it may be well, however, to observe that when the Articles of Religion speak of sacrifice and of oblation, and speak also of Christ being the Lamb without spot, and of His offering of Himself being a perfect satisfaction, and further allege that there is none other satisfaction for sin but that alone,—it is impossible to construe the word "sacrifice" in any other sense than that in which it is ordinarily used, viz., as an offering to God—and that as such offering Christ's sacrifice is alleged to be a satisfaction, and the only satisfaction, for the sins of the world. Let us consider, then, the following passages in the appellant's publication, as cited in the articles of charge:— "He" (meaning the Saviour) "never hinted at such a doctrine as that of the Fall of Man, or the Atonement by sacrifice, or Justification by Faith. He never taught that men needed to be accounted righteous before God, or needed any mediator to propitiate his wrath, or to draw them to Himself. All these notions were Jewish, and Christ never gave any sanction or encouragement to them that I have been able to discover." And, again "Sincere sorrow for sin is, or ought to be, enough to make a man quite reconciled and at peace with God; at least so our Lord teaches. We do not, therefore, need any atonement or justification We need no atonement, for God requires none. We do not want to be justified, we do not want to be accounted righteous at all when we are not righteous; we only desire to be made righteous in God's good time. We seek reconciliation with God as a sorrowful and guilty son seeks reconciliation with a father: 'I will arise and go to my Father,' &c. The Father in heaven receives and embraces us, only with a compassion more tender, and a love more divine and inexhaustible. So we leave these Pauline doctrines for those who need them, thanking our heavenly Father that through His Son Jesus Christ we have learnt a better and surer way to that peace of God which passeth all understanding. . . . . The majority of Christians, though fast tending to a change in their views, still maintain, like the Christianised Jews of the first century, a belief in a God who requires sacrifice—actual bloodshedding—mediation instead of personal communion with the sinner, and is the God only of a chosen people; who loves the few that shall be saved, and leaves the rest to be damned, and who only loves and saves the few because Christ had died for them as their sacrifice. . . . . To us God is a Father, and we are His children; and if this be true it sweeps away the dusty cobwebs of mediation, intercession, sacramental sacrifice, and all the sacred and consecrated follies which grow out of it. We want neither altar nor sacrifice, neither victim nor priest, no sprinkling of blood, no fumes of burning incense to render our approach to the mercy-seat of God more reverent or more successful. . . . . I must own, however, that while I thoroughly and heartily embrace the truth that Christ is our example, I cannot so readily embrace what is often understood by the statement that he is a sacrifice for sin. In one sense, Christ was indeed a sacrifice. His life was sacrificed to the bigotry and blind malice of chief priests in Judea. He was a sacrifice, too, in the sense of laying Himself open to persecution by an honest discharge of his duty, and in not trying to escape trouble by a violation of principle. Sin, too, caused His death, as it was sinful to bear malice towards one so innocent and good, and still more sinful to put Him to death for the claim which He made for Himself and for us all—that God was His Father and our Father, and we are His sons. But in what sense the death of Jesus Christ was a substitute for the punishment of your sins or mine I cannot discover. Theologians may be right, but until I can see reasonable ground for their opinion, I must keep my own. I can surely see and thankfully confess that His death has done me good, that his sacrifice has been most beneficial to the world in teaching and encouraging true heroism, true manliness, and true obedience to God's will. Had He not been martyred for the truths which He taught, those truths would probably have been far longer in making their way among men; and England, at this hour, might still have been in Pagan darknes. But then I know that this is not the common meaning of the words 'Christ suffered for us,' and I do not wish to pretend to put that meaning on them while I am using them in a totally different sense." We think that the expressions contained in these passages, and particularly in the last extract, cannot be reconciled with the teaching of the 2nd, 15th, and 31st Articles of Religion as regards Christ being crucified to reconcile the Father to us—and the necessity of a sacrifice for sin—and we hold, therefore, that the 10th and 11th articles of charge are proved against the appellant. As regards the third charge against the appellant, contained in the 12th article of charge, namely, that he has asserted "that Christ did not bear the punishment due to our sins, nor suffer in our stead and for us, and that to think that He did, or that it was necessary he should so suffer, is infinitely erroneous and dishonouring to God, and is the most revolting of all the popular beliefs,"—we may remark that the somewhat uncharitable denunciation by the appellant of all who may happen to differ from him in holding this popular belief, is not the substance of the charge. The question is, whether it be or not, consistent with the Articles of Religion to deny that Christ bore the punishment due to our sins, or suffered in our stead. We think that to deny this statement without any qualification is inconsistent with the plain meaning of the 2nd and the 15th Articles of Religion already cited; the latter of which Articles is headed, "Of the one Oblation of Christ finished on the Cross," and proceeds to describe that offering to be the perfect redemption, propitiation, and satisfaction for the sins of the whole world. In these Articles also our Lord is described as without spot, i. e., sinless, and as suffering the painful death of the cross, which is styled His offering of Himself, and the result of his suffering so offered is said to be the redemption, propitiation, and satisfaction for all the sins of the whole world, both original and actual. It is not consistent with such statements to aver without any qualification that He did not bear the punishment due to our sins, nor suffer in our stead. The passage we have lastly cited is one in which the appellant might seem to us to admit that he contravenes the Articles of Religion, for he fairly says that the common meaning of the words "Christ suffered for us" is totally different from the sense in which he uses those words. Had the appellant spoken less explicitly, we should have been disposed to regard his denial of the doctrine in question as having reference to some exaggerated statement respecting Christ having borne in hell the punishment due to man's sin; and even as it is, we are not unwilling to give the appellant the benefit of this doubt. In considering these first three charges, as in the consideration of those that follow, we have been most anxious to arrive at a fair construction of Mr. Voysey's writings, not only by examining the context which he has referred to as bearing on the passages cited, but also by attentively considering whether any previous writer, himself in Holy Orders, has been allowed, with impunity, to assert opinions similar to those of the appellant, so as to afford reasonable ground for holding that the appellant has merely availed himself of the privilege of adopting a possible interpretation of the language of the Articles, although it may appear to us that such interpretation is not sound or correct. But we can find nothing of the kind. The appellent, indeed, constantly refers to his views as being different from generally received doctrine, and he does not in his book, nor has he in his argument, cited any authority of divines holding views corresponding with his own. He founds, indeed, his argument mainly on the denial of original sin, or any original curse occasioned thereby, which assertions form the subject of other articles of charge; and if such be not a correct view of the meaning of the Articles of Religion, it is not surprising that the consequences he has derived from this doctrine should be equally inconsistent with them. We have not, however, forgotten to observe, that a considerable portion of the appellant's arguments in his writings is directed against special views of vicarious punishment and imputed righteousness which many divines have held, and which many other divines have considered exaggerated and unreasonable. If he had confined himself to such arguments as he might think fairly adducible in explanation of the doctrine enunciated in the Articles of Religion as to Christ suffering for sin, and offering Himself as a lamb without spot for all sins original and actual of the whole world, and being crucified in order to reconcile us to His Father, then he would be entitled to claim a latitude of interpretation which has been allowed to others; but he does not profess to interpret, he simply denies the position asserted in the Articles, and asserts other doctrines inconsistent with and repugnant to them. We now proceed to consider the fourth and fifth charges made against the appellant, viz., his alleged assertion "that mankind are not by nature born in sin and the children of God's wrath, and are not separated from God by sin, and under His wrath, or under a curse, and that they are not in danger of endless suffering, nor is there any curse to remove by the shedding of the innocent blood of Christ, and that the doctrine of the fall of man is contrary to the teaching of Jesus Christ," contrary, it is contended, to the 2nd and 9th Articles of Religion (see 7th article of charge); and again, "That mankind need no ment or justification, that salvation is not gh justification, and that the doctrine of justi- on by faith is contrary to the teaching of Jesus t," which is alleged to contravene the 2nd and Articles of Religion: (see 18th art. of charge). the 2nd Article of Religion asserts that the suffered to reconcile the Father to us and to sacrifice not only for original guilt, but also l actual sins of men;" and the 9th Article of ion in treating of "original or birth sin" says "it standeth not in the following of Adam but that it is the fault and corruption of man that naturally is engendered of the ing of Adam, whereby man is very far gone original righteousness, and therefore, in person born into the world it deserveth God's and damnation." We think that the plain ing of the 9th Article is to assert the exist- of original or birth sin, and to state that sin exists in every one descended from Adam; by it every man is very far gone from original ousness; and that this sin "deserves God's and damnation." To assert, therefore, that en are not by nature children of God's —that they are not separated from Him by or under His wrath, appears to us plainly sistent with the express language of the es of Religion. It being also expressly laid that Christ suffered to reconcile the Father , and to be a sacrifice for original sin, it rs to us to be in contradiction to such ents to say that we are not under a curse, and here is no curse to remove by the shedding e innocent blood of Christ. To assert also he doctrine of the fall of man is contrary to eaching of Jesus Christ, whereas the 9th e plainly asserts the doctrine, appears to us ntradict the Article. The question how far ial of the doctrine, that man being born in therefore an inheritor of endless suffering, y contradicts the Articles, may be open to more doubt, regard being had to the decision leon v. Fendall on the subject of assertions milar character with regard to the duration punishment of the wicked; but with this ion it appears to us to be clear, that if the charge be, in fact, established by the appel- writings, the offences therein alleged would ences against the law ecclesiastical. Do, the extracts set out in the 15th and 16th s of the charge bear out the charge? The ant in the first of these extracts says, by f censure of the opinion, "St. Paul said y that the whole human race should be set om the curse in consequence of what Christ ed—'As in Adam all die, so in Christ shall made alive;'" and in the following extract s, after citing the opinions of Augustine and ton, "And though St. Paul's doctrine is the merciful, yet it leaves the mind aghast at icture of God's cursing the whole race of nd, and only removing that curse after appeased by the shedding of innocent blood. f course, was simple Judaism, with a little genuine Gospel mixed up with it—an im- advance on the pre-existing views, but still ry far, from the sublime teaching of our himself." The following extract should also sidered: "He therefore (meaning the le St. Paul) succeeded in teaching many, Jews and Gentiles, who had superstitious sacrifice in common, to believe that the death of Christ was a sufficient atonement for the sins of the whole world; and that it appeased the wrath of God entirely, and cancelled the curse against mankind. The arguments used by the Apostle might satisfy the Jews, but could scarcely satisfy us; as, for instance, when he says, 'Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us,' and because He was crucified, he quotes from some Jewish record that 'cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree,' as if the mere outward manner of Christ's death could of itself furnish any satisfaction to the human mind that that death removed a curse from the whole race. That such an argument could be used by St. Paul discloses to us how very deep down these Jews were sunk in dogmatic unreasonableness. At all events, he satisfied them that as by Adam's disobedience men had fallen from God, so by the death of Christ the curse was removed, and by His obedience He had rendered men righteous in the sight of God. Those who were dissatisfied with the old system at once embraced St. Paul's nobler and more rational views, and thankfully owned Jesus Christ as their Redeemer and Atonement, in a sense which, I do not scruple to declare, was never taught by our Lord himself. But what could a Jew or Pagan do else? . . . They [meaning ritualists or priests] are (most falsely, as it seems to me) convinced that we are all by nature in danger of endless suffering; and that, unless we obey them in thought, word, and deed, unless they pray and sacrifice for us, and they pardon our offences, there is no hope for us beyond the grave. We do not, then, wish to be ungrateful in declining their interference and in rejecting their control. We simply say to them, 'You have made a fatal error at the very outset of your principles. You have made an entirely false assumption at the very beginning, and therefore we do not wonder that your course is altogether a foolish and mistaken one. You say we are by nature separated from God, or under His wrath—that He will not hear our prayers, or forgive our sins until we have been baptised, and have submitted ourselves to your authority.' We deny this entirely. We say that we are not separated from God nor under His wrath; that God is always with us all, and we are His children by nature, and therefore we are near and dear to Him all our lives through. With or without your help we need no redemption in the sense in which you offer it to us. You are telling us we have got no friend here while outside your temple; but we know that we are not alone, because our Father is with us, and you can offer no friend, no Saviour, no Comforter, so good and true and faithful as He. We are therefore not afraid to disobey your injunctions, to tear up your creeds, and to despise your ordinances. For all these are based upon a fundamental mistake." If in the above extracts the appellant had been simply combating the extreme views which have been adopted by some divines, either with reference to what is commonly called Calvinism on the one hand or Ritualism on the other, we conceive he would have been fully entitled so to do; and we should have been glad if we could have so reconciled his writings with the doctrine contained in the Articles and Formularies of the Church, but the extracts themselves are clearly intended to teach that in no sense are mankind naturally separated from God, or under God's wrath, which he represents to be a false assumption at the very beginning, and as occasioning the Ritualists, on that account, to take a foolish and mistaken course. It is true that he adds, as a portion of the error taught by them, and which he assumes to be their doctrine, "God will not hear our prayers, or forgive us our sins, until we have been baptised, and have submitted ourselves to your authority," meaning the authority of the priest; and if this had been all it might have admitted of explanation consistent with the doctrine of the Church; but the appellant makes his meaning clear, not only by the previously cited extract concerning St. Paul's teaching, but by what follows the last cited words, "We say that we are not separated from God, nor under His wrath; that God is always with us all, and we are His children by nature, therefore we are near and dear to him all our lives through. We know that we are not alone, because our Father is with us, and you can offer no friend, no services, no comforter, so good, and faithful, and true as He." We cannot doubt that the appellant advisedly contravenes the doctrine of a change of man's natural condition (in which the Church represents him to be subject to God's wrath), through the sacrifice of Christ offered to reconcile His Father to us, and that the 4th charge is therefore established. As regards the 5th charge against the appellant, we think that to assert that mankind needs no justification, or that salvation is not through justification, or that justification by faith is contrary to the teaching of Jesus Christ, is so plainly opposed to the very words of the 2nd and 11th Articles of Religion, that we need hardly cite them. We have the advantage of an authoritative exposition, if any were required, of the 11th Article of Religion, in the case of Heath v. Burder, before the Privy Council (15 Moo. P. C. 82; Freem. 235; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 562), where Lord Cranworth, in delivering judgment, says: "The evident meaning of the 11th Article is, that man is accounted righteous, which in the Article is treated as the same thing as being justified before God, not for his own merits, but for the merits of our Saviour by faith in Him—i.e., that man is admitted to the favour of God not for his own works, but for the merit of his Saviour and by faith in Him—i.e., by man's faith in our Saviour, howsoever faith is to be defined." The following extracts from the appellant's book appear to us clear contradictions of these Articles of Religion: "He" (meaning the Saviour) "never even hinted at such a doctrine as that of the fall of man, or the atonement by sacrifice or justification by faith. He never taught that men needed to be accounted righteous before God, or needed any mediator to propitiate His wrath, or to draw them to Himself. All these notions were Jewish, and Christ never gave any sanction or encouragement to them that I have been able to discover." And again: "Sincere sorrow for sin is enough to make a man quite reconciled and at peace with God; at least, so our Lord teaches. We do not therefore need any atonement nor any justification. We need no atonement, for God requires none." These six heads of charge complete the first of the three classes of charge, and we will proceed to the second class—viz., those relating to alleged errors as to the Incarnation and Godhead of Christ. Five articles of charge (the 23rd to the 27th inclusive) allege these errors—first, that the appellant asserts (23rd article of charge), "That our Lord Jesus Christ is no more Very God of Very God, begotten, not made, than we men are, contrary to the 2nd, 4th, and 8th of the Articles of Religion." Next, that he asserts (24th article of charge), "That the worship of Christ is idolatry, and is inconsistent with the worship of the true God, and that it is an instance of holding up our hands to a strange God, and outrivals the worship of the one true God, and draws away our highest homage and affection from God to another," contrary to the 1st, 2nd, and 8th Articles of Religion. Next, that he asserts (25th article of charge), "That the very idea of the Incarnation of the Son of God takes its rise in unbelief and springs out of absolute infidelity," contrary to the 2nd and 8th Articles of Religion. Next, that he asserts (26th article of charge), "That the expected return of Christ to judge the world takes its rise in unbelief, and springs only out of absolute infidelity, and that such expectation is unreasonable, is opposed to the simplicity of the love of God as a Father, and is calculated to overthrow the moral government of God," contrary to the 4th and 8th Articles of Religion. And lastly, that he asserts (27th article of charge), "That worship of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost is the worship of three Gods, and that the worship of the Son and of the Holy Ghost is idolatry, and that the belief in the Godhead of the Son and of the Holy Ghost, as expressed in the Nicene Creed, weakens and disguises the belief in one God the Father, and obliterates the true name of God," contrary to the 1st, 2nd, and 8th Articles of Religion. The Articles of Religion referred to in the above five articles of charge undoubtedly recognise the Godhead both of the Son and of the Holy Ghost as co-equal with that of the father, and recognises them as being with him one God (1st Article of Religion); that the Son took man's nature in the womb of the blessed Virgin of her substance, and that the Godhead of the Son and His manhood are united in Christ (2nd Article of Religion); that the Son ascended into heaven, and there sitteth until He returns to judge all men at the last day (4th Article of Religion); and the 8th Article of Religion says that the Nicene Creed, Athanasian Creed, and the Apostles' Creed are to be thoroughly received and believed. If, therefore, the last five articles of charge be proved, they are plainly repugnant to the Articles of Religion. We think it impossible to read the following passage or extract contained in the 21st article of charge without coming to the conclusion that the 6th charge against the appellant is made out: "And so God, the great unseen Creator, has wedded to Himself the great visible universe, and out of that mystical marriage has come as offspring the human family—a race of beings noble even as animals, but surpassing all we yet know of created life in being born of God—very God of very God—begotten not made, a statement as true of all of us as of Him who was called the first-born among many brethren." The extracts cited in the 21st article of charge in pp. 32 and 33 of the appendix, clearly describe the worship of Christ as idolatrous, and thus the 7th charge made in the 24th article of charge is also established. We may cite for this purpose the following, among other extracts, from pp. 33, 34: "At the time when Jesus Christ the Lord of men, appeared on earth, religious feelings towards God, in the hearts both of the Jew and Pagan, were such as to render impossible any repose in the bosom of the Creator. None could conceive of Him as even actuated by tender feelings, or as even guided

them before they can adopt the idea that God has sent some one to visit them. And if that one Man who came was very God of very God in a sense in which all other men are not, His going away again after a short human lifetime, proves that absence still more painfully; and it cannot be wondered at that His return to earth should be looked for and longed for with the most passionate eagerness of the soul. If God could leave the long ages of human life deserted by Him before the coming of Christ, and then, after the little space of thirty-three years, could leave mankind again for thousands of years more in the same desolate desertion, then He is not the Father of men, and we might then question if He is even our friend." Indeed, the author in an extract contained in p. 24 (articles of charge, No. 9) candidly states, "I found that I could not hold to the true Fatherhood of God if I did not give up some of the doctrines of so-called Christianity. The doctrines of mediation, intercession, atonement, isolated incarnation, and the expected return of Jesus to earth are all, more or less, opposed to the perfect harmony and simplicity of the love of God as a Father." As regards the 10th charge contained in the 27th article of the charge against the appellant, being the last of the general class relating to the Incarnation and Godhead of Christ, we think it is proved by the following passage, "Take away" (that is from the book of Common Prayer) "what we can most heartily join in, and the greater part, as well as the most important part, of the service would be expunged. For the sake of this, then, we may well bear for a time with the blemishes, weaknesses, and minor superstitions which the Church of Rome bequeathed to us when we parted company at the last reformation. We need not hesitate at the repetition of any creed which makes us say as its first words, 'I believe in one God, the Father Almighty, Maker of Heaven and Earth, and of all things visible and invisible.' Any clause added thereto which seems to weaken or to disguise that first grand utterance may well be tolerated, considering the changing times in which we live, for the sake of the cardinal, and central and most vital principle upon which all the rest is, or is supposed to be, based." The four remaining charges against the appellant constitute the last general class of his alleged errors, viz., his depraving of scripture; and they are as follows:—That the appellant has promulgated, in derogation and depraving of Holy Scripture, the doctrine that the revelation of the knowledge of God by means of any book is impossible; that all true knowledge of God comes directly from the law of God written in men's hearts; that all knowledge of God comes only from men's own sense of what He requires them to do; and that the only true revelation possible by God to man is through the sense of God's presence, and is originated in the heart of man independently of God's written Word (31st article of charge). That he has asserted that in God's Word written, Holy Scriptures, and Holy Writ, there are found manifest, palpable, and irreconcileable contradictions, and many places which cannot be explained but so that they be repugnant to others (32nd article of charge). That he has asserted, in derogation and depraving of Holy Scripture, that the authority of the Gospel, according to St. John, is doubtful, and that the said Gospel ought not to be applied to establish any doctrine, and that whole chapters of the said Gospel are crowded with passages which represent Jesus Christ as speaking words which He never could have spoken, and which, if spoken, would not have been believed (33rd article of charge). That he has asserted that the Gospel according to St. John contains passages which can only be expounded so that they be repugnant to each other or to other places of God's Word written, or Holy Scripture, and that the character of our Lord Jesus Christ as there set forth is quite irreconcileable with the idea of His being a Teacher sent from God, and is entirely different from the character of the Christ of the other Gospels (34th article of charge). The first, second, and fourth of the offences alleged in the last mentioned articles of charge are stated to contravene the 6th and the 20th Articles of Religion, and the 13th to contravene the 6th Article of Religion; and each of the said offences is also charged to be an assertion of doctrine inconsistent with certain portions of the Book of Common Prayer, set forth in the subsequent articles of charge. The 6th Article of Religion lays it down that there never was any doubt in the Church of the authority of the canonical books of the Old and New Testaments, and that the Church applies them to establish doctrine. Whilst the 20th Article of Religion declares "that it is not lawful for the Church to ordain anything that is contrary to God's Word written, nor may it so expound one portion of Scripture that it be repugnant to another." Now it is very important upon this head of the inquiry to consider the judgment delivered by Lord Westbury in the case of Essays and Reviews, (Williams v. The Bishop of Salisbury, and Wilson v. Fendall (ubi. sup.) In considering one of the charges against Dr. Williams, in that case the judgment states the case thus:—"The words that the Bible is 'an expression of devout reason, and, therefore, to be read with reason in freedom,' are treated in the charge as equivalent to these words:—The Bible is the composition or work of devout or pious men, and nothing more; but such a meaning ought not to be ascribed to the words of a writer who, a few lines further on, has plainly affirmed that the Holy Spirit dwelt in the sacred writers of the Bible. This context enables us to say that the words 'an expression of devout reason, and, therefore, to be read with reason in freedom,' ought not to be taken in the sense ascribed to them by the accusation. In like manner we deem it unnecessary to put any interpretation on the words 'written voice of the congregation,' inasmuch as we are satisfied that whatever may be the meaning of the passages included in this article, they do not, taken collectively, warrant the charge which has been made that Dr. Williams has maintained the Bible not to be the Word of God nor the rule of faith." The judgment, therefore, is express in saying that the ground for regarding the statements of Dr. Williams as not exceeding the just limits allowed by the Articles of Religion was, that he did not state the Bible to be the composition of devout men and nothing more. So, in considering the charge against Mr. Wilson, the following passage occurs (p. 429):—"In the 8th article of charge an extract of some length is made from Mr. Wilson's essay, and the accusation is, that in the passage extracted Mr. Wilson has declared and affirmed in effect that the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament were not written under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, and that they were not necessarily at all, and certainly not in parts, the Word of God; and then reference is made to the 6th and 20th Articles of Religion, to part of the Nicence Creed, and to a passage in the Ordination of Priests in the Book of Common Prayer. This charge, therefore, involves the proposition, that it is a contradiction of the doctrine laid down in the 6th and 20th Articles of Religion, in the Nicene Creed, and in the Ordination Service of Priests, to affirm that any part of the canonical books of the Old or New Testament, upon any subject whatever, however unconnected with religious faith or moral duty, was not written under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit." Guided by the judgment we have thus referred to, we do not think the 11th charge contained in the 31st article of charge is so made out by the extract given from the appellant's work as to justify us in regarding that article of charge as established. The appellant asserts, indeed, at the end of a long passage, extracted in page 41, that all knowledge of God can only come from our own deep sense of what He requires us to do; and these words are associated with much disparagement of the Bible. But it is possible to interpret these words as meaning that the Bible itself would be of no effect in imparting a knowledge of God if that deep sense of what He requires us to do were absent—a sense in which the expression would be allowable; and, following the example set by the judgment in the case of the Essays and Reviews, we think this interpretation in a quasi-criminal proceeding should prevail. As regards the remaining charges contained in the following articles of charge, whatever force may be given to the word "authority" in the 6th Article of Religion "as applied to the canonical books of the Old and New Testament," we are of opinion that, in order that the books (which are enumerated) should have any authority at all, it is not consistent with that Article of Religion for any private clergyman, of his own mere will, not founding himself upon any critical inquiry, but simply upon his own taste and judgment, to assert that whole passages of such canonical books are without any authority whatever, as being contrary to the teaching of Christ as contained in others of the canonical books. We think that no private clergyman can do that which the whole Church is, by the 20th Article declared to be incompetent to do, viz., expound one part of Scripture in a manner repugnant to another; and we need not go through the painful task of citing the numerous passages in the extracts where this is done by the appellant. We find whole chapters of the Gospel of St. John declared by the appellant, on his own simple assertion, to be irreconcileable with the other Gospels, not on points unconnected with "religious faith and duty," to use the words of the judgment in the case of the Essays and Reviews, but in the most essential manner connected with both; and again, whole passages declared to be spurious on no other ground than that they do not approve themselves to the appellant's taste. We can entertain no doubt then, that the charges contained in the 32nd, 33rd, and 34th articles of charges are abundantly established. We have now fulfilled the duty of examining minutely the articles of charge exhibited against the appellant. We have not been unmindful of the latitude wisely allowed by the Articles of Religion to the clergy, so as to embrace all who hold one common faith. The mysterious nature of many of the subjects associ-ith the cardinal points of this faith, must, of ity, occasion great diversity of opinion, and not been attempted by the Articles to close all sion, or to guard against varied interpreta- f Scripture with reference even to cardinal s of faith, so that these articles are them- plainly admitted, in some sense or other, ing to a reasonable construction, or according o a doubtful, but not delusive construction. r have we omitted to notice the previous ns of the Ecclesiastical Courts, and especi- he judgments of this tribunal, by which retations of the Articles of Religion, which y reasonable allowance for the variety of opinion can be reconciled with their ge, have been held to be consistent with obedience to the laws ecclesiastical, even the interpretation in question might not be hich the tribunal itself would have assigned article. We have also had careful regard to planation given by the appellant himself in of those of his writings from which the ts contained in the articles of charge have taken, in order to see whether the extracts r to the mind the advised and definite ns of the author, or whether their meaning modified by the context in a sense more tent with the Articles of Religion, but we find any indications of such being the case. ink that the extracts deliberately exhibit the ns of the appellant, by which the Articles of on, with reference to original sin, the sacrifice ffering of Christ, the Son of God, both God an, to reconcile His Father to man, the ation and Godhead of the Son, His return ge the world, the doctrine of the Trinity, are r controverted and impugned, and the Holy ures are as plainly denied their legitimate rity, even on points essential both to faith ity, by the process of denying their genuine- not on any critical grounds, but avowedly e they contradict the appellant's private ent. We have not, in this our decision, ed to any of the Formularies of the Church than the Articles of Religion. We have mindful of the authorities, which have held ious expressions of devotion are not to be as binding declarations of doctrine. But ppellant will, we think, himself feel how sible it is that any society whatever of ippers can be held together without some mental points of agreement, or can together ip a being in whom they have no common

He himself appears to have experienced the lty in the remarkable passages extracted in 2 of the appendix, with reference to prayer name of Jesus Christ. The whole of the laries of the Church, and of its devotion, are on the faith in one God, the Father, Son, Holy Ghost. In the daily services of the h, both morning and evening, glory is ed at the end of each Psalm to this one God inity, naming each person of the Godhead tely. Prayer constantly concludes with a nce to the mediation of Jesus Christ. Direct r is addressed to Jesus Christ in the daily e, morning and evening, by the short prayer Christ have mercy upon us." In the daily ng prayer, throughout a great portion of the um, prayer is made to the Son; and, three in a week, in the Litany, there is direct r addressed both to the Son and to the Holy Ghost, as well as to the Holy Trinity. In fact, a large portion of the Litany is addressed to the Son directly. It is not surprising then, that there should be articles distinctly supporting devotions, so fully impressed with a faith in the intercession and power of the Son who is thus invoked. And it would be as contrary to morality as to law to direct the professors of any religion daily to offer prayer to One in whose Divine power they have no faith, or to address as God, One whom they believed to be only man. The appellant, in his address to us, relied much on the absence of direct verbal contradiction in his writings to the words of the Articles of Religion, and asserted that, inasmuch as the Articles could not be all reconciled with each other, he might properly dwell on one view of an Article, which, from the inconsistent character of the Articles, would be opposed to the construction of another Article. The mode in which the appellant constantly misrepresents and caricatures the opinions from which he differs no doubt accounts for his thus attributing inconsistency to statements of doctrine which he has misunderstood. We are, on a perusal of the appellant's writings, driven to the conclusion, not removed by his arguments, that the appellant advisedly rejects the doctrines on the profession of which alone he was admitted to the position of a minister of the church. He disclaims all wish to reconsider his avowed and published opinions, and does not desire an opportunity of retracting any of his opinions. We are bound, therefore, to advise her Majesty that his appeal against the admission of the articles should be dismissed with costs, and that, on the merits of the whole case, sentence of deprivation should be pronounced against the appellant, and that he should be condemned in the costs of the suit. In pronouncing this decision their Lordships have assumed that the appellant adheres to the intimation, made by him on the conclusion of the argument, that he does not desire an opportunity of retracting the opinions which have now been condemned; but their Lordships are, nevertheless, unwilling to proceed to the last step of their duty if he do, within a week from this date, expressly and unreservedly retract the several errors of which he has been convicted. Their Lordships would have followed the precedent afforded by Mr. Heath's case if the appellant had been present and would have required his immediate decision, but they have been informed that Mr. Voysey's absence is occasioned by a sufficient reason.

ROLLS COURT.

Reported by HENRY PEAT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

May 26, 29, and June 5, 1871.

PITTS v. KINGSBRIDGE HIGHWAY BOARD.

Highway Board—Power to remove shingle from beach—General Highway Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), ss. 51 and 52—Respective liabilities of contractor and employer.

A special custom to take shingle from the beach above high water mark for the repairing of the highways of the parish, is bad as to such portion of the beach as is private property, being a custom of a profit à prendre in another man's land.

The General Highway Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50) does not empower a highway board to take shingle from the beach below high water mark for the repair of the highways, so as to cause an increased danger of encroachment by the sea.

The employers of a contractor are liable for the injurious acts of the contractor which flow out of the fulfilment of the contract, but where the injurious acts flow out of a matter foreign to the contract, the contractor is personally liable.

Where a plaintiff fails in establishing a case for relief, the uncertain character of the evidence on which the case turns, and the setting up of unfounded claims by the defence, are grounds for dismissing the bill without costs.

THIS was a suit instituted by one Nicholas Pitts to obtain an injunction to restrain the Kingsbridge Highway Board, their contractors, servants, workmen, and agents from gathering or getting, raking, digging, taking away, and removing stones, pebbles, shingle, or other like materials on and from the beach or shore of Lannacombe Cove, in the highway district of Kingsbridge, Devon. The bill also prayed that the damages occasioned to the plaintiff by the gathering, taking away and removing by the defendants of stones, pebbles, shingle and other like materials, on and from the beach or shore of Lannacombe Cove, might be ascertained and the amount thereof assessed, and that the defendants might be ordered to pay the same to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff, as owner in fee simple of a portion of the manor of South Allington, which adjoins Lannacombe Cove, claimed to be entitled to the sea beach, waste land, and foreshore above high water mark adjacent to the manor of South Allington. The lands in question had been vested in the plaintiff and his ancestors for sixty years and upwards. The manor of South Allington is an ancient manor, and the bill alleged that the manor, both by grant and immemorial right and custom, consisted of (amongst other things) the sea beach and waste lands adjacent thereto.

The plaintiff was also the owner in fee simple of an estate called Down, which extended to Lannacombe Cove, and which he purchased in 1858 from the trustees of the then lord of the manor of Stokenham, an ancient manor, with similar rights over the sea shore, to those belonging to the manor of South Allington. Under and by virtue of the deed of conveyance of this estate of Down the plaintiff claimed to be entitled to the sea beach, waste lands, and foreshore adjacent to the estate of Down, such waste being by such deed expressly conveyed and assured to him.

The sea beach, waste lands, &c., in question, are comprised in the Kingsbridge highway district, which was duly formed under the statute 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61, by which statute also the Kingsbridge Highway Board was constituted as a corporate body.

The defendants under their Act from time to time employed contractors to repair the highways. In the fulfilment of their contract the contractors had on various occasions removed quantities of shingle from the beach of Lannacombe Cove, both from above and below, high water mark.

The plaintiff, by his solicitor, Mr. Richard Andrews, in June 1868, applied by letter to the defendants through their clerk, Mr. Gabriel Beer Lidstone, and requested them to prevent their contractors from continuing to remove stones, shingle, and other like materials from the beach of Lannacombe Cove, but the defendants refused to comply with the plaintiff's requests, alleging that under and by virtue of the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50, ss. 51 & 52 (a), they and their contractors had a right to remove such stones, shingle, &c., from the beach in question for the purpose of repairing the roads and highways of the Kingsbridge district.

Thereupon the plaintiff instituted the present suit, alleging by his bill that on the part of the coast where his estates are situate, the sea is continually advancing and encroaching on the adjoining lands, and the gathering or getting, raking and digging up stones, pebbles, shingle, or other like materials on, and removing the

(a) By the 51st section of the General Highway Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), it is provided that "it shall and may be lawful for every surveyor, in any waste land or common ground, river, or brook, within the parish for which he shall be surveyor, or within any other parish wherein gravel, sand, stone, or other materials are respectively likely to be found (in case sufficient cannot be conveniently had within the parish where the same are to be employed, and sufficient shall be left for the use of the roads in such other parish), to search for, dig, get, and carry away the same, so that the said surveyor doth not thereby divert or interrupt the course of such river or brook, or prejudice or damage any building, highway, or ford, nor dig or get the same out of any river or brook, within the distance of 150ft. above or below any bridge, nor within the like distance of any dam or weir; and likewise to gather stones lying upon any lands or grounds within the parish where such highway shall be, for such service or purpose, and to take and carry away so much of the said materials as by the discretion of the said surveyor shall be thought necessary to be employed in the amendment of the said highways, without making any satisfaction for the said materials; but satisfaction shall be made for all damages done to the lands or grounds of any person or persons by carrying away the same, and in the manner hereinafter directed for getting and carrying materials in inclosed lands or grounds; but no such stones shall be gathered without the consent of the owner of such lands or grounds, or a licence for that purpose from two justices at a special sessions for the highways, after having summoned such owner to come before him and heard his reasons, if he shall appear and give any, for refusing his consent.

By sect 52 it is provided that "nothing in the Act contained relative to the gathering or getting of stones or other materials, shall extend to any quantity of stones or other materials thrown up by the sea, commonly called beach, where the removal of the same would cause any damage or injury by inundation to the lands adjoining, or increased danger of encroachment by the sea."

And by sect. 53 it is provided that "it shall not be lawful for any surveyor, or other person acting under the authority of this Act, to dig, gather, get, take, or carry away any materials for making or repairing any highway out of or from any inclosed land or ground, until one calendar month's notice in writing, signed by the surveyor, shall have been given to the owner of the premises from which such materials are intended to be taken, or left at the house or last or usual place of abode of such owner or agent, and also of such occupier, to appear before the justices at a special sessions for the highways, to show cause why such materials shall not be had therefrom; and in case such owner, agent, or occupier shall attend pursuant to such notice, but shall not show sufficient cause to the contrary, such justices shall, if they think proper, authorise such surveyor or other person to dig, get, gather, take, and carry away such materials at such time or times as to such justices shall seem proper; and if such owner, agent, or occupier shall neglect or refuse to appear by himself or his agent, the said justices shall and may (upon proof on oath of the service of such notice) make such order therein as they shall think fit as fully and effectually to all intents and purposes as if such owner or occupier, or his agent, had attended."

same from the beach or shore increased the danger of encroachment by the sea on the adjoining lands belonging to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff submitted that the defendants and their contractor had not, under the General Highway Act, or any other enactment or authority, any right to remove stones, &c., from the beach in question, and that they ought to be restrained by injunction from removing such stones, &c., from the beach in question, as well from below as above high water mark, and more especially so having regard to the increased danger of encroachment by the sea on the plaintiff's lands, occasioned by such acts.

The defendants by their answer contended that as to stones, &c., removed from below high water mark (such part of the beach not being the private property of the plaintiff) they were entitled to remove them by the 51st and 52nd sections of the Act, and also by a special custom by which from time immemorial the inhabitants of the parishes or manors of Chivelstone and Stokenham (in which the plaintiff's estates were situate), or the persons for the time being, and from time to time charged with the duty of repairing the roads and highways in such respective parishes had been used and accustomed to have and enjoy the right to enter upon the sea shore between high and low water mark in Lannacombe Cove, and to get, take, and collect, gravel, stones, pebbles, beach, and other such materials there deposited by the sea, and remove and carry away the same therefrom for the purpose of repairing the roads and highways in the said respective parishes when and so often as need and occasion required. The defendants further contended that it was their contractors, and not themselves who had committed the acts complained of, and that the contractors were alone liable in respect thereof.

In a contract entered into on the 20th May 1869, by the defendants, with the persons whose tender was accepted for the repair of the roads, it was provided that "whenever the contractors are required to use pebbles or other materials thrown up by the sea for hardening any of the roads, they are not to cause any damage or injury by the removal of such pebbles or other materials by inundations of the lands adjoining to where the same may have been removed, or increased danger by encroachment by the sea, and the board will not be responsible for the illegal removal of such pebbles or other materials by the contractors."

As to the shingle removed from above high water mark, the defendants admitted that they had removed some in 1866, three years before the filing of the bill, but not since, and they disclaimed all intention of removing shingle therefrom in the future.

The evidence was very conflicting as to the quantity of shingle removed, and as to whether its removal caused increased danger of encroachment by the sea.

Mackeson, Q. C. and W. Wellington Cooper, for the plaintiff, submitted that the defendants had no right under sect. 51 of the Act to remove the shingle above high water mark, as that part of the beach was the plaintiff's private property. As to the shingle below high water mark, its removal caused increased danger of encroachment of the sea on the plaintiff's private property, and therefore the defendants could not remove the shingle, as such a case was expressly excepted from the operation of the 51st section by the terms of the 52nd section. They cited

Johnson v. Wyard, 2 Lutw. 1344, and where it was held that a surveyor of highways cannot justify a trespass under a prescriptive right, or a custom, to take stones from the waste, whether adjoining the sea shore between high and low water mark, or otherwise, for the purpose of repairing the highways of the parish. They contended that the alleged custom to take stones, &c., for the repair of the roads was bad as being a claim of a profit à prendre in another man's soil:

Constable v. Nicholson, 14 C. B., N. S., 230;
The Attorney-General v. Matthias, 4 K. & J. 579;
Willingale v. Maitland, L. Rep. 3 Eq. 103; 36 L. J. Ch. 64;
Clowes v. Beck, 13 Beav. 353.

They contended that it was the defendants and not their contractors who were liable for the injury done; on this point they cited,—

Hole v. The Sittingbourne and Sheerness Railway Company, 3 L. T. Rep. N. S 750; 6 H. & N. 488, and Gray v. Pullen, 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 569; 5 Best & Sm. 978.

Jessel, Q.C., Charles Hall, and Solomon, for the defendants, contended that it was now too late to obtain relief for the injury done in 1866 by taking shingle from above high water mark, as the defendants had disclaimed the intention of taking any more from that part of the shore. As to taking shingle below high water mark they referred to 7 Jac. 1, c. 18, and Hall on the Sea Shore, p. 246. Assuming that the shingle was wrongly taken, they contended that the defendants were not liable for the wrongful acts of their contractors: (Gray v. Pullen, 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 569; 5 Best & Sm. 978).

Mackeson, Q.C. in reply,

June 5.—Lord ROMILLY.—This is a suit instituted for the purpose of preventing injury to the property of the plaintiff, by removing shingle from the beach in Lannacombe Cove, near Kingsbridge, in Devonshire. The plaintiff says that the defendants' right to take away the beach is only given by the General Highway Act (5 & 6 Will 4, c. 50), and that this right is limited by sects. 51 & 52, that sect. 51 prevents their taking the property of the plaintiff without his assent, or paying him for it, and that sect. 52 prevents their taking any beach from any place in such a manner as to increase or cause danger from the encroachment of the sea. The defendants, on the other hand, not only insist that they are entitled to do what they have done, under the General Highway Act, but they also contend that if that does not enable them to do so, they can take it by special custom; and if that contention fail, that they are not liable, because it is the act of the contractor whom they have employed and not their act, that the words of the contract employing the contractors told them to do nothing they were not entitled to do, and that the bill ought to be against the contractor and not against them. It is necessary, in consequence of this defence, to distinguish the case of the taking of stones from the beach from below and from above ordinary high water mark. The plaintiff alleges that the defendants have taken stones from the beach from above high water mark. This piece of ground was formerly part of the waste, and was conveyed by the lord of the manor to the plaintiff for valuable consideration. It must therefore be treated, for this purpose, as the private property of the plaintiff. So treating it, I am of opinion that the defendants are not entitled to take away stones from this part of the cove by means of any custom, and that the custom of a profit à prendre in another man's land is bad, as indeed is admitted by the defendants; and that the attempt to set up a grant from the Crown has no application to this case, as the plaintiff's title proceeds from a grant by the lord of the manor of a part of the waste, which supersedes, or, rather, is inconsistent with, a grant from the Crown: and as to the 53rd section of the statute I think that the defendants have not proceeded under it. With respect to the stones below high water mark, they stand on a very different footing, and the right to them is limited by the 51st and 52nd sections of the statute. The real question which I have to try upon the evidence laid before me is, whether taking away the beach causes or increases the danger of encroachment by the sea. And here I may at once dispose of an argument relied on by the defendants, namely, that if injury has been done, the contractors are the only persons to blame, and that they might be made liable personally. I am of opinion that the defendants are liable for the improper acts of the contractors which flow out of the fulfilment of the contract entered into with the defendants; and that if the contractors under this contract, which does not exclude their taking away such stones, have removed beach from above high water mark, the defendants are liable; and that if the contractors have, by taking beach from below high water mark, caused or increased the danger of the encroachment of the sea, contrary to the provisions of the statute, the defendants are liable, and that the contractors, although they may be liable to the defendants, are not liable to the plaintiff. Of course if the matter were foreign to the contract, then the contractors would be personally liable; but what the contractors have done is that which they contracted to do as part of the contract under which they were employed for value to do a particular act, and if the act cannot be done without injury to the plaintiff, and is against the provisions of sect. 52, it is not they, but the defendants, who are liable. But the real questions to be determined are those of fact. With respect to the first, the taking of shingle from the land of the plaintiff above high water mark, I am satisfied upon the evidence, that no shingle has been taken from that spot since 1866, and the defendants now disclaim the right to take away any unless under the 53rd section, under which they would have to pay for it. With respect to that, therefore, an undertaking by the board that they will not take or authorise the taking of any shingle from that part of the shore will be sufficient. With respect to the taking of shingle below the high water mark, the only question is, whether it accelerates the encroachment of the sea. On this subject there is much conflicting evidence. I think that the evidence is distinct that the sea does encroach, though not, I think, rapidly. But I cannot, upon the evidence, attribute any portion of the encroachment to the abstraction by the defendants of the shingle from the beach. The evidence is uncontradicted that a single tide with the wind in one direction will abstract the greater part of the beach from the cove, and that another tide, with the wind in another direction, will fill the cove with shingle, and I do not think that the abstraction by the defendants of two or three hundred cartloads of shingle from time to time would produce any effect on a shore so influenced by tides and winds, especially when it appears that the shingle is washed along the bottom of the cliffs below low water mark for a considerable distance. I am of opinion that the evidence is not conclusive; but, forming the best opinion I can, the conclusion I have come to is, that the removal of shingle from time to time below high-water mark from the cove to the extent to which it has been removed by the defendants, does not accelerate the encroachment of the sea in the least. I shall, therefore, dismiss the bill; but, having regard to the uncertain character of the evidence, and the unfounded claims which the defendants have put forward, I shall do so without costs, and on the assumption that the defendants continue their disclaimer of all right to take any part of the beach above the level of ordinary high water mark.

Re THE MARYLEBONE (STINGO-LANE) IMPROVEMENT ACT 1868; Ex parte EDWARDS.

Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845—Notice to take land under compulsory powers—Interest created after service of notice—Compensation.

A tenancy created after service of notice to treat is not a subject for compensation by the party serving the notice.

PETITION.

By the Marylebone (Stingo-lane) Improvement Act 1868, which incorporates the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, and the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1860, the Metropolitan Board of Works were authorised to make a new street commencing in the Marylebone-road at or near the point where Stingo-lane unites with that road and terminating in Upper York-street at the place where Stingo-lane unites with Upper York-street, and to treat and agree for the purchase of any lands authorised to be taken and used by them, and of any subsisting leases, terms, shares, estates, and interest therein and charges thereon, or such of them, or such part thereof as they should think proper.

In pursuance of the powers vested in them by this Act or the Acts incorporated therewith, the Metropolitan Board of Works on the 24th May 1869 served upon Henry Topple a notice to treat for the purchase of his leasehold interest in the messuage and premises No. 6, Stingo-lane, which they required for the purposes of the Act.

At that time Edwards was weekly tenant of a portion of the premises at the rent of 12*s.* a week. He had resided there for five years, and carried on business as a barber and hairdresser.

On the 14th Jan. 1870 an agreement in writing, dated the 18th Dec. 1869, was executed between Henry Topple of the one part and William Edwards of the other part, whereby Topple agreed to let and Edwards agreed to take, the shop, parlour, and kitchens, and one room upstairs, situated at No. 6, Stingo-lane, at the weekly rent of 12*s.* for the term of three years from the 18th Dec. 1869.

The petition stated that Topple had on several occasions promised to grant a lease of the rooms in question to Edwards.

In Feb. 1870 Topple sent in to the Metropolitan Board of Works particulars of his claim, in which he stated that his interest was subject to that of Edwards under the agreement of the 18th Dec. 1869, and the value of Topple's interest was assessed on the footing of the claim so made, and the amount of compensation awarded to him was 1381*l.*

On the 7th March 1871 Edwards gave notice to the Metropolitan Board of Works that he claimed the sum of 350*l.* in respect of his interest in the premises under the agreement of the 18th Dec. 1869.

On the 27th March 1871 the Metropolitan Board of Works issued their warrant to the sheriff of Middlesex, whereby, after reciting that they did not admit but denied that Edwards was entitled to receive any compensation at all from them in respect of the matters mentioned in his notice, they required him to summon a special jury to determine the amount of compensation (if any) payable by them to Edwards.

On the 29th April 1871 a jury was summoned, and assessed Edwards's claim to compensation at 100*l.*

Edwards's costs of these proceedings were taxed at 62*l.*

The Metropolitan Board of Works still disputed Edwards's claim, and paid the sum of 162*l.* into court under the 76th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845.

Edwards accordingly presented the present petition, praying that the amount might be paid out of court to him.

Jessel, Q. C. and Willis-Bund in support of the petition.

Southgate, Q. C. and Charles Hall, for the Metropolitan Board of Works, opposed.

July 22.—Lord ROMILLY said that if the agreement in question had been executed before the landlord received the notice to treat, the petitioner would have been entitled to compensation in respect of his interest, even though the three years' tenancy had been created in the expectation of the house being taken by the Metropolitan Board of Works under the compulsory powers vested in them by the Act. Here, however, the tenancy was created after service of the notice to treat, and his Lordship was of opinion that it was therefore not a subject for compensation by the party serving the notice. The petition must, therefore be dismissed, but without costs.

PRATT v. HARVEY.

Will—Bequest for building a church—Mortmain Acts—Bequest invalid.

A testator bequeathed a sum of money towards the expenses of building a church, and provided that, if the church should not be commenced in his lifetime, or before the expiration of two years from his death, or within half a mile of a certain place, the legacy was to go over to his general personal estate:

Held, that the legacy was invalid, as coming within the Statutes of Mortmain.

THE question in this case was whether a legacy was invalid, as contravening the provisions of the Statutes of Mortmain. The facts were these:

J. T. Fisher, by his will dated in Dec. 1868, bequeathed (inter alia) the sum of 1000*l.* to the vicar and churchwardens of the town of Newark-upon-Trent, to be applied by them in and towards the expenses of building and erecting a new church, near Northgate, in connection with the Church of England; and the testator provided that if the church should not be commenced during his lifetime, or before the expiration of two years after his death, or if it should not be erected within half a mile of Northgate, then such legacy was to go over to his general personal estate; and the testator bequeathed the residue of his property to the plaintiffs, who were infants.

The testator died in May, 1869.

Charles Hall for the defendants, the legatees, contended that the bequest, when made to them, was contingent on the fact of land being purchased within the lifetime of the testator, and therefore good. It was true that no land had been so purchased; but that would not invalidate a bequest originally valid. He cited

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The authorities referred to lay down the law that a charitable gift for building is only good in two instances—namely, where it is directed that the building should take place on specified land already in mortmain, or where by the gift the purchase of land is expressly excluded. This case does not come within those definitions. I consider that the restriction on the gift is not nearly enough to exclude its application in the purchase of land, and that being so, the legacy must fail, except to the extent of the 500*l.* allowed by the Act.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

THE GUARDIANS OF THE POOR OF THE STOURBRIDGE UNION (apps.) v. THE GUARDIANS OF THE POOR OF THE DROITWICH UNION (resps.).

Poor law—Parish not maintaining its poor—Association of townships for rating purposes—Severance—Loss of settlement therefrom—Alteration of area.

The ecclesiastical parish of Old Swinford never maintained its own poor; but the township of Upper Swinford, within the said parish, and three other townships also therein, from time immemorial associated together under the designation of the "parish of Old Swinford," jointly appointed overseers, and made rates for the relief of their poor.

The four townships, however, disjoined, pursuant to a mandamus directed to one of them in 1842, and separate overseers have since been regularly appointed, and separate rates made for each.

The township of Upper Swinford now forms part of Stourbridge Union, which comprises the parishes and places of Stourbridge, Old Swinford, &c.

A. was born about the year 1804 in the township of Upper Swinford.

The wife and children of his son, paupers, were entitled to derive a settlement from the birth settlement of A., and were therefore adjudged by an order of justices to be legally settled in the parish of Old Swinford, and to be removable to the Stourbridge Union.

Held (in consequence solely of the decisions in Reg. v. The Inhabitants of Tipton, (3 Q. B. 215); Reg. v. The Inhabitants of Hunnington (5 Q. B. 273), and successive similar cases), that as there had been a change in the chargeable area wherein the birth settlement of A. lay, by the separation of the united townships, the paupers had no legal settlement there, and that the order was bad.

1. By an order of two justices for the county of Worcester, made on the 28th April 1869, on the complaint of the Droitwich union guardians, it was adjudged that the settlement of Mary Ann Smith and two children, aged six and two years, was in the parish of Old Swinford and Stourbridge union, and the former union was ordered to remove the said paupers to the Stourbridge union. On appeal, by an order of a judge the following case was stated for the opinion of this court.

2. Mary Ann Smith, in the order mentioned, is the widow of William Smith.

3. The grounds of removal, including the particulars in the settlement relied upon in support of the order, stated, amongst other things, "that William Smith was the son of Samuel Smith; that the last-mentioned Samuel Smith was born in the parish of Old Swinford, in or about the year 1804, and that the last legal settlement of the said Mary Ann Smith and her two children is in the said parish of Old Swinford, in virtue of the birth settlement of her late husband, William Smith's father, Samuel Smith, in the said parish of Old Swinford."

4. It is agreed that if the alleged birth settlement of Samuel Smith, in the alleged parish of Old Swinford, or otherwise in the Stourbridge union was, under the circumstances herinafter stated, available at the time of the making of the order, then the last-mentioned settlement was and is the last legal settlement of Mary Ann Smith and her two children, and the order for the removal of Mary Ann Smith and her two children to the Stourbridge union was rightly made.

5. Samuel Smith was born in the township of Upper Swinford, in the ecclesiastical parish of Old Swinford, in the county of Worcester, in or about the year 1804.

6. The ecclesiastical parish of Old Swinford has existed from time immemorial, with a parish church, and churchwardens have been from time immemorial, and still are, regularly appointed for that parish; but portions of the old ecclesiastical parish of Old Swinford have been from time to time separated off into ecclesiastical districts, under the Church Building Acts; and at the time of the making of the said order, the only part of the old ecclesiastical parish of Old Swinford remaining was and is the township of Upper Swinford, in which the church and rectory are situate, and which still constitutes the ecclesiastical parish of Old Swinford. And the portions so separated off have been since such separation, and still are, distinct for all ecclesiastical purposes from the present ecclesiastical parish of Old Swinford as provided by the Church Building Acts.

7. The ecclesiastical parish of Old Swinford did not, before the passing of the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 79, maintain its own poor, and there is not now, and there never was, any poor rate made for such ecclesiastical parish, and there are no overseers appointed, nor were there any ever appointed for such parish.

8. The ecclesiastical parish of Old Swinford was originally made up of a number of townships and hamlets. These townships and hamlets are as follows: The township of Stourbridge, the hamlet of Amblecote, the township or hamlet of Upper Swinford, in which the old parish church and rectory are situate, the township or hamlet of Wollaston, the township or hamlet of the Lye, and the township or hamlet of Wollescote.

9. The township of Stourbridge has from time immemorial had separate overseers appointed for it, and a separate poor rate has always been made for such township.

10. In like manner the hamlet of Amblecote has from time immemorial had separate overseers appointed for it, and it also has a separate poor rate.

11. The townships or hamlets of Upper Swinford, Wollaston, the Lye, and Wollescote, forming part only of the ecclesiastical parish of Old Swinford from time immemorial previously to the year 1842, were together called "the parish of Old Swinford," and they had two overseers appointed for such townships or hamlets jointly, who were called the overseers of the poor of "the parish of Old Swinford," and one poor rate used to be made by such overseers for such last-mentioned four townships or hamlets, which jointly supported their poor.

12. The Stourbridge Union was formed in the year 1836 by an order of the Poor Law Commissioners for England and Wales, under the 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 26; and by such order the parishes and places of Stourbridge, Old Swinford, Cradley, the borough of Halesowen, Illy, Hawn, Hasbury, Sutley, the Hill, Catkemore, Ridgacre, and Lapal, in the county of Worcester and King's Swinford and Amblecote in the county of Stafford, were formed into a union called the Stourbridge union.

13. In the year 1842 a rule for a mandamus was made absolute, commanding the justices to appoint separate overseers for the township of Wollaston, in pursuance of the statute 13 & 14 Car. 2, c. 12, s. 21, which they did; and such separate overseers have been annually appointed for that township, and a separate poor rate has been since made for the same. In consequence of the decision of the Queen's Bench in that case, separate overseers have since the year 1842 also been legally and regularly appointed for the township of Upper Swinford, the township of Lye, and the township of Wollescote, and each of those townships has since that period had a separate rate made for it by its own overseers. After separate overseers had been appointed in 1842, by an order of the Poor Law Commissioners, dated the 18th Aug. 1842, after reciting their said order dated the 19th Sept. 1836, forming under the provisions of the Act of 4 & 5 Will. 4 the Stourbridge union aforesaid, and reciting that the parish of Old Swinford aforesaid was one of the places the names of which were specified in the margin of the said order, and that the same was still one of the places forming the said Stourbridge union, and reciting that the parish of Old Swinford comprised several townships, and among others the townships of Upper Swinford and Wollaston, but that at the date of the said order the poor of the said parish of Old Swinford were maintained by such parish as the poor of one parish, but that since the date of the said order the said townships of Upper Swinford and Wollaston had been lawfully separated for the maintenance of the poor thereof from the said parish of Old Swinford, and the other townships comprised therein, and that each of the townships of Upper Swinford and Wollaston then maintained its own poor separately; and also reciting that by reason of such separation the ratepayers and owners of property in the said township of Upper Swinford and Wollaston respectively had become entitled, under the provisions of the said last-mentioned Act, separately to elect one guardian at least for each of the said townships, and that the said townships became liable to contribute separately towards the common fund of the union.

The Poor Law Commissioners did, by their order now in recital, order and direct that one guardian of the poor should be separately elected for each of the said townships of Upper Swinford and Wollaston, with the qualification specified in the therein-recited order, wherein the said union was founded.

Similar orders were made by the Poor Law Board as to the other two townships, on separate overseers being appointed for them; and it is agreed that the court may refer to any order of the Poor Law Board mentioned in the case.

14. The whole of the said townships or hamlets which formerly constituted the ecclesiastical parish of Old Swinford, are in the Stourbridge union.

15. Since 1842 there has been no place with separate overseers or with separate poor rates called Old Swinford, but there is still an ecclesiastical parish as before mentioned, called Old Swinford, which is co-extensive with the township of Upper Swinford, in which the said Samuel Smith was born, which township is a place with separate overseers and separate poor rates.

It was contended by the appellants that there is no poor law parish of Old Swinford, in which the paupers could be legally adjudged to be settled, and that the order in question was therefore void; as it in point of fact adjudged them to be settled in the parish of Old Swinford, the only parish of that name being an ecclesiastical parish, and not a parish with overseers, or a parish for which a separate poor rate is made.

It was contended by the respondent, that for the purpose of removal to the Stourbridge poor law union, under the Union Chargeability Act (28 & 29 Vict. c. 79), the paupers could be legally adjudged to be settled in the parish of Old Swinford, in the Stourbridge union, or otherwise in the Stourbridge union by virtue of the birth settlement of Samuel Smith in the township of Upper Swinford, in the parish of Old Swinford, and that the order was therefore properly made.

The question for the opinion of the court, was whether the justices were entitled under the circumstance above stated to make the order of removal (either in its then present, or in an amended form). If the court should answer this question in the affirmative, the order was to be confirmed with costs; if in the negative, the order was to quashed with costs.

Field, Q. C. (with him Poland) for the appellants.—The settlement was destroyed by the destruction of the area in which it was. Three decisions conclude this case: first, Reg. v. The Inhabitants of Tipton (3 Q. B. 215). There a pauper was born a bastard in the workhouse of Halesowen, where her mother was maintained as a pauper belonging to Halesowen. Halesowen consisted of several townships, maintaining their poor jointly; the workhouse was in one of these; and the pauper's mother was settled in Halesowen in respect of a part of Halesowen, which was in another township. After the pauper's birth separate parish officers, under stat. 13 & 14 Car. 2, c. 12, s. 21, were appointed for each of the townships, and thenceforward they maintained their own poor separately. Held, that both under and independently of stat. 54 Geo. 3, c. 170. s. 3, the pauper at her birth was settled in the parish of Halesowen, but not in any particular township; and that she had not, after the separation of the townships, a settlement in the township in which the workhouse was: (See per Lord Denman, C. J., delivering the judgment of the court therein, p. 219.) The division of parishes into townships separately maintaining their own poor was effected by 14 Car. 2, c. 12 (a). Until officers are appointed to relieve the poor of a parish, &c., a settlement there does not come within the definition of "the right acquired in any one of the modes pointed out by the poor laws to become a recipient of the benefit of those laws, in that parish or place which provides for its own poor, where the right has been last acquired:" (Burn's Justice, 30th edit. Tit. Poor, p. 316.) In the case above cited, Lord Denman, C. J., says (p. 222): "To sustain the order of removal into the township of Halesowen, we must hold that a settlement by birth was gained equally in the parish and each of the twelve townships comprising it, for which we can find no warrant of direct authority, or analogy in the law of settlement. It has been suggested as a difficulty, that unless we so hold, the parish, by subdivision, will get rid of settlements, and that persons who would otherwise have gained them may have none. A similar result happened under circumstances nearly the converse of the present in the case of Reg. v. Saighton-on-the-Hill (2 B. & Ald. 162);" and the learned judge, after stating the facts of that case, adds that the necessary effect of the decision of it was to leave the pauper without any settlement at all. As soon as the parish is divided into townships under the statute of Car. 2, all antecedent settlements disappear. In Reg v. The Inhabitants of Hunnington (5 Q. B. 273), the facts were as follows—viz., that part of the parish of Halesowen which lay in Shropshire, consisted of several townships, Hunnington, Oldbury, and others, but maintained its poor out of a common fund administered by officers for the whole of that part of the parish. Afterwards, in obedience to a mandamus, separate appointments of overseers were made for the respective townships, and each then maintained its own poor. Before the subdivision, a pauper was settled in the Shropshire

(a) The 14 Car. 2, c. 12, after reciting that certain counties, "by reason of the largeness of the parishes within the same," are unable to reap the benefit of 43 Eliz. c. 2, enacts that the poor within every township or village within the counties aforesaid shall be maintained within the several and respective township and village wherein he, she, or they shall inhabit, or was or were last lawfully settled, according to the intent and meaning of this Act, and "that there shall be yearly chosen and appointed according to the rules and directions in the said Act of 43 Eliz., two or more overseers of the poor within every of the said townships or villages," &c.

district of Halesowen, by a hiring and service in the township of Hunnington; and it was held that he was not therefore removable to the township of Hunnington as the place of his settlement, when overseers were appointed for that place. Lord Denman, C.J. there says "The principle we acted upon in Reg. v. Tipton (sup.), must decide this case. In Rex v. Saighton-on-the-Hill (sup.), this court decided that although the settlement in the last place of residence was extinct by the destruction of the township, that did not prevent the extinction of the settlement previously acquired." [BLACKBURN, J.—I cannot understand what they mean by the use of the word destroyed. If the parties liked to obtain a mandamus, they could still have compelled Saighton-on-the-Hill to appoint overseers.] The definition of "parish" in Burns's Justice as a "place that provides for its own poor" (sup.), is adopted in 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 109, which declares that "the word parish shall be construed to include any parish, city, borough, town, township, liberty, precinct, vill, village, hamlet, tithing, chapelry, or any other place, or division, or district of a place maintaining its own poor, whether parochial or extra parochial." Then "parish settlement" must mean the right of a pauper to the benefit of the poor law in any parish maintaining its own poor, and the right of the poor law authorities to remove him thither. The case first cited was again approved of in Reg. v. The Inhabitants of Acton (8 Q. B. 114), and in Reg. v. The Inhabitants of St. Martin, New Sarum (9 Q. B. 245) Lord Denman, C. J., says, "The result of the cases arising upon the division of Halesowen may perhaps be regretted; but we had not the power to create a settlement by relation." It is a well known doctrine of this court that the law of settlement should not be lightly disturbed. Then the above cases must govern the decision of the court in the present one, Here the settlement was not in the parish of Old Swinford. The principle of the later legislation has been to make the paupers chargeable where found. In this case there is mere consent of the litigant parishes that the grandfather was born in Old Swinford. [COCKBURN, C. J.—I quite agree that the whole system of settlement is based on false considerations, but that is beside the question to-day.] The Union Chargeability Act 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 79), provides for the removal of paupers to the union or parish in which they shall be settled; and sect. 13 enacts that, "except as herein provided, no alteration shall be made in respect of the settlement of poor persons in parishes." The order could not have been amended, because there was no proof before the justices that the pauper was born in Old Swinford. [LUSH, J.—It is so found as a fact.] The only amendment which would validate the order is one which there is no power to make, viz., to substitute some township for the union of Stourbridge.

Jelf (H. Matthews, Q.C. with him), for the respondents. — As to the last observation, it was intended to submit to the court the question whether in any way an order could be made to fix on the appellant union the charge of maintaining these paupers. No doubt the court would desire to distinguish if possible this case from those cited. [BLACKBURN, J.—Reg. v. Hunnington seems most clearly in point. What say you to it?] The Stourbridge Union was formed in 1836, and if the law as between the union and the different parishes constituting it had been at that time as it now is, then, irrespective of any division under the statute of Charles, that union would have been liable. [BLACKBURN, J.—But union chargeability did not then exist.] If the Union Chargeability Act had come into operation simultaneously with the separation, then Reg. v. Hunnington (sup.) would not have been decided as it was; the ratio decidendi of that case probably being that it was a necessary application of the law of settlements to hold that whereas a liability distributed over an area had been incurred, it would be a hardship to load any one of those townships with the burdens, because before that the parish would have borne the burdens evenly. Now an order made under the Union Chargeability Act really has an operation to distribute over the whole union the burden of any pauper born. [BLACKBURN, J.—But can it be, that if he had not been removeable to any place before the Union Chargeability Act received the royal assent, he would be removeable the day after?] At least the settlement is not available. The argument contra, on the statute of Car. 2, shows the real ground upon which the decisions rest, viz. that there was not machinery to properly carry out the law of settlement. It is conceded by the appellants, that if there had been officers to provide for the poor, the settlement might have been made available. [BLACKBURN, J.—Lord Campbell, C.J. does not say so; while Lord Denman, C.J., and the rest of the court do not expressly say so, although they do give reasons which appear to me equally unsound.] It was only necessary to decide in those cases that each particular settlement then brought into question was not available. Anything said beyond that was extra-judicial. In Reg. v. The Inhabitants of St. Martin New Sarum (sup.), a pauper gained a settlement in parish J. Afterwards, by Act of Parliament J. was united, for all but for ecclesiastical purposes, with parish B. by the title of the United Parishes of J. and B., and it was held that the pauper was settled in the united parishes. [MELLOR, J.—That is, of course, the converse case. They were united, and the burthen of each parish still remained.] The principle is the same. If the effect of the area being destroyed is to destroy the settlement, then, as in the other cases, the settlement would be gone, and it was only by a fair interpretation of the poor laws the court was able to say there was a settlement available against the united parishes. The counsel in the last named case for the respondents was arguing thus: "Here the parish officers of the whole are parish officers for each part; though the converse would not be true," when he was stopped by the court, which shows that the point as to machinery was brought forward. Although the settlement in Upper Swinford may not be available, yet there may be a settlement available in the parish of Old Swinford. [COCKBURN, J.—If you cannot show a settlement within "a parish" you cannot come within the 2nd section of 28 & 29 Vict. c. 79, that presupposes a settlement in a parish. Now here there is no settlement in the parish. The person must be settled in some place in the union.] He may be said to be settled in the old parish. [COCKBURN, C. J.—But that has ceased to exist.] See paragraphs 12 and 13 of the case.

COCKBURN, C. J.—The only satisfaction we can have in deciding this case is the melancholy one of feeling that if we are wrong our illustrious essors were equally liable to error; and er felt more sure that they were wrong

I do in the present instance, for I cannot that by the 14 Car. 2, c. 12, s. 21, it was ded to curtail and abridge the operation of tatute of Elizabeth. The three cases cited ll directly in point, more especially that of
r. Hunnington, and cannot be distinguished the present one. They decided that the of altering a parish by subdividing it into hips separately maintaining their own poor, o annihilate settlements within the original I think that what has been said in the r cases equally applies to the one before us, hat the courts having originally gone wrong ir ruling, we must not produce such un-nty in the decisions on the principles applito poor law settlements as we should do were now to depart from the authorities cited, hat we must abide by them, more especially this case, I am happy to say, our so doing ot be productive of any great hardship—
t all, indeed, to the pauper—and as regards rishes, if the state of the law works unfairly e case, yet, in another, the same decisions e in their favour.

CKBURN, J.—I am entirely of the same
n. We find that from Reg. v. Tipton (rel in 3 Q. B. 219) to Reg. v. St. Martin's, New (in 9 Q. B. 249), on four occasions when the t question has come before the court the have always held according to the decision present case. I quite agree with my Lord hey were originally mistaken; but I also we ought not lightly to upset their judg-
. I say that for this reason, viz., that when does not go to a court of appeal and quite sure that there has been a mistake, not bound to follow on in error, but when atter is not an important point affecting in general, then communis error facit jus is im which we should apply, unless we see tly that the decided cases were founded in e, and that the reversal of them would be ater benefit though unsettling the law.

LOR, J. - I am of the same opinion. If the n question had been recent we should pro-ave felt ourselves at liberty to have said the was wrong; but the first of the decisions we w acting upon was pronounced so long ago, been followed by such a series of cases, that : we should not disturb it.

t, J.—I am of the same opinion I think one of those questions where it is much nportant that the law should be settled than ass how it ought to have been settled.

EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.

Reported by H. LEIGH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Saturday, June 17, 1871.

ERRORS FROM THE EXCHEQUER.

(Before BYLES, BLACKBURN, KEATING, MELLOR, M. SMITH, and LUSH, JJ.)

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. BLACK.

Income tax—5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, ss. 60, 100, scheds. A and D—Local coal dues levied by corporation of Brighton—Liability of, to income tax—Rate of duty—Tolls Tax.

Under a local Act (13 Geo. 3, c. xxxiv.), improvement commissioners for the town of Brighton were empowered to levy a duty of 6d. upon every chaldron of coal, culm, &c., landed on the beach, or brought into, and consumed within, the town, for the purpose of erecting and maintaining groyns and other works against the encroachments of the sea. By a subsequent Act (50 Geo. 8, c. xxxviii.), the duty was continued and increased; and subsequently, by the Brighton Town Improvement Act (6 Geo. 4, c. clxxix.), it was, together with market tolls, and other rates, duties, and assessments, which the said commissioners were empowered to levy, consolidated into a common fund for the general purposes of the Act, which included, in addition to the maintenance of the groyns, &c., the paving, lighting, watching, cleaning, and otherwise improving the town. By the Brighton Commissioners Transfer Act 1855 the said commissioners ceased to act as such, and the corporation and their successors were appointed commissioners in their stead.

Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Exchequer), that the coal duty was a property in respect of which the corporation (who had succeeded to the rights of the commissioners) were liable and bound to pay income tax, either as a "hereditament" under schedule A, or as "property or profits" under schedule D, of the Income Tax Act (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35).

THIS was error upon a judgment of the Court of Exchequer in favour of the Crown, upon a case stated without any pleadings under 22 & 23 Vict. c. 21, s. 10, upon an information filed by the Attorney-General against the defendant, as town clerk of the Corporation of Brighton, to recover penalties incurred by him for not including in the returns under the Income Tax Act (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35) certain duties levied by the corporation under their local Acts upon all coal landed on the beach, or brought within the limits of the town of Brighton.

The facts, shortly summarised, were the following:

The defendant is town clerk of the Corporation of Brighton, which belongs to the port or harbour of Shoreham, in the county of Sussex, and is the proper person to make such returns as are required by the 5 & 6 Vict., c. 35, and the proceeding, though nominally for the recovery of penalties, was, in fact, brought for the purpose of obtaining the decision of the court on the question at issue between the Crown and the corporation, whether the corporation are liable or not to pay income tax upon the amount of the rate or duty, which they levy and receive, in respect of coal, culm, coke, cinders, ashes, and charcoal, landed on the beach, or brought within the limits of the town of Brighton, by virtue of the powers conferred on them by the Acts hereinafter mentioned.

By an Act, 13 Geo. 3, c. xxxiv. (A.D. 1733), intituled "An Act for paving, lighting, and cleansing the streets, lanes, and places within the town of Brighthelmstone, in the county of Sussex, for removing nuisances and annoyances, and preventing the like for the future, for holding and regulating a market within the said town, for building and repairing groyns to render the coast safe and commodious for ships and vessels to unload and land sea coal, culm, and other coal for the use of the inhabitants of the said town, and for levying a duty thereon, and for other purposes," powers were given to the commissioners thereunder to pave, light, and cleanse the streets of the town, and for that purpose to assess and levy rates or assessments, not exceeding 3*s.* in the pound in one year, on the occupiers of all property in the town, and to purchase lands for, and to establish, a market, the rents and profits whereof, after satisfying the moneys borrowed for purchasing the land and establishing the market, were directed to be paid and applied towards the paving, repairing, lighting, and cleansing the said streets, and in repairing the groyns thereafter mentioned. And after reciting that the said town of Brighthelmstone was situate by the seaside, and within six miles of the port or harb ur of Shoreham, and belonged to the said port, and that a great part of the town having been destroyed by the breaking in of the sea, several groyns had been, some years since, erected, and the coast was now safe and commodious for ships and vessels to unload and land sea coal, culm, and other coal on the beach of the said town, for the use of the inhabitants thereof; and that the said groyns were become greatly out of repair, and the inhabitants of the said town were not able to raise money sufficient to repair the same without the aid and authority of Parliament, it was enacted that the said commissioners should be, and they were, thereby constituted and appointed trustees for repairing, improving, maintaining, and preserving the said groyns and other works, as to them should seem most proper; and that for the better effecting and support of the said premises, there should, from and after the 24th June 1773, be paid to them and their successors the sum of 6d. for every chaldron of sea coal, culm, and other coal, that should be landed on the beach of the coast, at the town of Brighthelmstone, with power to the said trustees and their successors to demand and take of and from the masters and owners, or other persons having the rule or command, of every ship, bark, or other vessel, for every chaldron of sea coal, culm, or other coal, landed on the said beach or coast of Brighthelmstone, or otherwise brought into the said town, within the parish of Brighthelmstone aforesaid, the said sum of 6*d.* And the Act gave power to the commissioners to enforce the payment of the said duties through the collector or officer of customs of the port or harbour of Shoreham, and to detain and sell the vessel in case of non-payment of the said rate or duty.

Under that Act the old groyns were preserved and improved, and new ones erected. The rate or duty of 6*d.* mentioned in the said Act, and thereby granted, was duly demanded and paid, and the rents and profits of the market, established under the said Act, were duly collected and applied, as thereby directed, until the year 1810, in which an Act of 50 Geo. 3, c. xxxviii was passed, whereby the Act of 1773 was repealed, and larger and more extensive powers were enacted for the government of the town. Additional powers were given to the said commissioners, as trustees for the repairing, improving, and maintaining the old groyns, and erecting new ones, and the rate or duty on coal, &c., granted by the Act of 1773, was raised to any sum the commissioners might think fit to direct, not exceeding 3*s.* per chaldron, and a drawback of the whole rate or duty paid for every chaldron of coals, landed or unloaded within the town, and which should have been forwarded elsewhere for sale or consumption was provided. And it was enacted that, after the moneys borrowed on the credit of the duties, and of the expenses incurred about the groyns, &c., should have been fully paid, the commissioners were empowered to apply the surplus, arising from the said duty, in aid of the rate for paving, watching, lighting, and cleansing the town, which rate, by other sections of the Act, the commissioners were empowered to assess and levy on occupiers of property in the town, to an amount not exceeding 4*s.* in the pound, in any one year. Fresh powers were also given for enlarging and regulating the market, and the surplus arising from the market, and the rents and tolls thereof, was to be applied in aid of the paving, &c., rate, or of the said coal duty, as the commissioners should think proper.

The town continued to be governed and regulated by the last-mentioned Act, until the passing of the Brighton Town Improvement Act (6 Geo. 4, c. clxxix), passed in 1825, by which the former Acts (13 Geo. 3, c. xxxiv. and 50 Geo. 3, c. xxxviii), were repealed, and by sect. 3, new commissioners were appointed; and it was enacted by sect. 117 that "all the rates, tolls, duties, assessments, and impositions which by this Act were authorised to be rated, levied, assessed, or imposed by the said commissioners (except the rate for watering as aforesaid), should, when received, be consolidated into and form one fund, and be applicable by the commissioners, to be appointed by virtue of this Act, for the general purposes thereof." The general purposes referred to in the above-mentioned sect. 117 include repairing, lighting, watching, and cleansing the streets, lanes, and other public passages and places within the town (sects. 31, 33, 34, 37, 41, 50, 59, 60, 70); the providing of fire engines (sect. 61); the purchase of lands, &c., for widening and improving streets, or for providing a site for a town hall (sect. 97); the erection of a town hall, the enlargement of the market, the erection of a town pound, and providing a prison (sect. 139); the establi hment of an additional market for the sale of provisions, if deemed expedient (sect. 148); and the establishment of a cattle, corn, and hay market (sect. 149). The rates, tolls, duties, assessments, and impositions mentioned in the said section include the rates or dutes levied on coal, &c., the tolls of the market, and all other sums receivable by the commissioners or the governing body of the town, as well as all sums levied by way of rates assessed upon occupiers, except the water rate. And by the same Act the Commissioners were authorized to repair, improve, maintain, or remove the groyns, walls, or other fences and works already erected and built for the protection of the town from the encroachments of the sea, and also from time to time to erect, set up, build, repair, and maintain such other groyns, walls, jetties, piers, and works for the better protection of the said town, &c., and for facilitating the approach to the sea, and the landing of coals and other merchandise on the beach or shore of the said town. And they were also thereby empowered to levy a rate or duty not exceeding 3*s.* for every chaldron of coals, &c., landed on the beach of the said town, or in any other manner, by land carriage or otherwise brought or delivered within the limits of the said town. By sect. 171 a drawback of the whole rate or duty paid is provided for upon all coal, &c. landed or unloaded within the limits of the Act, for the purpose of being forwarded to any other place, and not to be consumed within the said limits.

The Court of Exchequer (Kelly, C.B. and Martin and Channell, BB.) held, that the said coal duty was a property in respect of which the corporation were liable and bound to pay income tax, whether as a "hereditament" under Schedule A, or as "property or profits" under Schedule D of the Income Tax Act (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35). (See the case below fully reported, and the various statutes set out at length, ante p. 62; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 370; 40 L. J. 89, Ex.; L. Rep. 6 Ex. 78.)

The defendant having brought error upon the above decision of the Court of Exchequer, Manisty, Q.C. (with him was D. A. Freeman) appeared to argue the case on behalf of the defendants, and

The Attorney-General (Sir R. P. Collier, Q.C.) (with whom were The Solicitor-General (Sir J. D. Coleridge, Q.C.) and C. Hutton) argued contra, on behalf of the Crown.

The same arguments were urged on either side as were used in the court below.

BYLES, J.—After paying the fullest attention to the argument of Mr. Manisty, I am of opinion that the judgment of the court below must be affirmed. It seems to me that these dues are, at all events, in the nature of "tolls," under rule 3, of No. 111, sect. 60, of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35. With respect to the incidence of this impost, one thing is quite plain, viz., that it originally falls on the importers, the shipowners or others engaged in the importation of the coals. What its ultimate incidence may be, it is not perhaps necessary to inquire, and it would be very difficult to ascertain; but, at all events, this observation may be made, that the incidence of the tax falls at last upon strangers as well as upon the inhabitants of Brighton. With reference to the benefit of the tax, there is no doubt who has the benefit of it. The benefit is taken solely by the taxpayers of Brighton, there being a wide discretion as to its application. On these short grounds I entertain no doubt whatever that the decision in the court below was right.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion.—I apprehend that the question raised really is on the construction of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35; by schedule A. of which Act an income tax, or property tax was granted to Her Majesty in these terms: "For all lands, tenements, and hereditaments or heritages" (the word "heritages" evidently applying to Scotland), "in Great Britain, there shall be charged yearly in respect of the property thereof," so much. Then, as applying to schedule A., there are the rules to which I will call attention presently; and then comes schedule D., by which "upon the annual profits or gains arising or accruing to any person residing in Great Britain, from any kind of property whatever, whether situated in Great Britain or elsewhere, there shall be charged yearly "the same sum." Then, when we come to the rules appertaining to schedule D, which are given in sect. 100, we find it is enacted that "the said last-mentioned duties" (that is, those under schedule D.), "shall extend to every description of property or profit which shall not be contained in either of the said schedules A, B, or C." As Martin, B. observed, in the court below, those words are very extensive indeed. He said, "It seemed almost impossible that any net could be extended more widely, for every possible source of income seems included;" and I agree with him that it is a most extensive and wide net; still, I do not think that it embraces everything in the sense that any money which any body corporate or otherwise receives would necessarily become taxable under this Act. Wide as the words are, I think it must be something in the nature of the property mentioned in the schedule A and the rules attached to it, and consequently I think it would not apply to such a matter, as, for instance, the amount which a municipal corporation receives from the borough rate, or the amount which the guardians of the poor receive from the poor rate, or the amount which a highway board receive from the highway rate, because I do not think that these things which I have mentioned, assessments of borough rates, or poor rates, or highway rates, come within the analogy of the description of "property or profits," which are what are mentioned. But then comes the question, whether this particular rate or duty, which the Corporation of Brighton receive under a local Act, does come within the description of "property or profits?" After listening attentively to all that Mr. Manisty has said upon it, I have come to the conclusion that it does. In the first place, we find that the 3rd sub-section of rule No. 3, applicable to schedule A, is as follows: "Of iron works, gas works, salt springs, or works, alum mines or works, waterworks, streams of water, canals, inland navigations, docks, drains, and levels, fishings, rights of markets and fairs, tolls, railways and other ways, bridges, ferries, and other concerns of the like nature." Therefore where we find "fairs" and "tolls" mentioned it seems quite clear that the Legislature meant to say "profits and property" arising from the proceeds of "tolls of markets and fairs," and other tolls too, and that would include harbour dues, port dues, and all dues of that description. It seems clear that these things were intended to be included under the head of property in schedule A, and that it embraces them. Then, when we find afterwards that schedule D is to extend to every kind of property, which is not contained in schedule A, and the other schedule, I think, we must take this as a wide and sweeping description, applying to everything ejusdem generis with those things named in schedule A. And consequently market tolls, or harbour dues, or dues which a corporation, or anyone else, receives in consequence of holding the franchise of a market; dues attached to goods brought into the market to be sold, or dues, such as port dues which are frequently charged upon goods brought into a harbour, all which were originally granted to the owner of the port in consideration of his keeping up the port in that way, are clearly, as it seems to me, brought within schedule A. as being under the word "tolls." And I think that the general sweeping words in schedule D would include everything of that kind. So the question came to this, whether this duty, imposed upon coal, &c., in Brighton, is of the same kind as a harbour duty or toll? I must just observe, in passing, that I think that, although this money when received is directed by the local Act to be brought into a general fund, where it is to be applied with a great many other things, some of which would be clearly taxable (such as market tolls and others), whereas others would clearly not be taxable according to my view (such as the district rate), though they are all brought into the common fund to be applied to this common purpose, I do not think that that affects the question. I think the principle to be adopted, is that which was adopted in the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Cameron (35 L. J. 1, M. C., in the H. of L.; 11 H. of L. Cas. 443-35; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 643). I thinkt hat where the property is, in its nature, clearly subject to a particular tax (in that case it was the poor rate) then, though the profits, when received, are to be appropriated by Act of Parliament to a particular purpose, it is the profits, after discharging those incidents, which the law has allowed to them. In that case it was the poor rate; here it is the income tax. If the profits be taxable I do not think that the purposes to which they are to be applied renders them untaxable. This duty is a duty originally granted, partly in consideration of supporting the groyns and sea wall, and partly in ease of the inhabitants in their taxes. It is a duty granted upon all coals and a particular class of goods brought and landed within Brighton. And it seems to me that that is strictly ejusdem generis with those tolls, petty customs, and dues of that sort, which are frequently granted by the prerogative of the Crown, to the owner of a market, in respect of his franchise on all goods brought into the market for the purpose of sale; or, in the case of a port, on all goods brought and landed in the port. These would be clearly property, and clearly subject to income tax. Until of late years the corporation of Liverpool received 100,000*l.* a year town dues on goods imported and landed within the Mersey, and that amount used to go to the borough fund, and was appropriated like all other property. Clearly that would have been taxable as tolls, ejusdem generis with the "tolls of fairs" mentioned in sub-sect. 3 of Rule III., Schedule A. Probably it would come directly under the word "tolls," but they would, at all events, be taxable property. Now that has been taken away and appropriated to the Mersey Board, and does not any longer form part of the funds of the Corporation of Liverpool at all. I think myself that what the Brighton Corporation have granted to them here by the Legislature —viz., the right to levy a tax upon coals—is ejusdem generis with that, and consequently that the wide and general words, to which Martin, B., alluded, would include it. I do not think that the net is so wide as to catch things that are not in the nature of property, but I think that it is wide enough to catch all moneys received in the nature of property; and I think that such a grant as this by Act of Parliament of a toll to be levied by the Corporation of Brighton, is ejusdem generis with markets, and fairs, and tolls, and royalties, specially mentioned under Schedule A.

Keating, J.—I am of the same opinion. The argument is brought, in truth, to a very narrow point. On the one hand, Mr. Manisty did not contend that harbour dues, and impositions of that character, would not be taxable; and, on the other hand, the Attorney-General admitted that a district rate would clearly not come within the Income Tax Act. The simple question then is, whether the rate or duty in question is more in the nature of one than of the other of these classes of payments. Now it does not partake of the character of a district rate—a rate which is imposed by the inhabitants of the borough, through their representatives, upon themselves; but it seems to me that it not only partakes of the nature of a harbour toll, but that it is extremely difficult to distinguish it, in principle, from such a toll, and I entirely agree with the observations of my brother Blackburn, that the purpose to which, when collected, it is applied, cannot make a distinction which would prevent this rate or duty being taxable under the Income Tax Act. Therefore I think that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer is right, and ought to be affirmed.

Mellor, J.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that this is "property;" that it is a source of income to the corporation, and though they have the power apparently, of diminishing it or raising it up to a point not exceeding 3*s.* a chaldron, yet it is a rate or duty which they are empowered to impose, and which appears to have been granted to them as a corporation, for the repair of the groyns and other works, necessary for the protection of the coast at Brighton; and it appears to me, therefore, that it is certainly made more in the nature of a harbour due, than it is in the nature of a direct tax upon the district. I think it is quite distinguishable from that, because it is, undoubtedly, as my brother Byles observed, levied in the first instance upon all the importers of coal, and paid by them. The question is, what is it when it is received, not when it is amalgamated and mixed with the other moneys, which consist, partly, probably, of matters not taxable, and partly, probably, of matters that are taxable?

M. Smith, J.—I am of the same opinion. Mr. Manisty has said all that can be said in support of the view that this payment is more in the nature of a rate or assessment than of a "toll." But, on the whole, I think that his argument is not sufficient to impeach the judgment of the Court of Exchequer. I quite agree that the purpose for which the payment is made cannot be regarded, if the thing is in nature "property or profits." It can only be regarded, and so I understand Mr. Manisty to put it, as one of the circumstances in coming to a conclusion whether the payment is more in the nature of a tax than of a toll; and in that view of it, and in that view of it only, the purpose and object of the payment may be regarded. On the whole, the argument has not satisfied me that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer is wrong, and therefore I am of opinion that it should be affirmed.

Lush, J.—I am also of opinion that the amount of these dues is a "profit" within the meaning of the Income Tax Act. And I think that there is an essential distinction between these dues and a district rate, to which Mr. Manisty has compared them. These dues are granted by Parliament to the corporation of Brighton, upon the importation of coals, and the other matters named, and they are payable upon the importation by the person ting, and without any act of the corporation. become a debt accruing to them on the tation of the coals, &c., whether the corpora- equire the amount or not; and I cannot agree Mr. Manisty that any importer could resist ayment of this duty upon the plea that the ration do not need it. It seems to me that, g as the Act of Parliament exists, these dues ayable; the amount payable becomes a debt o the corporation by the person importing, the importation, a drawback being allowed should afterwards appear that the coals are ted for the mere purpose of being consumed me other place. The dues are payable as as the Act of Parliament exists, whether the ration need the amount or not. A district to which these dues have been compared, and other rate, properly so called, is an impo- made by the authorities themselves; a call by the local authority on a given class of itants, viz., "upon the occupiers of rateable rty within the district. That is to be made time to time as occasion requires and for sary purposes. The corporation cannot make rates except for necessary purposes, whereas dues are a payment made without any act on the part of the corporation, and without quiry whether they need the amount or not. fore I am clearly of opinion that these dues ot in the nature of rates, but that they are in ature of "property or profits," and are there- roperly assessable to income tax under the ution of union—Clerk to the guardians— pensation for loss of office—Business of rney—Emoluments—"Goodwill" of employ- d—Order of Poor Law Board—30 & 31 Vict. 06, s. 20—Consolidated Orders of Poor Law missioners.

31 Vict. c. 106, s. 20, enacts that when any n shall be dissolved, if any person shall by ns of such dissolution be deprived of any office mployment, the Poor Law Board may, accord- to their judgment, award a compensation to aid to such person, and shall direct the same e paid out of the poor rate of the parish or ishes for which such person was acting at the of the dissolution.

clerk to the board of guardians of an union. g also an attorney, it was his duty to perform execute, without charge for anything beyond ursements, all legal business connected with nion, or in which the guardians should be ged, except prosecutions at the assizes or rior or general sessions or Central Criminal rt, all other proceedings at the said quarter or ral sessions, actions, and other proceedings he Superior Courts of Law, suits and other proceedings in the Superior Courts of Equity and Parliamentary business: (Consolidated Order Amalgamated Order of Poor Law Commissioners 1866, Art. 3.)

Lands belonging to the guardians having been taken by a railway company, B. was instructed to conduct proceedings on behalf of the guardians at inquisitions holden by the sheriff under the Lands Clauses Act, and performed, and was paid for such services.

The union was dissolved, whereupon B. applied to the Poor Law Board to award him compensation for the loss of his office and emoluments.

Accordingly the Poor Law Board made an order awarding compensation, in assessing which they took into consideration the profits he had derived from transacting the above-mentioned legal business, and allowed a specific sum for the loss of the same.

On a rule nisi for a certiorari:

Held, that they were justified in so doing, as the business performed at sheriff's inquisitions was of the exceptional kind for which the clerk might reasonably charge and be paid within the spirit of the Consolidated Order 1866, art. 3, and as the profits he made thereby were part of the "goodwill" of the office.

RULE nisi calling upon the defendants to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue to remove a certain order made by them into this court for the purpose of being quashed, on the ground that they had exceeded their jurisdiction in making it.

On the dissolution of an union Mr. Baylis, the clerk to the guardians, who was also an attorney, made an application to the defendants, the Poor Law Board, for compensation for the loss of his office as clerk, which he had held for thirty-two years.

It appeared that during his tenure of such office he had been instructed by the guardians to conduct proceedings on their behalf before the sheriff respecting the assessment of compensation for lands taken by a railway company, under the Railway and Land Clauses Acts. For such law business he was paid sums in addition to his salary as clerk. The guardians might have employed another attorney if they had chosen so to do.

The defendants made an order under 30 & 31 Vict. c. 106, s. 20, whereby they awarded payment to him of a sum for compensation, in assessing which they estimated the emoluments of his office as enhanced by the extra profits derived by him from the above employment at the sheriff's inquisitions, and gave a specific sum of 169*l.* 10*s.* for the loss of such additional law business.

They computed this particular sum by taking the average of those profits for the three years last before the dissolution of the union.

The facts appeared from affidavits, but were undisputed, and are more fully stated in the judgment of the court.

This order was objected to by the union, out of whose poor rate the sum awarded was directed to be paid, on the ground that the Poor Law Board had exceeded their jurisdiction in awarding the sum of 169*l.* 10*s.* for the loss of the extra profits above-mentioned.(a)

(a) The Consolidated Order of the Poor Law Commissioners, 24th July 1847, Art. 172, directs that, "The guardians shall pay to the several officers and assistants appointed to, or holding any office or employment under

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Collier, Q.C.) (with him Lumley) showed cause.—The Poor Law Board were the judges as to the amount of compensation to be awarded: 30 & 31 Vict. c. 106, s. 20. They have exercised their discretion fairly, proceeding on principles analagous to those adopted by the Treasury in making superannuation allowances under certain statutes. It is the practice, after forty years' service, to give as compensation two thirds of the value of the office. Here the clerk had served only thirty-two years, but they considered that he was deprived of his office, and, therefore, gave him compensation for what they deemed the office to be worth. They were arbitrators. [BLACKBURN, J.—Even if they were such in the strictest sense of the word, yet, if they took into consideration matters which they were not entitled to consider, we may review their award: the whole question is, were they limited to making compensation for the loss of the actual salary of the office, or might they take into computation matters clearly ultra, as part of the goodwill of the office.] The words of sect. 20 are wide: "The Poor Law Board may, according to their judgment, award a compensation." No restrictive words follow, such as "for the loss of his office." [BLACKBURN, J.—They do not say for what, but plainly mean "for the deprivation." The Poor Law Board put this construction on their consolidated orders, viz., that the guardians must employ their clerk, if he be an attorney, in law business, but had they intended to exclude him from the benefit of any conceivable payment for business other than that of the class specified in those orders, they would have said so. If he had negotiated with a purchaser for the sale of his office, he would have estimated the whole profits in the valuation of it. The court will not question the discretion exercised by the defendants unless it appears to have been wrongly exercised, and will not set their award aside unless it is clearly shown to have been made without jurisdiction.

Jelf (appearing for the Clerk to the Union) (a) was not required to argue.

Prentice Q.C. and Mortimer, in support of the rule.—The mode in which the amount of compensation was computed is admitted. There are express provisions for the removal of the rules made by the Poor Law Board into this Court clearly proving that excess of their jurisdiction may always be shown here. [BLACKBURN, J.—I do not think that is questioned.] The Act gives compensation for loss of office. This case comes within the first part of the Consolidated Order 1866, Art. 3, for the clerk being an attorney, it was his duty to "perform and execute, without charge for anything beyond disbursements, all legal business." There are certain exceptions within which he did not come. [BLACKBURN, J.—Not within the letter of them, perhaps.] The defendants rely on Art. 172 of the Order of 1847, by which it is provided "that the guardians, with the approval of the commissioners, may pay to any officer or person employed by such guardians a reasonable compensation on account of extraordinary services, or other unforeseen circumstances connected with the duties of such officer or person, or the necessities of the union." These moneys were paid by the union to their clerk for his services touching the railway compensation cases, but there is nothing to show that such payments were made "with the approval" of the Poor Law Board. [BLACKBURN, J.—Nor is it necessary. Who can doubt that, if the guardians had applied to the commissioners, they would have sanctioned those payments made without express authority?] Performing this legal business cannot be called "extraordinary services." [BLACKBURN, J.—Conducting compensation cases before the sheriff is quite within the spirit of the proviso, and the commissioners would surely have said it was work for which the clerk should be remunerated. MELLOR.—And we have nothing to do with the quantum.] He is bound to perform all legal business for 200*l.*; if there is extraordinary work to be done the guardians might employ some other attorney, and pay him. [BLACKBURN, J.—Though he has no absolute right to the extra work and emoluments therefrom, that does not defeat his claim to compensation for the loss of them if he is deprived of the office to which they were incident.] Points of a similar kind have arisen on the Municipal Corporation Act. In Reg. v. The Mayor of Manchester (3 Q. B. 402), it was held that an attorney could not, under stat. 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 66, or 5 & 6 Vict. c. 111, s. 2, claim compensation for fees and emoluments which he derived from being employed by the justices of a division to prosecute offenders committed by them for trial, where the prosecutor did not employ another attorney. Lord Denman, C. J. there said: "With respect to the value of Mr. Milne's office as clerk to the magistrates, the court is most clearly the order, such salaries or remuneration as the commissioners may from time to time direct or approve: Provided that the guardians, with the approval of the commissioners, may pay to any officer or person employed by such guardians, a reasonable compensation on account of extraordinary services, or other unforeseen circumstances connected with the duties of such officer or person, or the necessities of the union: (Glen's Poor Law Board Orders, 7th edit., p. 129.)

By Consolidated Order Amendment Order, 26th Feb. 1866, after rescinding former articles as regards the duties of the clerk, it is ordered that "It shall be his duty (art. 3), to conduct all applications by or on behalf of the guardians, to any justice or justices of petty or special sessions or out of sessions; and, if he be an attorney or solicitor, to perform and execute, without charge for anything beyond disbursements, all legal business connected with the union, or in which the guardians shall be engaged, except prosecutions at the assizes or quarter or general sessions, or Central Criminal Court, all other proceedings at the said quarter or general sessions, actions and other proceedings in the Superior Courts of Law, suits and other proceedings in the Superior Courts of Equity and Parliamentary business: (Ibid. p. 287.)

30 & 31 Vict. c. 106, s. 20, enacts that when any union shall have been or shall be dissolved, or when any parish shall have been or shall be placed under the management of a board of guardians, the time passed in the service of such union or parish prior to such dissolution or the constitution of such board, shall be deemed service which the guardians of any other union comprising such parish, or the board of guardians for such parish, may, if they think fit, take into consideration in any case where an officer applies for a superannuation allowance; and if any person shall by means of such dissolution be deprived of any office or employment, the Poor Law Board may according to their judgment, award a compensation to be paid to such person, either in a sum certain or by way of annuity, and shall direct the same to be paid out of the poor rate of the parish or parishes for which such person was acting at the time of the dissolution, in such manner and according to such proportions as to the said board shall appear equitable.

of opinion that he has no claim to compensation for the loss of professional gains, such as were formerly received by him in respect of the prosecution of offenders by desire of the magistrates. That is not a species of patronage which belongs to them, and is no ground of compensation." [Lumley referred to Reg. v. The Mayor of Norwich (3 Q. B. 285), where the Lords of the Treasury, in awarding compensation to B. under 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 66, for the loss of the offices of town clerk and clerk of the peace, gave a sum, as they stated in their minute, for the loss of employment in matters relating to certain charity trusts which were under the management of the corporation of the borough, and it was held that the Lords had jurisdiction to make an allowance in this respect; that B. was entitled to compensation for loss of the last mentioned employment when the Act came into operation, and that supposing any deduction due on account of his continuing to be employed afterwards, that was a question of amount as to which the award was final.] See, however, the judgments in that case. Here the statute enables the Poor Law Board to give compensation in those cases only where a person is "deprived of an office or employment." Those words are synonymous; "employment" has not a more extended meaning than "office;" if the words had been "office or employment" it would have been otherwise. It might actually happen that the guardians might now employ their late clerk as an attorney to do the business in respect of the loss of which compensation has been given to him. [BLACKBURN, J.—But now he has only the same chance of being so employed that every other attorney has, and no more.] It is not an inseparable incident to the clerkship of the guardians that the clerk should do legal business for which he is to be paid, and therefore the value of the emoluments now in question ought not to have been estimated in awarding compensation for the loss of the office.

BLACKBURN, J.—I think, when we once understand the facts of this case, that there is no ground for saying that the Poor Law Board exercised their jurisdiction wrongly, and I am far from saying they have not exercised it as I, for one, should have done, had I been in their place. Sect. 20 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 106, says that "where by the dissolution of an union any person shall be deprived of any office or employment, the Poor Law Board may, according to their judgment, award a compensation to be paid to such person;" plainly, of course, meaning that they are to award compensation for deprivation of office and employment. And I think also, that, although the words used are "according to their judgment," the meaning is, that they are not to be liberal with other persons' money, but to apply their judgment in seeing what is fair compensation. Here they have taken into computation all Mr. Baylis's salary and emoluments of the office of clerk. As to the first no doubt they were right, and to the second, when the rule was moved, we thought he was fairly entitled. Then, besides that, they say that he, being a solicitor, was deprived of certain work which produced profits. The Poor Law Board estimated those profits in the following manner. Having ascertained the amount of the profits in three years and divided it, they obtained an average, and said it shall be taken into the account. That was by no means a perfect way of assessing compensation, for the two or three years selected for the calculation might have been profitless, or, on the other hand, the profits might during those years have been exceptionally large; nevertheless, for a rough mode of assessing compensation, that seems fair enough. They have taken the profits of three years as representing with tolerable accuracy the average of the business. The particular thing dwelt on in argument is this, viz., during that time lands belonging to the board of guardians were taken by a railway company, and disputes arose as to the amount of compensation to be paid for the lands, consequently proceedings were instituted and an inquisition set on foot before a sheriff, and a warrant obtained by the railway company for a jury to assess the compensation for the taking of the lands. Mr. Baylis, being an attorney and clerk to the guardians, was employed about this business, and, besides costs out of pocket, he became entitled to his charges for doing the work. Mr. Prentice laid stress on the terms of the order of the Poor Law Board, before this Act of Parliament passed—that the clerk shall transact all legal business, with certain exceptions therein specified; but the order did not mention among those matters enumerated, proceedings to assess compensation under the Lands Clauses Act; therefore it was contended Mr. Baylis was bound to attend to those without salary; but then, as has been pointed out, there was a prior order in which the Poor Law Board declared that if the clerk has had unusual or extraordinary matters to transact for which he ought to have compensation, the guardians may give it, with the assent of the Poor Law Commissioners. Here the commissioners were unaware of what the clerk had to do, and it is likely that they would have said, if they had been aware of it, that the employment of him in such matters as compensation cases was within the spirit of the Act of Parliament, and that he ought to be paid, and they would sanction payments made to him. Clearly, the commissioners would have sanctioned that. Now comes the important question, are the Poor Law Board, when estimating the compensation to be given for deprivation of an office, tied down to things strictly and legally attached to the office, or are they entitled to say, "It is worth so much besides the actual value of the salary attached to it"? When he entered upon the office it was almost a certainty that it would bring him emoluments arising from legal business done for the union. It is true the guardians might quarrel with their clerk, and, without violating the Act of Parliament, might take the business from him and give it to someone else, but still in all ordinary cases the clerk would be likely to have it; and may not the Poor Law Board take into computation what they would give for the "goodwill"? There is an analogy between this case and cases of compensation under the Lands Clauses Act. You give a man compensation for his house, and take into consideration the fact that it was an old established house of good custom, and that the owner or occupier will suffer from the loss of that. True it is a precarious loss to estimate, but being de facto a loss arising from the taking of the house, it is always considered in assessing compensation. Now that seems a precise and strict analogy, and shows that the "goodwill" is to be taken into account in estimating the loss of the office. Reg. v. The Mayor of Norwich (8 Ad. & E. 633) seems to point to the same principle. There a gentleman held an office which in law was of annual tenure only, but which in practice and fact was enjoyed during good behaviour. He was removed from it by the town council without reason assigned, and they chose to assess compensation for one year only. On appeal by him to the Lords of the Treasury, they considered that de facto the office was one worth in profits to him as much as an office for life, and on that principle they assessed compensation. The Court of Queen's Bench held that the Lords of the Treasury had a right so to do, and some of the court said that they had exercised their discretion soundly. No doubt that was only an opinion, but still one with which I am inclined to agree; for when there is a deprivation of an office, the principle to follow is to give the person compensation as if the late holder had not been deprived. In Reg v. The Mayor of Manchester (sup.), the court thought, and thought rightly, that the clerk to the justices ought not to receive compensation for the loss of that which, I think, was much too remote to be taken into consideration. I think, therefore, the present rule must and should be discharged on the ground that the Poor Law Board did not exercise their jurisdiction improperly, but took into account matters which they were justified in taking into account. With the amount of compensation given by them we have not to interfere.

MELLOR, J.—Under the statute enabling the order to be brought up to be quashed, our exercise of jurisdiction must depend on whether we are satisfied that the order was one with which we should interfere. But here it was a question of quantum. Some of the arguments addressed to us were directed to the question of amount. With that I think we have nothing to do. I do not, for myself, say that the language of all the judges who decided the cases on the Municipal Corporations Act is quite reconcileable, but the principle on which they all rest their judgments is clear enough, and is well illustrated by Reg. v. The Mayor and Corporation of Norwich (8 Ad. & E. 633). There two judges expressed their opinion that the Lords of the Treasury had exercised their powers rationally, and another judge was silent upon that point, and said merely he thought they had discretion to amend the compensation they had awarded. In this particular case I should be very disinclined to interfere with the quantum, which the Poor Law Board are much more competent to assess than we are. Clearly such business as conducting cases at sheriff inquisitions is kindred to all those things enumerated in the Act of Parliament, and was therefore incident. not to his office of attorney, but to his office of attorney and clerk to the guardians of the union. It is sufficient to say that though Mr. Prentice has failed to satisfy me that we have the power or ought to interfere in this case, my opinion is that the Poor Law Board have exercised their jurisdiction reasonably.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

July 31, and Aug. 1, 1871.

(Before the LORDS JUSTICES.)

Re THE PROFESSIONAL, COMMERCIAL, AND INDUSTRIAL BUILDING SOCIETY.

Winding-up—Benefit building society—Advanced members—Borrowing power—Illegality—Discretion of the court—Regard to wishes of creditors and contributories—"Just and equitable"—The Companies Act 1862, s. 79, cl. 5.

The court will not make an order to wind-up a Benefit Building society compulsorily on the petition of advanced members, contrary to the wishes of the majority of the creditors and the contributories, unless a plain injustice will be done to the petitioners by refusing the order.

The trustees of a Benefit Building society under 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, were by the rules authorised from time to time, as might be necessary for the purposes of the society, to borrow money, for which they might give their own personal security, and they were to be indemnified out of the first funds of the society which should be received. The society owed about 19,000*l. to* 105 depositors, most of whom were not members. There was also 4300*l. due to the society's bankers, and there were a few other debts which brought up the total of debts to about* 25,000*l. The assets were estimated as worth* 24,500*l. There were fifty-five advanced and twenty-four unadvanced members. The society became involved in difficulties, principally by reason of a number of notices to withdraw deposits having been given. The directors reported that the business must be closed, and proposed an amalgamation with another society of a similar nature. This proposition was approved by seventy-seven of the depositors, and at a meeting of the members, at which forty-four members were present, the proposition was approved, two only dissenting. Four advanced members, one of whom was in arrear in making the repayments due from him, petitioned to have the society wound-up compulsorily, alleging that it could not pay its debts, that it would be just and equitable to make a winding-up order, and that there had been an erroneous division of alleged profits among the members. After the petition was presented the bankers released the petitioners from their debt, as did nearly the whole of the depositors, and the trustees of the society covenanted to indemnify the petitioners from the remaining debts:*

Held (reversing a decision of Wickens, V.C.), that no winding-up order ought to be made:

Held, also, that the rule authorising the borrowing of money was bad, and that the society could not be sued for the sums due to the depositors.

THIS was an appeal by the above society, which was a Benefit Building society at Birmingham, formed under the Act 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, and having its rules duly certified, from an order made by Wickens, V.C., to wind-up the society compulsorily. The trustees of the society and some of the members joined in the appeal. The petition on which the order was made was presented by four advanced members of the society named Smart, Hall, Dutson, and Edwards. Edwards had committed default in making repayments due by him to the society.

The society was established in June, 1865, its objects being "to enable each member to receive out of the funds the amount or value of his share therein, each share not to exceed the sum of 120*l.*, to erect or purchase one or more dwelling-house or dwelling-houses, or other real or leasehold estate, to be secured by way of mortgage to the society until the amount or value of his shares shall have been fully repaid with the interest thereon, and all fines and other payments incurred in respect thereof."

A new rule was made in March, 1870, and duly certified, which provided that "the trustees for the time being may, from time to time, as may be necessary for the purposes of the society, borrow and take up money at interest from any banker with whom the funds of the society shall be deposited, or from any other person, to procure which the trustees may give their own personal security, and they shall be indemnified out of the first funds of the society which shall be received."

At the time when the petition was presented, the society consisted of seventy-nine members, of whom fifty-five were advanced and twenty-four unadvanced. The assets were, according to evidence given by the secretary, worth 24,579*l.* 14*s.*, and the debts amounted to 25,117*l.* 17*s* 1*d.*, leaving a balance of 538*l.* 3*s.* 1*d.* against the society. The assets consisted principally of sums lent to advanced members, and secured by mortgages given by them to the society, the sums being repayable in periodical instalments. The debts included a sum of 4267*l.* 0*s.* 9*d.*, due to the society's bankers; a total of 19,100*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.*, due to 105 depositors, most of whom were not members of the society; 1700*l.* 10*s.* 1*d.*, owing to unadvanced members, and 50*l.* due for rent. On the 25th May 1871, a meeting of the members of the society was held, and the directors then reported that there were no funds available to advance to members in consequence of the large withdrawal of deposits which had been made, and that it was necessary to close the business of the society. They submitted to the meeting for their approval a proposal for an amalgamation with another similar society, called the Queen's Building Society, which was willing, upon certain conditions, to assume the liabilities of the Professional Society. This proposal had already received the assent of seventy-seven of the depositors. Forty-four members attended the meeting, and a resolution was carried authorising the carrying out of the proposed amalgamation with the Queen's Society. Two members only dissented from this resolution, and these were Edwards, one of the petitioners, and a Mr. Walker.

According to the allegations of the petitioners, depositors to the amount of 5000*l.* had given notices to withdraw their deposits, and the contributions of advanced and investing members, coming in at stated periods in small sums, were wholly insufficient to provide for the demands of the depositors. It was further alleged that large sums of money had been divided as profits among investing and advanced members, whereas there had been an erroneous calculation made, there having been in fact no profits earned, or at any rate a much less sum than had been actually divided. Investing members, it was alleged, had been allowed to withdraw from the society, removing in cash their capital, and also the profits allocated to them, thus leaving the advanced members liable for the debts of the society, and without sufficient assets to enable them to redeem their mortgaged properties, upon the terms of including in their account with the society the share of profits which had been allocated to them respectively. It was further alleged that it was just and equitable that the society should be wound-up; that it had, in fact, ceased to do any business, and that it existed only for the purpose of winding-up its affairs.

The Vice-Chancellor, on hearing the petition, thought that a sufficient case was shown for a winding-up order; but he allowed the drawing-up of the order to be postponed to give the society an opportunity of entering into a compromise with the petitioners. The result of this was that the bankers of the society were induced to execute a deed whereby they absolutely released the petitioners from the debt of 4267*l.* 0*s.* 9*d.* due to them, and that almost all the depositors executed a similar deed as to their respective debts. With regard to the remaining claims of creditors, the five trustees of the society executed another deed by which they personally covenanted to indemnify the petitioners against those claims, which amounted in the whole to only 592*l.* 15*s.*

The Vice-Chancellor, however, was still of opinion that a winding-up order must be made, and he accordingly made the order now appealed from.

Karslake, Q.C. and Ince, on behalf of the appellants, relied upon Re The Suburban Hotel Company (L. Rep. 2 Ch. App. 737; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 22), as showing that the court would have regard to the wishes of a majority of the members of the society, and further argued that the society was not legally liable for the sum borrowed on deposit, and that, even if it were, the petitioners were now fully protected by means of the releases and indemnity which had been given by the three deeds executed since the petition was presented. On these points they referred to:

Graham Hastings, on behalf of Walker, desired to be heard in support of the Vice-Chancellor's order.

Their Lordships, however, decided that he must be taken to be practically on the same side as the petitioners, and therefore could not be heard, the rule of their Lordships now being not to hear more than two counsel on the same side.

Karslake, Q.C. was called upon to reply only in respect of the costs of the petition. He argued that it ought to have been dismissed with costs.

Lord Justice JAMES said: With all respect to the Vice-Chancellor, I am of opinion that a proper case has not been shown for an order to wind-up this society. This is a petition of contributories, and of contributories who are all of them in fact debtors to the society, for they are all persons who have received advances, and in respect of which they are mortgagors to the society. One of them, the man whose petition this really is—Edwards—is not only a debtor to the society, but he is in arrear in respect of a sum which he ought to have paid; and one cannot help seeing that the real object of the petition was to try and get the question settled between him and the society as to the terms upon which he was entitled to redeem. That was substantially the object with which the petition was presented. That is not a proper object for a winding-up petition to settle a dispute between one member of the society and the society as to the terms upon which he is to redeem some particular property which he has mortgaged to them. Then, he says, "I have a strict right. I am a contributory," and one of the grounds alleged in the petition is that the society is unable to pay its debts, and the other is that it is just and equitable (that being the general expression at the end of the 79th clause of the Act of Parliament), under the circumstances of the case, that the society should be wound-up.

Now with regard to the debts. Certainly the petitioners have not given the statutory proof of the existence of the debts which the company is unable to pay, because the statutory proof is that an action should be brought, or that there should be a demand made in the nature of a summons in bankruptcy, and that the amount has not been paid, unless it is proved otherwise to the satisfaction of the court that the company is unable to pay its debts. It has not been proved in this case to my satisfaction that there is any debt whatever in respect of which the society could be liable. First of all a society of this kind is not entitled to borrow money, except under a special rule; it is no part of its ordinary business to borrow money. It may incur debts, no doubt, of this kind—it must incur debts for office rent, and it must employ a solicitor and a secretary, and to that extent probably there is always some small amount of debt which every society of this kind must have. But beyond that it is very difficult to see what debts it could legally contract. But, I suppose, having gone on receiving deposits, as they are called, from persons other than members, and having incurred a debt to its bankers, this society did pass a resolution, very late in its history, authorising the trustees to borrow money for the purposes of the society. I am of opinion that, in accordance with the decided cases, that resolution was expressed in terms far too wide to make it a valid or binding resolution; and therefore there never was, in my opinion, any debt on which the society, quâ society, could be sued.

It is said that the trustees have borrowed this money for the purposes of the society, that they have pledged their personal liability, and that they may be entitled to be repaid out of the assets. That may be so, and then they would have a right to go to the funds of the society to repay themselves; that is to say, having borrowed money without the power to do so, still, if they did lend that money so borrowed to other persons upon securities, I suppose they would be entitled to have the securities and the money thereby secured applied in exonerating themselves from the debts for which they have made themselves liable. That is the only mode in which, as it appears to me, there could be any liability of the society or of its funds, and that seems to me to dispose of the first part of the case.

Then I come to the question whether it is just and equitable to make an order to wind-up this society. These four petitioners are persons who take a different view altogether from all the creditors, from all the other persons interested in the society, who desire to have their affairs settled out of court, without the expense and the ruinous consequences of a winding-up in this court. They desire to have it so done, and the creditors, so far as there are creditors, desire the same thing. With the exception of these four persons, they all desire that the matter should be settled by themselves out of court, and without the interposition of the court.

Then what is the wrong which these four men will suffer? They say, Some funds have been or may be taken away from us, which would probably result in profits, and would so diminish the amount of our nominal mortgage debt. If there had been no mistake, they say, in the mode in which profits have been calculated before, if there had been no mistake in the mode in which they are dealing with the profits now, possibly we might have had something in diminution of the money which we have borrowed, and which we are liable to repay. If there has been an error of that kind, still it does not appear to me that there was ever any fraud, nor is any suggestion of fraud made on the part of these persons. The managing body may have committed an error, and the proper mode of setting right a thing of that kind—any error in the management of a society—is to apply to that managing body, or to call a meeting of the managing body or of the general body of members, and get that managing or that general body to take care to rectify its course for the future. That is the proper course, and it is a course which this court has always allowed in a matter of internal management; it has always left the internal management to be settled by the persons interested in the society.

But then it is said, if we have a winding-up order, possibly we may get back for the society moneys which have been paid out to retiring members upon that miscalculation of profits which we allege. I cannot see that it is the object of a winding-up to enable an existing society to get back from its past members something which upon a miscalculation, to which apparently all persons were parties, those past or retiring partners have received. And as far as these gentlemen are concerned, it appears to me, by their own statement, that no profit whatever can ever result to them. They say that possibly those moneys would go in diminution of debts to which they are liable. My opinion is that they never were liable for those debts. They never could be liable to the trustees to repay those debts, because the trustees could only be entitled to receive whatever funds were available for the purpose of recouping themselves, and the petitioners' own case is that there never were these profits; therefore if there never were these profits, no return of moneys paid away would ever give these gentlemen profits which would go to reduce their debts. Then, if that were so, they never were under any liability at all; but if they were under any liability whatever it is impossible they could ever be made liable in consequence of this mode of dealing with the funds. There may have been some degree of irregularity, but the releases which have been executed seem to me to have amply relieved them from every possible liability, so that they cannot, in my opinion, have a shadow of interest in anything that could be gained from the result of a winding-up in which, possibly, they might expose other people to losses which they would not share themselves. There was an irregularity, as it seems to me admittedly, on the part of the society in the mode of dealing with the profits. The releases have been obtained, which have altered the case very much since it was before the Vice-Chancellor. I am of opinion that the petition ought to be dismissed, but without costs.

Lord Justice MELLISH said: I am of the same opinion. This is a petition by members who, no doubt, if the society was wound-up, would be contributories, and they allege that the society is unable to pay its debts. Now if a creditor cannot get paid, if he issues a proper summons and cannot get paid, then, no doubt, it is ex debito justitiæ to grant a winding-up order. But when members come and ask for a winding-up order, it appears to me that it is the duty of the court to see whether the other members and the creditors agree in thinking that a winding-up is the best course. Now here it is quite clear that, if there are any creditors, which is extremely doubtful, the creditors without an exception, and all the members of the society, with the exception of the four who have presented this petition and one other, agree that the best course is not to wind-up. Under those circumstances the court, in my opinion, ought not to grant a winding-up order unless it sees that some plain injustice is being done to the members who present the petition, which cannot be avoided except by making a winding-up order. Now, the present petitioners are advanced members, and it appears that there are altogether fifty-five advanced members; therefore, fifty of these fifty-five, who are apparently in exactly the same position as the present petitioners, do not desire a winding-up; they agree with all the unadvanced members and with all the creditors, that the society is more likely to get rid of its difficulties, and that the creditors, if there are any, are more likely to get paid, and the shareholders are more likely to get their proper share of the assets, by not having than by having a winding-up order. I cannot see that these petitioners are liable to suffer any injustice, or are liable to any such risk, as entitles them to a winding-up order. It seems to be almost admitted that the only loss, as between them and the other members which they can suffer is, that they may possibly lose the benefit of having the profits applied towards paying their 120*l.* advanced per share. Now, in the first place they themselves allege, and it is the chief ground of their petition, that the profits are principally fictitious, that there are none. It does not at all appear that if the accounts were rightly taken there would be any profits coming to them, and the whole matter is left in uncertainty.

Then as respects their liability to creditors, I agree with the Lord Justice that, in all probability, they are not liable at all; but, even if they were liable, all the alleged creditors of the society have joined in releasing them, and I have no doubt that that release is an effectual protection.

Therefore, upon the whole, I am of opinion that we should be doing wrong in allowing the society to be wound-up against the wish of all the creditors, and of the great majority of the contributories of the society. I agree that the petition should be dismissed without costs.

COWLES v. GALE.

Vendor and purchaser — Specific performance — Agreement for sale of public house—Transfer of licence—9 Geo. 4, c. 61, ss. 11, 14—Licence in name of deceased owner.

The trustees of a will, under their power of sale, put up a public house for sale by auction as a going concern.

On the day fixed for completion the purchaser refused to complete, on the ground that the trustees were not in a position to transfer the licence, which had been renewed in the name of the testator after his death:

Held (reversing the decision of the Master of the Rolls), that as time is of the essence of the contract upon the sale of a public house as a going concern, and as the trustees were not on the day fixed for completion in a position to transfer to the purchaser a valid licence, that in the name of the deceased owner being a nullity, the purchaser was entitled to repudiate the contract, and accordingly a bill for specific performance of the contract was dismissed with costs.

Day v. Luhke, L. Rep. 5 Eq. 336 followed.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of the Master of the Rolls, who held, under the circumstances stated in the head note, that though the renewal of the licence was irregular, the purchaser would not incur any risk on that account, and that under the licence, endorsed by the vendors, he would have an unimpeachable title to carry on the trade of the public house, and his Lordship accordingly made a decree against the purchaser for specific performance.

The hearing before the Master of the Rolls is reported ante, p. 166, where the facts and judgment are fully stated.

Rosburgh, Q.C., Poland (of the Common Law Bar), and Marten, for the appellant.—We purchased this public house as a going concern, and in such a case it is settled by Day v. Luhke (L. Rep. 5 Eq 336) that time is of the essence of the contract, therefore the vendors were bound to transfer a valid licence to us on the day fixed for completion; but the licence having been renewed in the name of the testator after his death was no licence at all, and the vendors had no licence to transfer to us on the day fixed for completion. It is contended by the vendors that we waived this objection. In reply to our requisition, "In whose names are the licences now standing?" the vendors stated: "In the name of the late George Ross; they will be transferred by the executors in the usual way." We made no further requisition on this, being content to accept a transfer from the executors in the usual way; but the executors were not in a position to do so. It is settled by Day v. Luhke (supra), that in the absence of an express stipulation to the contrary, the purchaser is entitled to have a transfer of the licence under sect. 11 of the Licensing Act, 9 Geo.

4, c. 61. Sect. 4 of that Act empowers the justices assembled at the general annual licensing meeting in every year to appoint special sessions, "at which special sessions it shall be lawful for the justices then and there assembled . . . . to licence such persons intending to keep inns theretofore kept by other persons being about to remove from such inns, as they the said justices shall, in exercise of the powers herein contained and in exercise of their discretion deem fit and proper persons under the provisions hereinafter enacted, to be licensed," &c. And sect. 11 provides that "every person holding a licence under the authority of this Act, or his heirs, executors, &c., being desirous to transfer such licence to some other person, and intending to apply at the special session then next ensuing for permission so to do, shall, five days at least prior to such special session, serve a notice of such his intention upon one of the overseers of the poor, and one of the constables of the parish . . . in the form in schedule B, signed by the party intending to make such application, or by his agent thereunto authorised, and setting forth the Christian and surname of the person to whom it is intended that such licence shall be transferred, together with the place of his residence, and his trade or calling, during the six months previous to the time of serving such notice." Here the vendors were not "persons holding a licence under the authority of the Act," and could not transfer the licence under sect. 11; and time being of the essence of the contract, we were not bound to wait till they could take proceedings under the 14th section. (a) There being no valid licence we should in the interval have been exposed to a penalty of 5*l.* for every glass of beer we sold, under sect. 18, which enacts that persons selling exciseable liquors without a licence shall be liable to a penalty of not more than 20*l.*, and not less than 5*l.*, for each offence. We therefore contend that we were entitled to repudiate the contract, and that the plaintiffs' bill should be dismissed with costs. They also referred to Claydon v. Green, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 607; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 511.

Southgate, Q.C. and Horton Smith, for the plaintiffs, contended that the purchaser, having been informed that the licence was in the testator's name, and having taken no objection to that when the abstract was before him, had waived the objection, and could not now raise it. Moreover, the objection was merely formal, as the purchaser could have carried on business safely under the irregular licence, and any penalties that might have been incurred would have fallen on the plaintiffs, and not on him.

Daniel Jones, for the testator's widow.

No reply.

Lord Justice JAMES said that he was of opinion that the decision of the Master of the Rolls in this case could not be reconciled with his former decision in Day v. Luhke (L. Rep. 5 Eq. 336). In the case of the sale of a public house as a going concern, time was necessarily of the essence of the contract, for the person who bought a public house did so for the purpose of occupying it and carrying on business in it, and it would be very injurious to him if he could not commence business at once. His Lordship thoroughly agreed with what was said by the Master of the Rolls in Day v. Luhke on this subject. In the present case the 16th of Nov. 1870 was the day fixed for completion, and the vendors were bound to show that they were on that day in a position to transfer to the purchaser a licence under which he could lawfully carry on the business of selling excisable liquors by retail, to be consumed on the premises. Beyond all question the vendors were not on that day in a position to transfer such a licence to the pur-

as a petition for payment to the petitioner ain compensation money which had been paid into court by the Metropolitan Board of Works under the following circumstances:—

In May 1839 the Metropolitan Board of Works, under the provisions of the Marylebone Improvement Act 1868, which embodied the Lands Clauses Act, gave notice to the petitioner for the purchase of three houses, of which he was the landlord, and which were then let to three weekly tenants. Shortly after receiving the notice the petitioner granted to each of the three tenants leases for three years. There had been no previous agreement between the petitioner and his tenants for effecting this arrangement, but it was done, as the petitioner admitted, at his instance, with a view of giving the tenants a claim to compensation.

In Feb. 1870 the petitioner sent in his claim against the Board of Works, but the arbitrator, in making his award, treated the leases as non-existent, and the compensation money was paid into court on that footing. In March 1871 the tenants sent in their claims, and an award having been made upon them, on the supposition that they were valid, the compensation money was paid into court. In July 1871 the tenants presented a petition for payment of this money out of court, but the Master of the Rolls decided that they were not entitled to it, and dismissed the petition without costs.

The present petition was presented by the landlord for payment of his compensation. The Board of Works had paid about 200*l.* in adjusting the claims set-up by the tenants, and they now asked to be recouped out of the money to which the petitioner was entitled.

Dickinson, Q.C. and Bagshawe, in support of the petition, submitted that the landlord was not answerable for the costs incurred by the board. He had made no secret of the circumstances affecting the tenants' claims, and the board might have refused at once to entertain them, without going to the expense of assessment. They further submitted that the petitioner was entitled to interest on the purchase money.

Greene, Q.C. and Charles Hall, for the Board of Works, contended that the court had power to make the applicant pay the expense to which the board had been so unnecessarily put. The 78th section of the Lands Clauses Act gave the court power to make such order as it thought fit, and the 80th section, after directing payment of costs by the board, except in certain cases specified in the Act, went on to enact that it should be "lawful" for the court to order such payment; thus giving a discretionary power to the court. The practice of manufacturing claims was a growing one, and ought to be discouraged. As to the interest asked for, the court had no jurisdiction to grant it.

Dickinson, Q.C. in reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I am of opinion that the money in court cannot be treated as a fund out of which the board can be indemnified for the expenses they have incurred in settling the claims of the petitioner's tenants. I consider that I have no discretion in the matter; but even if I had, I should have hesitated long before permitting any portion of the fund to be applied for such a purpose. The claim set up by the board, if it can be enforced, is not one to be made here or now. With regard, however, to the costs of the present application the case is different. It does not lie in the mouth of the petitioner to say that the board were unnecessarily alarmed at his good-natured, but ill-considered, attempt to compensate his tenants out of the board's pocket. His conduct has entailed upon the board unnecessary expense, and I think I shall only be doing justice if I go to the full extent of my jurisdiction under the Act, and refuse him his costs of this application. I do not think I have jurisdiction to make him pay the costs, otherwise I might have done so. With regard to interest, I consider that I have no power to make the board pay it, and I am not sure that, even if I had the power, I should have exercised it in the applicant's favour.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

BRADLEY v. SYLVESTER.

Quo warranto—Clerk to a school board—Office held during pleasure of the board.

Upon an application for a writ of quo warranto against the clerk to a school board, on the ground that he was improperly elected according to the provisions of 33 & 34 Vict. c. 75, s. 35;

The Court refused a rule, considering that the majority of the board might, without assistance, remedy the impropriety themselves, the office being held during the pleasure of the board.

Gane moved for a rule for quo warranto, calling upon the Rev. W. T. M. Sylvester to show cause by what authority he acted as clerk to the school board of the borough of Castleford. By 33 & 34 Vict. c. 75, s. 35, "A school board may appoint a clerk and a treasurer and other necessary officers, including the teachers required for any school provided by such board, to hold office during the pleasure of the board, and may assign them such salaries or remuneration (if any) as they may think fit, and may from time to time remove any of such officers; but no such appointment shall be made, except at the first meeting of the board, unless notice in writing has been sent to every member of the board." [BLACKBURN, J.—But is it a case in which quo warranto will lie? It will not lie against a churchwarden, and why should it here? You might as well say it would lie in the case of a secretary to a railway company. This question was discussed in Darley v. The Queen (12 Cl. & F. 520.] The two cases are not analogous, for the secretary to a railway company is appointed by a private corporation to deal with private funds, whereas the clerk to a school board is appointed under a statute, and one of his duties is to countersign all orders of the board for the payment of money. It was held by Campbell, C.J. and Erle, J. in the case of Reg. v. St. Martin-in-the-Fields (17 Q.B. 149), that an appointment immediately or mediately by statute, where the officer had to countersign cheques for the payment of money raised by a rate was to a great extent at least a public appointment. Sect. 54 of the Act above mentioned provides that a deficiency in the school funds shall be supplied by a rate. In May last the second meeting of the Castleford School Board was held to consider applications for their clerkship. Two candidates were selected—viz., Bradley and Sylvester—and a poll was taken. Six members of the board were present, one of whom remained neutral. Three members first voted for Bradley, one of whom afterwards also voted for Sylvester. This made the recorded votes for each candidate equal, and the Chairman gave a second or casting vote in favour of Sylvester, whom he thereupon declared to be elected. At the following meeting a protest was made against the election; but it was overruled by the chairman. Another ground of objection is that the election did not take place at the first meeting of the board, and that no notice was given according to the statute. [COCKBURN, C.J.—The tenure of the office is only during the pleasure of the board; and it was held in Re Fox (27 L. J. 151 Q.B.) that an information will not be granted in the case of clerk to borough justices, as such clerk is removable at the pleasure of the justices.] In Reg. v. St. Martin-in-the-Fields, above cited, the appointment of clerk to the Board of Guardians for life and during sanity, or until resignation or removal, was held quamdiu se bene gesserit, and was subject to a writ of quo warranto.

COCKBURN, C.J.—Upon consideration of the case of Darley v. The Queen, and the provisions of this statute, it may be that a writ of quo warranto may be applicable to the office of clerk to a school board; at all events, I will not now undertake to say that it could not lie against the defendant. If it would lie we should still have to exercise our discretion as to granting a writ. Here the ground upon which we are asked to interfere is an impropriety in the election, and as the office is held at the pleasure of the board, it is competent for the board to do what might be accomplished by our interference. If the election were really effected by a colourable majority, or upon insufficient notice, the real majority have the power to eject the present clerk, and to elect the person whom they prefer. At all events, it should be shown before asking this court for a writ that some other attempt than a mere protest, overruled by the chairman, has been made to obtain the assistance of the board to remedy the impropriety complained of.

BLACKBURN, MELLOR, and HANNEN, JJ. concurred.

Rule refused.

POUND (app.) v. THE BOARD OF WORKS FOR THE PLUMSTEAD DISTRICT (resps.).

LORD NORTHBROOK (app.) v. THE BOARD OF WORKS FOR THE PLUMSTEAD DISTRICT (resps.).

New street—Expenses of draining and paving—Apportionment — Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), ss. 105, 250—Metropolitan Management Amendment Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), ss. 77, 98, 112.

At the time of the passing of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, a certain lane, having but a few houses near it, was kept in repair as a highway by the parish. Between the hedges which bordered the adjoining fields, there was an average distance of about forty feet, but only eighteen feet in the middle of this space was kept as a hard metal road. Since that time, both before and after the passing of the Metropolis Management Amendment Act, 1862, a great many houses have been built on both sides of this lane; a sewer, at the request of the inhabitants, has been constructed by the District Board of Works; a footpath, and also a broader carriage road, have been made and kept in repair by the Board. All the expenses of these works were defrayed out of the general rates, but the Board now claimed them from the owners and occupiers of the houses and land adjoining. Orders enforcing this claim were made by a magistrate.

Upon appeal by an owner of houses, and by the proprietor of some private roads which ran across the lane, and had been assessed at the same rate as the houses:

Held, that this lane, although a highway repairable by the parish at the date of the Act of 1855, might become a new street within the meaning of the Metropolis Management Acts; and that the proprietor of the private roads was an owner of land within the meaning of sect. 250 of the Act of 1855.

Held, however, that unless all these expenses were included in one apportionment upon the owners and occupiers of the whole new street, the claim of the Board was bad.

THIS was a case stated for the opinion of the court under the provisions of the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, and the point for decision related to the powers of the Plumstead District Board of Works (thereinafter called "the board") to pave a certain portion of a certain road in the parish of Lee, in their district, commonly known as Burnt Ash-lane, and to charge the expenses thereof to the owners of the houses thereto adjoining, and of the land bounding the said road, or abutting thereon, under the provisions of the statutes 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, s. 105, and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, s. 77.

On the 23rd June 1869, complaints were made and summonses were obtained by the clerk to the board against the appellant, Mr. Pound, for the recovery of 1122*l.* 16*s.* 6*d.*, being the aggregate amount of the various sums assessed upon the several houses and portions of land of which he is the owner, as set forth in a schedule annexed to the summonses; and against the appellant, Lord Northbrook, for the recovery of 144*l.* 13*s.*, as being the aggregate amount of the various sums assessed upon several roads, of which he is the owner, as set forth in the schedule indorsed upon the said summons, as being their due and proper respective shares of the said expenses. These summonses came on for hearing before the stipendiary magistrate of the district on the 5th July 1869, and on successive days by adjournments, when for the purpose of raising the question in dispute between the parties, the magistrate decided in favour of the board, and made orders that the defendants should pay the amounts sought to be recovered from them respectively. At the defendant's request, they being dissatisfied with this decision in point of law, the magistrate stated the present case.

On the 1st Jan. 1856, when the Metropolis Local Management Act came into operation, Burnt Ash-lane was an ancient highway and public carriage road leading in a north and south direction from Lee-green, in the parish of Lee, in the county of Kent, to Bromley in the same county. It was a public thoroughfare for carriages, of an average width of forty feet or thereabouts between the hedges, of which a width of about eighteen feet or thereabouts had been time out of mind repaired as hard road by the parish, leaving the remainder in grass on each side of the road. The grass was bounded on each side of the road by a watercourse, outside which was a bank and hedge separating the watercourse from the adjoining land. At the northern end of the highway in question, viz., Burnt Ash-lane, on the west side was a house used as a butcher's shop, one of six houses, three being shops, all of which houses fronted towards a road running across the highway in question, and leading from Eltham to Lewisham. At the back of these houses and at a distance of sixty feet or thereabouts from the highway in question, was a seventh house (called Eagle Cottage) fronting towards the highway in question. and having a path leading therefrom to the front door. At the same end, on the east side was a pond, which was filled up by the board in the course of the year 1856, and which discharged itself into the watercourse on the east side of the highway in question. Beyond the pond was an orchard belonging to a farm called Lee-green Farm, the buildings of which farm were at a distance of from 100ft. to 200ft. from the highway. On the west side of the highway in question, and at a distance of 850ft. or thereabouts from the north end was a house, then lately built by the appellant, Mr. Pound. This house, called Stratton Villa, is about seventy feet from the centre of the highway, and is occupied, together with a plot of ground fifty feet wide, and 200ft. deep, on which it stands, and which forms a forecourt and back garden to the house.

At the date mentioned, 1st Jan. 1856, no other houses than those already mentioned existed along the portion of the highway in question which the board has paved or purposes to pave, or had approaches thereto; but the ground on either side, except the before-mentioned orchard, consisted of open fields cultivated as ordinary farm land.

Between the years 1856 and 1862 building operations had been carried on, and on the 7th Aug. 1862 (the date of the passing of the Metropolis Management Amendment Act) twenty-one additional houses had been built on the west side of the highway in question. The appellant Mr. Pound is owner of several of the houses which were built prior to Aug. 1862, and part of the claim of the board against him is in respect of the said houses.

On the 31st Jan. 1861 the board approved of a certain plan laid before them by the appellant, Mr. Pound, setting out a line of frontage for the forecourts of houses on the east side of the highway in question to the extent of 1200 feet. The line of frontage was staked out on the land sometime in the year 1861, and posts were put down marking the permanent boundary between the forecourts and the road. As a condition for the said approval the board had required that the highway should be made throughout of the width of fifty feet, and in consequence, the appellant Mr. Pound laid into the highway in question a strip of land on the east side sufficient to comply with this condition. The highway being already fifty feet wide for a length of about 200 feet at the North-east corner, nothing was there laid in. The line of the frontage so approved of and marked out was that on which the line of the forecourts was subsequently built. A plan for the drainage of the above proposed houses was submitted to the board in May 1861, but was disapproved of, and an amended plan was approved of in Jan. 1863. The building of the houses was commenced shortly afterwards, viz., in Jan. 1863.

Between the 7th Aug. 1862 and the date of the summonses mentioned, a line of railway had been constructed by the South-Eastern Railway Company, crossing the highway in question nearly at right angles to it, and at a distance of 850 yards or thereabouts southwards from Lee-green. It is this length of road from Lee-green to the southern side of the land occupied by the South-Eastern Railway Company, extending to 850 yards or thereabouts, which the board allege to be a new street within the meaning of the Metropolitan Management Acts; and the portion which they have paved or propose to pave under the powers thereby conferred upon them, is so much as is not comprised in the eighteen feet described as having been repaired as hard road. All the houses mentioned in this case are in and upon this length of road, and the board have apportioned the estimated expenses of paving the same upon the owners of all the said houses. The appellant (Mr. Pound) is owner of several of the said houses, some of which were built prior to Aug. 1862, and part of the claim of the board against him is in respect of the said houses.

Subsequently to the 7th Aug. 1862 other houses were built on both sides of the highway in question.

Before the 7th Aug. 1862 nothing had been built on the east side of the highway in question, but between that date and the date of the summonses, fifty-six houses had been built on that side.

In the year 1862, and before the passing of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, the board received an application from the owners to construct a sewer which had become necessary for the drainage of the new houses on the highway in question, which had by that time been built. The board agreed to the proposal, on condition that the owners paid two-thirds of the expense, and constructed, on these conditions, 1350ft., commencing at the north end. Subsequently, in the year 1865, the sewer was carried on a further length of 1050ft., and in 1867 a further length of 2110ft., the board having agreed to construct the further lengths on the same conditions.

In the year 1856 the board constructed a footpath on the western side of the highway in question, commencing at Lee-green, of 8ft. in width, and 1100ft. in length, and paved the same, that is to say, made the top thereof hard with suitable gravel; and have, from the time of its said construction, repaired and maintained the same. In the year 1863 the board constructed a similar footpath on the eastern side of the highway in question of the length of 300ft. and 8ft. in width, and have, since its construction, maintained and repaired the same. At the time of the constructing the path last mentioned, the board made a hard carriage road on the spaces then remaining between the said footpaths and the said 18ft. of hard road which had always existed, so as thereby to construct a hard road comprising the whole of the width between the said footpaths, and have since repaired the same. All the expenses of the above works were defrayed, and repairs paid for, by the board out of the general rates. All the said expenses are included in the estimates of the costs now caused to be made by the board as hereafter mentioned and sought to be recovered from the appellants.

Although between some of the houses on both sides of this road there are distances of various lengths, yet the building plots on which the houses stand are actually contiguous, except where the roads occur. Many of the houses above-mentioned have been and are occupied, and such houses have from the time of occupation been rated by the board for the same purpose and to the same extent as all the other occupied property in the district.

In consequence of the erection of so many new houses, 112 in all, of which 90 have been built since the 7th Aug. 1862, the board have now determined it to be necessary to form and pave proper and convenient footpaths each side of the highway in question similar to and in continuation of those already formed and paved as before mentioned, and a portion of the road to the width of 8ft. is intended to be appropriated on each side for that purpose; and the board have also determined to make, in continuation of the length of 300ft. constructed in 1862, a hard carriage-road along the residue of the highway in question, on the spaces between the said footpaths and the said 18ft. of hard road which has always existed.

In order that such paving of the footpaths and carriage-road as have now been determined on by the board may be done, and that the expense of doing such as has been previously paved may be repaid to the board, the board have caused proper estimates to be made of the cost of the whole works, and have apportioned the cost among the several owners of houses and land bounding and abutting on the highway in question, under the powers of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, s. 77.

The several appellants are such owners of houses and land so bounding or abutting on the highway in question, and the amount sought to be recovered from each is admitted to be his share under such apportionment, assuming the board are entitled to recover the cost of the whole works, and provided also, as to Lord Northbrook, that he is liable to be charged as follows:

The new roads on the west side of the highway previously alluded to are five in number, and are at present private roads, and Lord Northbrook is the owner of the soil and freehold thereof, and the amount sought to be recovered from him by the board, 144*l.* 13*s.*, is charged upon him solely as the owner of the said private roads, considered as land within the 77th section of the Act 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, according to the width left between the forecourts of the houses in the highway in question, forming the corners of the said private roads; and such amount is charged at the same rate and in all other respects as the frontage of houses is charged. Lord Northbrook has no exclusive possession or occupation of such private roads, the same having been laid out and formed for the common use of the lessees and occupiers of property in the said private roads, and the several leases by the said Lord Northbrook grant such common use to the several lessees and their tenants.

The appellants contend that the board has no power to cast upon the owners of the houses and land adjoining to and in and upon the highway in question, as the cost of paving the same, the amounts now sought to be recovered. The board contend that they have such power.

The question for the court was, which of these contentions is correct. If the court should be of opinion that the board have not the power for which they contend, the orders of the magistrate were to be quashed; if otherwise, they were to be confirmed. But if the court should be of opinion that on the facts and the present summonses the magistrate ought to have made an order for the payment by the said Mr. Pound of part of the said amount assessed upon him, upon the ground that a portion only of the said highway is a new street, then the further question for the opinion of the court was, what part? and the order was to be amended so as to include such part only of the said amount; and the same as to the amount assessed upon Lord Northbrook.

Willis argued for the appellant, Mr. Pound.—These claims by the respondents are based upon the provision in sect. 105 of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, for paving a new street. According to the interpretation clause, sect. 112, of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, this place cannot be a new street within the meaning of the Legislature, because the road upon which the houses front had previously been a highway repairable by the parish. According to the case of Reg. v. The United Kingdom Electric Telegraph Company (31 L. J. 166, Mag. Cas.), not only this eighteen feet of hard metal road, but the whole space between the hedges also formed part of the highway, and therefore no part of this Burnt Ash-lane could be a new street. This is not only the necessary interpretation of the words defining a new street, but it also appears to have been the intention of the Legislature so to limit the expression, from the provision at the end of the 98th section of the same Act, concerning "any road, passage, or way hereafter to be formed or laid out." This provision would be superfluous if it were not for the subsequent definition of a new street. This, too, is consistent with the case of Sawyer v. Paddington (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 662; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 164), where a part of Harrow-road, having been laid out for sewerage after 1862, was held to be a new street. There are analogous provisions under the Public Health Acts, and if this road were subject to a local board of health instead of the Metropolitan Board of Works, the appellants clearly, under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, s. 69, would not be liable for this claim:

Wallington v. White, 10 C. B., N. S., 128;
Hirst v. Halifax Local Board, L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 181.

MELLOR, J.—The question is whether an old road cannot become a new street.] Even assuming this to be a new street, the board have no right to adopt the course they have taken. They are asking now for an amount, some of which was expended thirteen years before these summonses, and a part of which has already been contributed out of the rates paid by the whole of the ratepayers of the parish. Whitchurch v. Fulham Board of Works (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 233). is an authority that the board can make only one apportionment on all the owners along an entire road, and the case finds that they claim for what has been long completed, and also for what they have now determined to do.

Tayler, for the appellant, Lord Northbrook, relied upon the points argued for the other appellant, and further contended that Lord Northbrook was not an "owner" within the meaning of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120 s. 250. By that section the word "owner" shall mean the person for the time being receiving the rack rent of the lands or premises in connection with which the said word is used, whether on his own account, or as agent or trustee for any other person, or who would so receive the same, if such land or premises were let at a rack rent. These are merely private roads, which it would be impossible to let at a rack rent, and which can be only a source of expense to the owner.

Brown, Q. C. (with him Barrow) for the respondents.—[COCKBURN, C.J.—We will not trouble you on the first point; in our opinion this was clearly a new street within the meaning of the Metropolis Management Acts.]—With respect to the last point taken on behalf of Lord Northbrook, every private road increases the value of house property in the neighbourhood; these roads, therefore, may be taken to be connected with lands or premises belonging to him, or they would produce a rack rent to him if let to the neighbouring house owners. As to the second objection made by both the appellants, sect. 77 of the Act of 1862 provides that these expenses shall be recoverable either before the work shall be commenced, or during its progress, or after its completion. And the Court of Common Pleas held, in Vestry of Bermondsey v. Ramsey (L. Rep. 6 C. P. 247), that an unsatisfied judgment against a former owner of premises was no bar to a subsequent action against a succeeding occupier. [BLACKBURN, J.—That does not relate to the apportionment. The facts stated are not sufficient to show us whether the board have claimed any expenses beyond those of a single apportionment. Unless the other side will consent to an additional statement with respect to that matter, it will be necessary to obtain further facts from the magistrate.] Some of these expenses were incurred before any apportionment was made, and as far as they are concerned it seems that the claim cannot be enforced. [BLACKBURN, J.—In that case, according to Whitchurch v. Fulham Board of Works, the whole of the apportionment is bad.] The Board desire to have the judgment of the court on the other two points for their future guidance.

COCKBURN, C.J.—Mr. Brown gives up the claim of the Board of Words against the appellants upon the present apportionment, as he feels he is unable to establish their right to the whole of the amount they have claimed. There are, however, two questions upon which he desires to have our judgment as a guide for future assessments. The first is, whether this Burnt Ash-lane, having been a highway repairable by the parish at the date of the passing of the Metropolis Management Act 1855, can be considered a new street within the meaning of the Metropolis Management Amendment Act 1862. The second question is, whether Lord Northbrook, being the proprietor of certain private roads which open into this Burnt Ash-lane, can be considered an owner of land within the meaning of the 77th section of the Amendment Act of 1862. With regard to the first point, I entertain no doubt that this road, as it now is, constitutes a new street according to the intention of the Legislature. It is ground which was formerly a highway, but now has two sides covered with houses, so as to assume the character of what is generally called a street. The arguments urged on behalf of the appellants fail to convince my mind that the term as used in the Metropolis Management Acts does not include in its meaning such a place as this. The definitions do not show such omission, nor do the Acts anywhere exclude the application of the word street to that which would otherwise, without reference to the definitions, be a street in the general acceptation of the word. It is plain to my mind that a highway converted into a street is not distinguishable for the purposes of these Acts from a piece of land, not before kept in repair as a road, converted into a similar street. With regard to the other point, the 77th section of the Act of 1862 leaves no reasonable doubt that these pieces of ground which have been used as private roads were intended to be assessed for the payment of these rates. Lord Northbrook either receives compensation for the use of the roads from the occupiers of the houses, or they enhance the value of the neighbouring houses and lands. He has therefore a valuable enjoyment of the roads in the same way as if they were lands which he might let.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The first point made by the appellants is that this was at the time of the passing of the Act of 1855 a country lane repairable by the parish; and therefore, although it was subsequently converted into that which would be called a street in the natural acceptation of the term, yet it could not be considered a "new street" according to the technical definition of that expression. The Metropolis Management Act 1855, by sect. 105, enacts that, "In case the owners of the houses forming the greater part of any new street laid out or made, or hereafter to be laid out or made, which is not paved to the satisfaction of the vestry or district board of the parish or district in which such street is situate, be desirous of having the same paved, as hereinafter mentioned, or if such vestry or board deem it necessary or expedient that the same should be so paved, then and in either of such cases such vestry or board shall well and sufficiently pave the same, either throughout the whole breadth of the carriage way and footpaths thereof or any part of such breadth, and from time to time keep such pavement in good and sufficient repair; and the owners of the houses forming such streets shall on demand pay to such vestry or board the amount of the estimated expenses of providing and laying such pavement." Taking that provision alone, the Legislature seems to use the word street in the ordinary and popular sense. Then, by the interpretation clause of the Act of 1862, the expression "new street" shall apply to and include all streets, the maintenance of the paving and roadway whereof had not, previously to the passing of this Act, been taken into charge and assumed by the commissioners, trustees, surveyors, or other authorities having control of the pavements or highways in the parish or place in which such streets are situate. This is quite intelligible; it does not signify that the word may not from its context be inferred to mean that which in its natural sense is a street, but it provides that the word shall carry with it a more extensive meaning for certain purposes of the Act. As to the second point upon which the counsel for the appellants relied, the facts found in the case are not sufficient for us to form our judgment on either side. Mr. Brown thinks that, whatever further facts can be elicited by another inquiry, the board have in this instance demanded too much, and in consequence this particular apportionment cannot be enforced. No costs will be allowed on either side, but these orders must be quashed. The last question in dispute concerns the 77th section of the Act of 1862, by which "the owners of the land bounding or abutting on such street shall be liable to contribute to the expenses or estimated expenses of paving the same, as well as the owners of houses therein." Lord Northbrook is the owner of land adjoining that which he has turned into private roads, and although these roads cannot be let, they are indirectly a source of benefit to his land, and I am unable to perceive why they should not be considered land within the application of that section. In the case of Bowditch v. The Wakefield Local Board of Health (L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 567), we held under the Public Health Act that a trustee for a school who received no rent for the master's residence was still liable as an "owner" for the paving of the street in which it stood.

CROSSHAW v. WIGAN BURIAL BOARD.

*Incumbent's right to burial fees—New parish—Contribution of inhabitants to burial ground—*20 & 21 Vict. c. 81, s. 5.

In 1852, an order of council under 59 Geo. 3, c. 134, s. 16, authorised services and offices to be performed in a new church, assigned a district to it out of the parish in which it stood, and granted the incumbent the fees. The district formed part of a borough which separately maintained its own poor. There was no burial ground in the assigned district, and the persons dying in the district continued to be buried as before in the churchyard of the parish. No separate burial board has ever been appointed by, or ground provided for the district. The plaintiff was appointed incumbent of this church in 1854.

The burial ground of the defendants for the whole borough was consecrated in 1856, the district of the said new church having contributed to the rates for providing it. The rectory of the parish became vacant and a new rector was appointed in 1864.

Held, in an action for the fees paid to defendants for the burials, since the last avoidance of the rectory, of persons who had lived in the plaintiff's district, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

THIS was an action which had been brought by the plaintiff against the defendants for the recovery of fees claimed to be payable by the defendants to the plaintiff for burials in the burial ground provided by the defendants for the borough and township of Wigan, under the provisions of the statutes relating to the burial of the dead, between the 11th Sept. 1869 and the 23rd March 1870.

The plaintiff declared for money received by the defendants for the use of the plaintiff: and to this declaration the defendants pleaded that they never were indebted as alleged: whereupon issue was joined, and the following case was stated for the opinion of this court by the consent of the parties, and by the order of Mellor, J. dated the 11th July 1860.

The rectory and ancient parish of Wigan comprises the borough and township of Wigan, and several outlying townships, and until a burial ground was provided for the said borough and township, under the statutes relating to the burial of the dead as after mentioned, the remains of the inhabitants of the said borough and township, and of such of the outlying townships as had not burial grounds attached to their respective churches, were interred in the churchyard of the ancient parish church, and on all such interments within the churchyard of the said ancient parish, a burial fee was payable by the custom of the said parish; and the rector of the said ancient parish was alone authorised and entitled to perform the rite of burial, and to receive the fees as aforesaid in respect thereof.

In the year 1851, the Church of St. Thomas was built and consecrated in the said borough and township of Wigan as a chapel of ease under the provisions of the statutes 43 Geo. 3, c. 108; 58 Geo. 3, c. 45; and 59 Geo. 3, c. 134. A copy of the sentence of consecration bearing date the 1st Oct. 1851 is intended, if necessary, to form part of this case.

The plaintiff was appointed incumbent of the said church of St. Thomas on the 25th March 1854.

By an order of Her Majesty in Council made on the 11th Feb. 1852, upon the recommendation of the Commissioners for Building new Churches, under the 16th section of the said statute 59 Geo. 3, c. 134, and under and by virtue of any other power or authority in that behalf, vested in Her Majesty and the said commissioners, a particular district was duly assigned to the said church of St. Thomas, and the said order in council authorised banns of matrimony to be published, and marriages, baptisms, churchings, and burials to be solemnised and performed in the said church of St. Thomas, and directed that the fees to arise therefrom should be paid and belong to the incumbent of such church for the time being. A description of the bounds of the said district so assigned was also then duly enrolled in the High Court of Chancery, and registered in the office of the registry of the diocese, as required by the statutes in that behalf, and a copy of the said order and of the said description of the boundaries so assigned as aforesaid was inserted in the London Gazette, on the 24th Feb. 1852. A copy of this order in council is to be taken, if necessary, as part of this case.

The plaintiff contends that from and after the passing of the New Parishes Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 104), s. 14, the said district so assigned as aforesaid to the said church of St. Thomas, became a separate and distinct parish for ecclesiastical purposes, such as is contemplated in the 15th section of the New Parishes Act 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 37), but as this is not admitted by the defendant, the parties have agreed to call St. Thomas throughout the remainder of this case a "district," without prejudice to the question which is hereby submitted to the decision of the court.

There has never been any burying ground belonging to the said district of St. Thomas, nor has any vestry or meeting in the nature of a vestry of the said district appointed any burial board or provided a burial ground as aforesaid, but the remains of the parishioners and inhabitants thereof continued to be interred in the burial ground of the ancient parish church, until a burial ground was provided by the defendants for the borough and township of Wigan, under the statutes relating to the burial of the dead as after mentioned.

The said district of St. Thomas does not separately maintain its own poor, but lies wholly within the borough and township of Wigan, which has separate overseers of the poor, and separately maintains its own poor.

In the year 1854, under the provisions of the various statutes relating to the burial of the dead, a burial board for the borough and township of Wigan was duly established, and the said board afterwards duly provided under the said statutes a burial ground for the said borough and township.

In the year 1856, the churchyard of the ancient parish church of Wigan was closed by the order of one of Her Majesty's Secretaries of State. The burial ground so provided by the burial board, was, with a chapel erected thereon, on or about the 13th Aug. 1856, duly consecrated; from which time it became the burial ground for the said borough and township of Wigan, within the meaning, and according to the provisions of the said last mentioned statutes.

The said district of St. Thomas contributed to the rates, out of which the said last mentioned burial ground was provided. At the time when the said last mentioned burial ground was so provided and consecrated as aforesaid, the Rev. Henry John Gunning was rector of the ancient parish of Wigan, but on his resignation the Hon. and Rev. George Thomas Orlando Bridgeman was on the 22nd Oct. 1864, instituted and inducted to the rectory of Wigan, and has since continued to be rector of the said parish.

The plaintiff, as incumbent of the district of St. Thomas, has since the avoidance of the rectory of Wigan next after the passing of the New Parishes Act 1856, claimed under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 81, s. 5, to be entitled to perform, and has offered to perform, the religious service in the burials in the burial ground so provided by the said burial board, of the remains of the parishioners or inhabitants of the said district of St. Thomas, and also to be entitled to receive the same fees in respect of such burials, as if the said burial ground were exclusively the burial ground of the said district of St. Thomas.

From the 24th Feb. 1868, until the 10th Sept. 1869, the defendants allowed the plaintiff to perform the religious service in the chapel, in the defendants' said burial ground, of the remains of the parishioners and inhabitants of the said district of St. Thomas, and paid to him the fees arising from the said burials, but since the last-mentioned date the defendants, in consequence of a claim to the same fees being made by the rector of Wigan, have refused to allow the plaintiff to perform any such religious service in the defendants' said burial grounds, and have retained the fees arising from the burial of the remains of parishioners and inhabitants of the said district of St. Thomas, until it shall be determined by the court whether the plaintiff or the rector of Wigan is entitled to receive them.

The court upon the above statement is authorised to amend the pleadings if necessary for determining the questions at issue between the parties, and to draw any inferences of fact which may be necessary to the decision of the case in the same manner, and as fully as any jury might determine the same.

The questions for the opinion of the court are whether the plaintiff is entitled to perform the service in the burial of the dead in the defendants' burial ground, and to receive the fees above claimed by him.

If the court shall be of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to perform such services in the burial, in the said burial ground provided by the defendants of the remains of parishioners or inhabitants of the said district of St. Thomas, and to receive fees in respect thereof, then the judgment in this case shall be entered for the plaintiff for the sum of 7*l.* 16*s.* 6*d.*

If the court shall be of opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to perform such services, and to receive such fees as above claimed by him, then judgment shall be entered for the defendants.

The costs of the cause, taxed on the higher scale, to abide the event.

Manisty, Q.C, (with him Forbes) argued for the plaintiff.—The question of plaintiff's right to these fees depends upon the 5th section of the Act to amend the Burial Act 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 81); "The vestry or meeting in the nature of a vestry, of any parish, new parish, township, or other district not separately maintaining its own poor, and which has had no separate burial ground, may appoint a burial board; and such vestry or meeting, and the burial board appointed by it, shall exercise and have all the powers which they might have exercised and had under the said Acts, and this Act, if such parish, new parish, township, or district had had a separate burial ground before the passing of the said Act of the 18th and 19th years of Her Majesty: provided always, that all the powers of any other vestry or meeting and burial board, if any, shall then cease and determine, so far as relates to such parish, new parish, township, or district as aforesaid; and until a burial ground shall be so provided as aforesaid, and consecrated for any new parish or district created or to be created pursuant to the provisions of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 37, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 94, and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 104, or any or either of them, and to which the said Acts or any or either of them may apply, the incumbent of such new parish or district (if any burial ground has been or shall be provided under the herein recited Acts for the burial of the dead, or any or either of them, for any parish or parishes out of rates to which such new parish or district, or any part thereof, shall have contributed, or contribute, or be liable) shall, with respect to the burial in such last-mentioned burial ground of the remains of the parishioners or inhabitants of such new parish or district, or of such part thereof as shall have contributed or contribute as aforesaid, as the case may be, perform the same duties and have the same rights, privileges, and authorities, and be entitled to the same fees, and also the clerk and sexton of such new parish or district shall, when necessary, respectively perform the same duties, and be entitled to the same fees, in respect of such burials, as if the said burial ground were exclusively the burial ground of such new parish or district, subject, nevertheless, to all provisions to which the incumbents, clerks, and sextons of original parishes are respectively subject in and by the said Burial Acts, or any or either of them, provided also that nothing herein contained shall affect the rights or privileges of any existing incumbent, clerk, or sexton, without the consent of such incumbent, clerk, or sexton respectively." The effect of the involved language of this section, so far as it affects the present case, is, that the vestry of any new parish not separately maintaining its own poor, and having no separate burial ground, may appoint a burial board; upon which such vestry and burial board shall have the powers conferred upon other burial boards by 18 & 19 Vict. c. 128, provided that the powers of other vestries and boards shall then determine, so far as they relate to the said new parish; and until a burial ground shall be so provided for any new parish which has been created pursuant to 19 & 20 Vict. c. 104, and to which the said Act may apply, the incumbent of such new parish (if such new parish has contributed to rates by which a burial ground has been provided) shall perform the same duties and be entitled to the same fees with respect to the burial of his parishioners in the burial ground to which his new parish has contributed, as if the said burial ground were exclusively the burial ground of the said new parish. The case finds that this district has contributed to the rates of the burial ground, and it remains only to show that this district is a new parish, which has been created pursuant to 19 & 20 Vict. c. 104, and to which the said Act may apply. This is commonly called Lord Blandford's Act, and by sect. 14 it is enacted that "Wheresoever or as soon as banns of matrimony and the solemnization of marriages, churchings, and baptisms according to the laws and canons in force in this realm are authorised to be published and performed in any consecrated church or chapel to which a district shall belong, such district not being at the time of the passing of this Act a separate and distinct parish for ecclesiastical purposes, and the incumbent of which is by such authority entitled for his own benefit to the entire fees arising from the performance of such offices without any reservation thereout, such district or place shall become and be a separate and distinct parish for ecclesiastical purposes, such as is contemplated in the 15th section of the first recited Act (viz., 6 & 7 Vict. c. 37), and the church or chapel of such district shall be the church of such parish, and all and singular the provisions of the said firstly and secondly recited Acts (the second is 7 & 8 Vict. c. 94) as amended by this Act relative to new parishes, upon their becoming such, and to the matters and things consequent thereon, shall extend and apply to the said parish and church as fully and effectually as if the same had become a new parish under the provisions of the said last-mentioned Acts." [Stopped by the court.]

Holker, Q.C. (with him McConnell) for the defendants.—Hornby v. The Burial Board of Toxteth Park (31 L. J. 643, Ch.) shows that an incumbent who has no burial ground in his district is not entitled to burial fees. [Manisty.—That case was decided upon statutes before that of 1857.] My construction of the 5th section of that Act is that the provision, by which the incumbent is to have fees for burials in a ground to be used partly by his district, relates only to the time between the appointment of a burial board and the provision of a burial ground. Here the case does not find that any burial board has been appointed. Further this must be a new parish under Lord Blandford's Act 1856, and the description of the district in the case exactly comes within the exception to the 14th section, "such district not being at the time of the passing of this Act a separate and distinct parish for ecclesiastical purposes." Now this was a separate and distinct parish under the Order in Council of 1851. Sect. 11 shows that the churches to which Lord Blandford's Act was intended to apply were those in which it was not lawful to perform the offices of the church. The 5th section of the Act of 1857 applied only to a new parish or district created by one of the Acts mentioned, as well as that to which one of them might apply. This district cannot be said to have been created by either of those Acts, for it is found expressly to have been made by an order in council under statutes of Geo. 3. [Lush, J.—It could not have been a separate parish; for before Lord Blandford's Act it was necessary to obtain the consent of the patron of a district in order to make it so. The case does not so find, and therefore Lord Blandford's Act would apply to it.] If your Lordships think that this district was then made a new parish, the latter part of the 5th section of the Act of 1857 would apply to it; but then arises the question whether that section did more than provide for the interval between the appointment of a burial board, and the formation of a burial ground.

Manisty was not heard in reply.

*Forgery—I O U—Surety—*24 & 25 Vict. c. 98, s. 23.

The prisoner, being pressed by a creditor for the payment of 35*l. obtained further time by giving an I O U for* 35*l., signed by himself, and also purporting to to be signed by W. W.'s name was a forgery:*

Held, that the instrument was a security for the payment of money by W., and that the forgery of his name was a felony within the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 98, s. 23.

Case reserved for the opinion of this court by Blackburn, J.

The prisoner was tried before me on an indictment for feloniously forging an instrument which was set out in the indictment in the words and figures following:

Nov. 21, 1870.

I O U thirty-five pounds.

£35. Arthur Chambers.
George Wickham.

It was described in one count as an undertaking for the payment of money, and in another as a security.

On the trial evidence was given that the prisoner having obtained a loan of 35*l.*, and being pressed for payment, obtained further time by giving as a security the instrument which purported to be signed by his brother-in-law, George Wickham.

It was objected that though, if the instrument had been genuine it might have been evidence of an account stated by Wickham, from which the law would have implied a promise on his part to pay the money, and so would in effect operate as an undertaking to pay the money, and as a security for its payment; yet it was not in itself either one or other.

I reserved the point, and left to the jury whether the instrument was forged by the prisoner with intent to defraud.

The verdict was guilty.

There was a second indictment against the prisoner on the same facts for a misdemeanor at common law for forging and uttering the same instrument.

After the first trial he withdrew the plea of not guilty to this indictment, and pleaded guilty to it.

I sentenced him to eight months' imprisonment on the indictment for misdemeanor, and to four months' imprisonment with hard labour on the indictment for felony, the latter sentence not to come into operation till after the decision of this court on the point reserved.

The question is whether the instrument in question was either an undertaking or a security within the meaning of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 98, s. 23. (a)

If that question is answered in the affirmative, the sentence of imprisonment with hard labour is to come into operation concurrently with the residue of the sentence of imprisonment. If answered in the negative it is not to come into operation.

Colin Blackburn.

No counsel appeared to argue on either side.

Kelly, C.B.—The question in this case is whether the instrument set out in the indictment is an undertaking or security for the payment of money within the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 98, s. 3, and the forgery thereof an offence within its provisions. The facts are, that the prisoner having obtained a loan of 35*l.*, and being pressed for payment, obtained further time by giving as a security an I O U for 35*l.*, purporting to be signed by himself and his brother-in-law, George Wickham. It was a genuine instrument so far as regards his own signature, but the name of George Wickham was forged. I am of opinion that this was clearly a security for payment of money within the Act. It was said that there was no consideration for the giving of it. That is not so, for there was forbearance obtained from the creditor. And now that Lord Tenterden's Act is repealed, and there is no necessity for the consideration to appear on the face of the instrument, it would have operated at all events as a guarantee by Wickham for the payment of 35*l.* if his name had not been forged.

Byles, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Pigott, B.—I also think that this was a security by Wickham to pay the debt for the prisoner.

(a) This section enacts that, "Whosoever shall forge or alter, or shall offer, utter, dispose of, or put off, knowing the same to be forged or altered, any undertaking, warrant, order, authority, or request for the payment of money, or for the delivery or transfer of any goods or chattels, of any note, bill, or other security for the payment of money, or for procuring or giving credit, or any indorsement or assignment of any such undertaking, warrant, order, authority, or request, or any accountable receipt, acquittance, or receipt for money, or for goods, or for any note, bill, or other security for the payment of money, or any indorsement on, or assignment of any such accountable receipt with intent in any of the cases aforesaid to defraud, shall be guilty of felony."

LUSH, J.—I think this was a security for the payment of money within the statute. Had this been the signature of Wickham he would have been bound by it, and it would have been a good guarantee for the payment of 35*l.* by him, and if that is so, the instrument is a security for the payment of money within the Act.

HANNEN, J. concurred.

Conviction affirmed.

REG. v. KNIGHT.

Larceny—Lost bank note—Misdirection.

Prisoner received from his wife a 10*l. Bank of England note, which she had found, and passed it away. The note was indorsed "E. May" only, and the prisoner, when asked to put his name and address on it by the person to whom he passed it, wrote on it a false name and address. When charged at the police station, the prisoner said he knew nothing about the note. The jury were directed that, if they were satisfied that the prisoner could within a reasonable time have found the owner, and if, instead of waiting at all, the prisoner immediately converted the note to his own use, intending to deprive the owner of it, it would be larceny. The prisoner was convicted.*

Held, that the jury ought to have been asked whether the prisoner, at the time he received the note, believed the owner could be found; and that the conviction was wrong.

CASE reserved for the opinion of this court.

At the general quarter session of the peace, holden by adjournment at St. Mary, Newington, in and for the county of Surrey, on Wednesday, the 26th July 1871, William George Green Knight was tried and convicted on an indictment, charging him in the first count with feloniously stealing 10*l.* in money, of the property of John Willimot Morgan; and, in the second count, with feloniously receiving the same money, well knowing it to have been stolen, upon the following evidence:—

Richard Adye Bailey, clerk in the Bank of England, having been sworn, produced a cancelled note of such bank for 10*l.*, paid 31st May 1871, No. 30,483, dated 22nd March 1871, indorsed E. May; E. Randall, 8, Cowland-terrace, Wandsworth-road; G. Hollyman, 345, Wandsworth-road.

John Willimot Morgan, on his oath, stated as follows:—

I am traveller and collector. On the 26th May last I received a 10*l.* note at Deptford, between one and half-past one o'clock, indorsed E. May. I put it in my left-hand waistcoat pocket. I went to South Bermondsey station, a quarter of a mile from where I received the note, and thence to Loughborough-park station. I called upon a customer in the Brixton-road. I walked from there to Clapham. I got there about three o'clock. It was the Oaks day. I walked along the Clapham-road. I put the note in my waistcoat pocket with my watch. I did not take out the note after. I missed it when I arrived at the office, Arthur-street, London-bridge. I went from Clapham station to the Borough-road station. I went the same night to Scotland-yard and gave information to the police. When at Clapham I went down High-street to Muswell's the butcher. I came up Acre-lane. I left Clapham at four o'clock by train.

George Hollyman, on his oath, stated:—

I am a clothier, carrying on business at 345, Wandsworth-road. On the 26th May last the prisoner came to me between seven and eight o'clock in the evening. I knew him by sight. I did not know his name. He purchased a waistcoat, two pairs of drawers, and other things, together of the value of 12*s.* 9*d.* He tendered a Bank of England note for 10*l.* The note produced by the witness Bailey is the one. I asked prisoner to indorse it, which he did. "E. Randall," as on the note produced. I put my initials under his name and gave him change. The articles produced by witness Tucker are of the same description as those I sold to prisoner. I will swear they are the same.

George Tucker, metropolitan police constable, 53 W. on his oath, stated:

I received a communication from the witness Hollyman. I apprehended the prisoner in the Wandsworth-road, about 7.15, on Saturday, 24th June. I said to him, I shall place you under arrest for some illegal proceedings or transactions in passing a 10*l.* Bank of England note, and a gentleman will charge you at the station. He did not say anything. I took him to the station. The sergeant there said to him, "You are charged with illegally converting this note to your own use." The prisoner said, "I know nothing about the note." He gave me his address, 2, Pensbury-street, Wandsworth-road, and gave me his latch key to be given to his wife. I took one pair of drawers from the prisoner, and detective Lonsdale brought me the waistcoat and other pair of drawers, which I now produce. When I apprehended him he said, "All right, I will go with you It is wrong in the deposition. I know nothing about it."

The prisoner's statement before the committing magistrate was read as follows:

My wife found it in Clapham-road on the Oaks-day, from half past four to five, between Manor-street and the Two Brewers. She left it till I came home from work at half-past six, and then told me what she had found. I said I did not think it was a good one, but I would take it to Mr. Hollyman and see if he could change it. I took it to him and thought no more about it. I had money to pay for the things in my pocket if it had not been all right. I did not come by it by dishonest means.

The counsel for the prosecution presented the case to the jury as a larceny of lost property by the finder.

The prisoner's counsel contended there was no evidence to show that the prisoner at the time when the note came into his possession had the intention of wrongfully and feloniously depriving the owner of his property, or that he knew or had any reasonable means of ascertaining to whom the note belonged (the only mark on the same when found being "E. May," not the name of the owner), and consequently, upon the authority of Reg. v. Thurborn (1 Den. C. C. 388; 3 Cox C. C. 453); Reg. v. Moore (30 L. J. 77, M. C.; 8 Cox C. C. 416); and Reg. v. Glyde (37 L. J. 107, M. C.; 11 Cox C. C. 103), the prisoner ought to be acquitted, it being laid down that on each of those points (as well as the conversion), there must be evidence to satisfy the jury.

The court, however, left the case to the jury, telling them that, if they were satisfied that the prisoner could within a reasonable time have found the owner, but, instead of waiting at all, he immediately converted the note to his own use by changing it, and that he intended to deprive the owner of the note against his will, it would be larceny, and in considering their verdict it would be right for them to remember the conduct of the prisoner, viz., that when asked by the person who changed the note to write his name and address on the back of the note, he wrote a false name and a false address, and when charged at the police station with the offence he said, I know nothing about the note.

The jury returned a verdict of guilty.

The court thereupon reserved for the decision of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved the question whether, under the circumstances, the conviction was right?

Judgment upon the prisoner was respited, and he was committed to the custody of the governor of the common gaol at Newington, in the said county, until the decision of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved should be known.

E. RICHARDS ADAMS, Chairman.

No counsel appeared to argue for the prisoner.

Oppenheim for the prosecution.—The question in this case is whether there was evidence to show that the prisoner at the time he appropriated the note to his own use believed he could find the owner of it. The case of Reg. v. Glyde decided that the finder of a sovereign in the high road, who at the time of finding had no reasonable means of knowing who the owner was, but who at that time intended to appropriate it, even if the owner should afterwards be discovered, and to whom the owner was speedily made known, when he refused to give it up, was held not guilty of larceny. That decision was come to on the ground that there was no evidence to show that when the prisoner picked up the sovereign he had any reason to believe that the true owner could be found. Here the evidence is different. [LUSH, J.—But that point was not put to the jury.] The question reserved for this court is whether, under the circumstances, having regard to the prisoner's conduct in dealing with the note and denying all knowledge of it, the conviction was right. Now, may not the court after verdict infer that the jury substantially found that point.

KELLY, C. B.—It is quite clear that this conviction cannot be sustained. There was no evidence that the prisoner, at the time when he first received this note from his wife, believed that the owner of it could be found; and if there had been, the proper question has not been left to the jury.

BYLES, J.—I also am of opinion that this conviction cannot be sustained. The prisoner found the note in his wife's hands, and he did not know who the owner was; and there is no evidence that he had the means of knowing. The appropriating it under these circumstances is not larceny.

PIGOTT, B.—The question left to the jury, and which they have found, is whether they were satisfied that the prisoner could have found the owner within a reasonable time. That finding is quite consistent with this, that the prisoner himself believed he could not have found the true owner.

LUSH, J.—The real question for the jury in this case was, what was in the mind of the prisoner when the bank note first came into his possession. But without regard to his belief the jury were asked whether they were satisfied that the prisoner could, within a reasonable time, have found the owner. The jury have thought that he could, the prisoner might have thought that he could not. The conviction cannot be sustained.

HANNEN, J. concurred.

Conviction quashed.

REG. (on the prosecution of the Assessment Committee of St. Pancras, reps.) v. THE GOVERNORS OF THE FOUNDLING HOSPITAL (apps.)

Valuation Metropolis Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict., c. 67) ss. 45, 54 Valuation list—Entry of gross and rateable value—Exceptional principle of valuation.

By sect. 45 of the Valuation Metropolis Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 67), the valuation made in pursuance of that Act is to be conclusive evidence of the gross value and of the rateable value of the several hereditaments included therein for the purpose of certain rates and taxes; but by sect. 54 nothing contained in the Act is to affect "any exemption or deduction from or allowance out of any rate or tax whatever, or any privilege of or provision for being rated or taxed on any exceptional principle of valuation."

The assessment committee of St. Pancras having entered in the valuation list prepared by them in pursuance of the above Act, the true gross value and the true rateable value of lands belonging to the Foundling Hospital, notwithstanding that the Foundling Hospital Act (13 Geo. 2, c. xxix.) provided that such lands were not to be rated at any higher value than that at which they were rated in 1739—

Held, that the true gross and true rateable value had been rightly inserted on the valuation list; and that it was not for the assessment committee to take into account the exceptional principles of valuation saved by sect. 54 of the Valuation Metropolis Act 1869.

THIS was a case stated for the opinion of the court by the Court of General Assessment Sessions for the Metropolis.

On an appeal on behalf of the governors and guardians of the hospital for the maintenance and education of exposed and deserted young children against a decision of the assessment committee of the parish of St. Pancras, Middlesex, approving and confirming an assessment in the new valuation list for the said parish, made under and in pursuance of the Valuation Metropolis Act 1869, whereby the building and premises used by the appellants for the purposes of the said hospital was assessed at 1900*l.* gross, and 1592*l.* rateable value, the Court of General Sessions for the Metropolis, holden on the 27th Feb. 1871, confirmed the assessment without costs, subject to the opinion of the court on the following

CASE.

1. The Foundling Hospital was incorporated by royal charter, in the year 1739, under the name of "The governors and guardians of the hospital for the maintenance and education of exposed and deserted young children," and by an Act of Parliament passed in the same year, 13 Geo. 2, c, 29, the powers granted by the charter were confirmed and enlarged. This Act, after reciting the charter and the powers thereby given for the purchase of lands and the purchase or erection of an hospital, proceeds as follows:

And be it therefore enacted by the King's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal and Commons in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that the said corporation called the governors and guardians of the hospital for the maintenance and education of exposed and deserted young children, and their successors, shall have power by any instrument under their common seal, to contract for or to purchase, any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, provided the same do not exceed the value of 4000*l* a year in fee beyond repairs, or to take or purchase for any term or terms of years, or as tenants from year to year or at will, any lands or tenements whatsoever, to hold and enjoy the same, and to erect any house or houses, building or buildings thereon, or to convert any house or houses, building or buildings which they shall so purchase or hire for that purpose, to be an hospital or hospitals for the reception of such poor and exposed children, in such manner as to the said corporation shall seem meet, and be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that all and every house or houses, lands, tenements, or hereditaments, which shall at any time hereafter be purchased or hired by the said corporation, to be used and converted into an hospital or hospitals as aforesaid, or on which any such hospital or hospitals, house or houses, shall be erected, shall at all times hereafter, whilst such house or houses, lands, tenements, or hereditaments, shall continue in possession of the said corporation, be rated and assessed to all rates and assessments, at such yearly rates and value, and in such proportion as such house or houses, lands, tenements, or hereditaments were rated and assessed in the year 1739, and shall not at any time hereafter so long as they shall continue in the possession of the said corporation as aforesaid, be rated or assessed at any higher value notwithstanding any improvement which shall be hereafter made by the said corporation, of or upon the same, by erecting any such house or houses, or other building or buildings, or by converting any building or buildings into such hospital or hospitals, house or houses, any laws, statute, or usage to the contrary notwithstanding.

2. In the year 1747, the corporation purchased the freehold estate on part of which the hospital now stands. It consists of about 56 acres, lying in one block, and was at that time open ground, but with the exception of the inclosed space surrounding and attached to the hospital building, it is now covered with houses, and may be described roughly as lying between Guildford-street on the south, Tavistock-place on the north, Russell-square on the west, and Gray's-inn-lane on the east. It is situate in the three parishes of St. Pancras, St. George the Martyr, and St. George, Bloomsbury. The hospital building itself was commenced about 1742, and finished about 1752.

3. The portion of the lands so purchased, and still held by the hospital, were rated and assessed in the year 1739 to the poor rate of St. Pancras, at the yearly rate and value of 27*l*. gross and 23*l*. net, and the governors and guardians of the said hospital, since they acquired the aforesaid lands down to the present time, have been uniformly rated and assessed in respect of the said lands, and of the offices and buildings thereon, used for the purposes of the hospital, at the yearly rateable value of 23*l*. to all rates and assessments whatsoever, except such as were made under, and by virtue of, the 34 Geo. 3, c. 96, as hereinafter mentioned.

4. Up to 1790 no building leases were granted by the hospital on their estate, but in that year a committee was appointed, empowered to grant leases, and determine, amongst other things, what proportions, if any, of the expense of railing and maintaining the new squares (that is, Mecklenburgh and Brunswick-squares), and their pavements, should be borne by the hospital.

5. In consequence of the large building operations now projected and commenced, the hospital applied for and obtained in 1794 an Act of Parliament, entitled "An Act for paving, cleansing, lighting, watching, watering, and otherwise improving and keeping in repair the streets, squares, and other public passages which are and shall be made upon certain pieces of ground in the parishes of St. Pancras, St. George the Martyr, and St. George Bloomsbury, or some or one of them in the county of Middlesex belonging to the hospital for the maintenance and education of exposed and deserted young children, commonly called the Foundling Hospital." By this Act, after reciting that the governors and guardians of the hospital were seised for the use of the hospital of certain pieces of ground containing 56 acres, or thereabouts, situate in the several parishes of St. Pancras, St. George the Martyr, and St. George Bloomsbury, in the county of Middlesex, or some or one of them, and that several persons had entered into contracts with the said governors and guardians for laying out and building several streets, squares, and other public passages and places upon the said pieces of ground, and that the same were then carrying on, and that it would contribute to the benefit and safety of all persons who were or should become inhabitants of the said several streets, squares, and other public passages and places, and to all persons who should have occasion to pass along the same if provision was made for fencing and paving, or otherwise repairing and keeping in repair such intended streets, squares, and other public passages and places, and also for cleansing, lighting, watching, and watering, and keeping the same free from all nuisances, annoyances, and encroachments; it was enacted that certain persons therein named should be commissioners for carrying the Act into execution for the term of three years, and that in May 1795, and in every succeeding year, the governors and guardians of the hospital should at their annual meeting, to be held under their Act of Parliament, elect twenty-one of the said governors and guardians to be commissioners for the succeeding year, and at the same time certain of the inhabitants, being householders residing within the limits of the Act, should elect twenty-one persons, having certain property qualifications within the limits of this Act as commissioners to act jointly with the twenty-one governors and guardians of the hospital. All the pavements of the carriage-ways, and footways, and things purchased or gotten for the purposes of the Act, are vested in the commissioners, and the commissioners are empowered to cause the several streets, &c., then or thereafter to be made within the limits of the Act to be paved, and such pavements to be kept in good repair, and to cause the streets, squares, and other public passages and places, to be cleaned, lighted, and watched, and watered, and the sides thereof, and also the middle of any squares, to be fenced or enclosed with iron rails, and all encroachments, obstructions, nuisances, and annoyances therein to be removed, and drains, sinks, gutters, and watercourses to be made for conveying the water off from the streets, &c., and it is provided that no person shall (under a penalty) alter the form or break up the ground or pavements of the carriage ways or footways, within any of the said streets, &c., or make the same otherwise than as should be directed by the commissioners. The commissioners are also empowered to cause lamps to be set up in the streets, and the houses to be named and numbered, and to cause the water to be conveyed from the roofs of houses by pipes, and from them into the common drains or sewers.

6. With regard to the expenses of carrying out the purposes of the Act, it is provided that one or more rate or rates, assessment or assessments, for the purpose of repairing, paving, cleansing, lighting, watering, and watching of the several streets, &c., within the limits of the Act, should be laid and assessed by the commissioners once or oftener in one year, upon all persons who should inhabit, hold, use, occupy, possess, or enjoy any land, ground, house, shop, warehouses, coach houses, stable, cellar, vault, building, or tenement in any of the said streets, squares, and other public passages, and places, in such sum or sums of money as the commissioners should direct; but so that the rates or assessments for any one year should not exceed the following sums: For paving, cleansing and lighting, 2*s.* in the pound, according to the yearly rent or value of such houses, &c.; for railing and ornamenting the areas or middle spaces of the squares, 1*s.* in the pound, according to the yearly rent or value of such houses as should be erected and built in such squares; for watching the said streets, &c., 6*d.* in the pound according to the yearly rent or value of the houses, &c., situate within the limits of the Act; and for watering such streets, &c., 6*d.* in the pound according to the yearly rent or value of the houses, &c., situate within the respective squares and other public passages and places to be watered in pursuance and according to the directions of the Act, and the commissioners were to cause separate and distinct accounts to be kept of the produce of the respective rates or assessments, and of the application of the same respectively.

7. The annual value of the tenements to be rated and assessed, was to be rated and ascertained according to the real rack rent or full yearly value thereof, or in any fair and equal proportion of such real rack rent or full yearly value as the commissioners should think proper.

8. There is a special provision in the Act as to the assessment of the hospital as follows:

Provided also that the aforesaid hospital, commonly called the Foundling Hospital, and the offices, buildings, and grounds, belonging, or to belong thereto, and used for the purposes of the hospital, shall be rated or assessed for all or any of the purposes of this Act, after and according to such annual sum or value as shall be equal to three-fifth parts of the amount of the several annual values which shall be rated or assessed upon the several houses abutting upon Guildford-street from Milman-street to the mews opposite to Lansdowne-place, and the several houses now built or hereafter to be built abutting and adjoining upon such other streets or ways as do or shall immediately adjoin the boundary walls or fences of the said hospital.

In the course of about thirty years from the commencement of operations in 1790, the whole of the hospital estate was laid out in squares and streets and let on building leases for terms of, in most cases, ninety-nine years, except the portion of ground inclosed by the walls of the hospital itself and retained for its use. This inclosed portion of about nine acres in extent is wholly within St. Pancras parish.

9. From the time of the passing of the 34 Geo. 3, c. 9 (A.D. 1794) down to the passing of the Police Metropolitan Act (10 Geo. 4, c. 44, A.D. 1829) the governors and guardians of the said hospital were rated and assessed by the commissioners appointed under the 34 Geo. 3, c. 96, for all the purposes of the said Act, including that of watching the streets and squares, &c., within the limits of the said Act, on a value ascertained in a manner provided by the said Act as above mentioned.

10. In the year 1829 the Police Metropolitan Act (10 Geo. 4, c. 44), was passed. By that Act, sect. 19, the night watch within their district was discontinued, and the power of assessing and levying any rate for that purpose ceased. By sect. 23 a rate for the metropolitan police became leviable according to the valuation for the time being acted upon in assessing the county rate. Accordingly from and after the passing of that Act down to the present time the governors and guardians of the said hospital ceased to be rated under the 34 Geo. 3, c. 96, for watching the streets and squares aforesaid, and have been rated for the metropolitan police upon the basis of the county rate under the said Act of 1829 at the yearly rate and value of 234*l.* rateable value.

11. For many years before and at the time of the passing of the Metropolis Local Management Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120) in 1855 the governors and guardians of the said hospital continued to be rated under the 34 Geo. 3, c. 96, for all the purposes of that Act, except that of watching upon the basis of value above stated, 1244*l.*, being the actual amount upon which the rate was made.

12. In 1855 the Metropolis Local Management Act was passed and came into operation on the 1st Jan. 1856. This Act recites that it is expedient that provision should be made for the better local management of the metropolis in respect of sewerage and drainage, and the pavement, cleansing, lighting, and improvement thereof.

13. The government of the metropolis for the purposes of the Act is placed under the control of the Metropolitan Board of Works and of certain local district boards of which the St. Pancras parish is one.

14. The principal sections relative to rating and assessment are as follows:

Sect. 161:

The overseers of the poor of every parish to whom any such order as aforesaid is issued, shall levy the amount mentioned therein according to the exigency thereof, and shall for that purpose make separate equal pound rates upon their parish, or the part thereof upon which any sum specified in such order is required to be levied in respect of each sum thereby ordered to be levied, that is to say, a separate rate in respect of each sum ordered to be levied for paying expenses connected with sewerage, to be called a sewers rate. A separate rate in respect of each sum ordered to be levied for defraying expenses of lighting (where a separate sum is ordered to be levied for defraying such expenses) to be called a lighting rate. And a separate sum in respect of each sum ordered to be levied for defraying other expenses of executing this Act, to be called a general rate, and shall make such respective rates of such amount in the pound on the annual value of the property rateable, as will in their judgment, having regard to all circumstances, be sufficient to raise the sums specified in such order; and such rates shall be levied on the persons and in respect of the property by law rateable to the relief of the poor in the respective parishes, and shall be assessed upon the net annual value of such property ascertained by the rate for the time being for the relief of the poor; and the said overseers shall for the purpose of levying such rates proceed in the same manner, and have the same powers, remedies, and privileges as for levying money for the relief of the poor; and all such rates shall be allowed in the same manner, and be subject to all the same provisions in relation to appeal, and to excusing persons from payment on account of poverty and otherwise as the rate for the relief of the poor in the same parish, and such overseers shall pay to the treasurer of the vestry or board, or otherwise as in such order directed, the amount mentioned in the order within the time or respective times specified for that purpose, and the excess if any which may have been levied beyond such amount, which excess shall be placed to the credit of the parish, or part in which the same has been levied. And the said overseers shall at the time of making any such payment deliver with the money a note in writing signed by them specifying the amount so paid, which note shall be kept as a voucher for the receipt of that particular amount, and the receipt of the treasurer of the vestry or board of any proper officer or person of, or belonging to any bank into which such money is so paid specifying the amount so paid to him by the overseers, shall be a sufficient discharge to the overseers for such amount.

Sect. 162:

Provided always that all such hospitals, public schools, and other public buildings, dead walls, and void spaces of ground as are now by law rateable to any rate for the costs and charges of paving or repairing the pavements within any parochial or other district, either separately or jointly with any other object or objects (except only places of religious worship and burial grounds), or places which have been used for burial grounds and are not used for any other purpose, shall be rateable under this Act to the like extent and for the like objects or purposes as they may now be rated, and the rates to be made in respect of such objects or purposes shall be payable by the persons now liable to pay the same, and be recoverable in like manner as any rate to which such buildings and spaces of ground are now rateable as aforesaid in respect of like objects or purposes

15. The following sections relate to the repeal and varying of inconsistent or conflicting local Acts.

Sect. 247:

All Acts of Parliament in force in any parish or place to which this Act extends, or in any part of such parish or place shall, so far as the same are inconsistent with the provisions of this Act be repealed as regards such parish or place, or such part thereof, notwithstanding any provisions of this Act continuing and transferring respectively to vestries or parishes, and transferring to district boards any duties, powers, authorities now or vested in vestries, commissioners, or other bodies.

Sect. 248:

Upon the petition of the Metropolitan Board of Works, or of any district board or vestry representing to Her Majesty in Council, that by reason of the provisions of any local Act of Parliament relating to any district or parish, or any part thereof respectively, difficulties have arisen in the execution of this Act and of such local Act, or either of them, and praying for a suspension or alteration of all or any of the provisions of such local Act, or for the establishment of other provisions in lieu thereof, under this enactment, it shall be lawful for Her Majesty, by order in council, to suspend or alter all or any of the provisions of such local Act, and to make other provisions in relation to the matters thereof, as Her Majesty, with the advice of Her Privy Council, may think necessary under the circumstances of the case, and every such order in council shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament within one month after the making thereof, if Parliament be then sitting, or if Parliament be not sitting, then within one month after the next meeting of Parliament, and shall be published in the London Gazette. Provided always, that no such order in council shall remain in force beyond the term of one year from the making thereof."

16. From and after the passing of the Metropolitan Local Management Act down to the present time the governors and guardians of the said hospital have ceased to be rated for the purposes of paving, lighting, cleansing, or any other purpose whatsoever within the limits of the 34 Geo. 3, c. 96, and have been rated for the purposes of the Metropolitan Local Management Act within the parish of St. Pancras as well as to all other rates up to April 1867 at the yearly rent and value of 234*l.* gross, and 234*l.* rateable value, and since that time of 275*l.* gross, and 234*l.* rateable value.

17. Up to the passing of the Metropolitan Local Management Act, the governors and guardians of the said hospital paid sewerage rates to the commissioners of sewers upon the yearly rate and value of 234*l.* rateable value. Since the passing of the said Act they have paid sewers rates to the parish of St. Pancras upon the same value as above stated.

18. On the 9th Aug. 1869, the Valuation Metropolis Act 1869 was passed to provide (according to the preamble) a common basis of value for the purposes of government and local taxations, and to promote uniformity in the assessment of rateable property in the metropolis. This Act incorporates in it sects. 17 to 21, inclusive, of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 103.

19. By sect. 45 of the said Act it is enacted as follows:—

The valuation list for the time being in force shall be deemed to have been duly made in accordance with this Act, and the Act incorporated herewith, and shall for all or any purposes in this section mentioned be conclusive evidence of the gross value and of the rateable value of the several hereditaments included therein, and of the fact that all hereditaments required to be inserted therein have been so inserted, that is to say—

(1.) For the purpose of any of the following rates, which are made during the year that the list is in force, namely, the county rate, the metropolitan police rate, the church rate, the highway rate, the poor rate, the police, sewers, consolidated, and other rates in the City of London, the sewers, lighting, general, and other rates levied by order of district boards or vestries, the main drainage improvement, and other rates and sums assessed on any part of the metropolis by the Metropolitan Board of Works, assessments for contributions under the Metropolitan Poor Rate 1867, and every other rate, assessment, and contribution levied, made, and required in the metropolis on the basis of value.

(2.) For the purpose of any of the following taxes which become chargeable during the year that the list is in force, namely

(a) The tax on houses, levied under the House Tax Act and the Act therein incorporated or referred to.

(b) Any tax assessed in pursuance of the Income Tax Act, and any Acts continuing or amending the same on any lands, tenements, and hereditaments in all cases where the tax is charged on the gross value and not on profits.

(3.) For the purpose of determining so far as it is applicable, the value of any hereditament included therein for the purposes of the Acts relating to the sale of excisable liquors, to the qualification of a juror, to the qualification of a vestryman, and an auditor of accounts under the Metropolis Management Act 1855, and to the qualification of a guardian, and of a manager under the Poor Law Amendment Act 1834, or the Metropolitan Poor Act 1867, at any time at which such value is required to be ascertained.

And in construing the Metropolitan Police Act and the Acts amending the same, the last valuation for the time being acted upon in assessing the county rate shall be deemed to mean the valuation list for the time being in force.

And in construing the County Rate Act and Acts referring to the valuation estimate basis or standard for the county rate, the valuation estimate, basis or standard shall be deemed to be the rateable value stated in such list.

And in construing the House Tax Act and the Acts therein incorporated or referred to, the full and just yearly rate shall be deemed to be the gross value stated in such list.

And in construing the Income Tax Act and Acts continuing or amending that Act with respect to schedules A. and B. thereof, annual value shall be deemed to mean the gross value stated in such lists.

20. By section 54 it is provided that—

Nothing contained in this Act, or the Act incorporated herewith, shall affect any exemption or deduction from or allowance out of, any rate or tax whatever, or any privilege of or provision for being rated or taxed on any exceptional principle of valuation.

21. On the hearing of the appeal the appellants contended that the sums 275*l.* gross and 234*l.* net should alone be inserted in the valuation list, such sums being the sums ascertained in the manner pointed out by the Foundling Hospital Act (13 Geo. 2, c. xxix.)

22. The appellant further contended that in every case the entry as it at present stands is improper and insufficient, and that if the actual gross and rateable value is entered at all, it ought to be accompanied with such special note or instructions as would prevent the parish officers from making the rates referred to in sect. 45 of the Metropolis Valuation Act 1869, upon such actual value, and would direct them to make the rates on the value ascertained, as provided by 13 Geo. 2, c. xxix.

23. The respondents contended that the true gross and rateable value of the said property, as defined by the Valuation Metropolis Act 1869, should be inserted in the valuation list, leaving the parish officers when making the poor rate to make it on this exceptional principle of valuation referred to in the statute of Geo. 2, and when making the general rate under sect. 161 of 18 & 19 Vict., c. 120, for maintaining, paving, and repairing, &c. the roads, &c., and for the payment of the interest on the bond debts of the extinct paving trust to make such general rate on the exceptional principle of valuation referred to in the statute of Geo. 3.

24. The respondents further contended that, at any rate, the sum of 275*l.* gross, and 234*l.* net, ought not alone to appear in the list but that some special entry ought to be made in the valuation list, with reference to the appellants' property, so as to enable the parish officers properly to make the rates referred to in sect. 15 of the Metropolitan Valuation Act 1869.

25. The court of general assessment sessions confirmed the valuation list in order that the opinion of the court might be taken on the beforementioned questions of law.

26. The Acts referred to herein are to be taken to form part of this case.

27. The questions for the opinion of the court are: first, whether the true gross and rateable value of the appellants' property now in their occupation, as defined by the Valuation Metropolis Act 1869, should be inserted in the valuation list; or, secondly, whether the gross and rateable value of such property for the purpose of such list, should be ascertained as pointed out by the Foundling Hospital Paving Act (34 Geo. 3, c. xcvii); or, thirdly, whether the gross and rateable value of such property for the purposes of such list should be ascertained in the manner pointed out by the Foundling Hospital Act (13 Geo. 2, c. xxix.); fourthly, whether the valuation list should contain a special entry showing, in addition to the true gross and rateable value of such property, the gross and rateable value ascertained under the said Acts of Geo. 2 and 3, or either and which of them, and whether it should contain any and what instructions as to the making or rates on the said values respectively.

28. If the court should be of opinion that the said property ought not to be charged and assessed in the valuation list in either of such before mentioned ways, then the court to decide in what way it should be valued and assessed in such lists.

29. The case to go back to the general assessment sessions to alter the valuation list in accordance with the judgment of the court.

Poland, for the respondents, showed cause.—It was the duty of the general assessment committee to enter on the valuation list the true gross and rateable value as they have done. The object of 32 & 33 Vict., c. 67, was to produce uniformity of assessment, rates having formerly been made on the annual value as stated in the Parochial Assessment Act, the mode of arriving at the annual value being different in different parishes. The Union Assessment Committee Act (25 & 26 Vict. c. 103), ss. 17-21, is by sects. 6 and 7 of the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 67, to be read with this latter part, and the assessment is to be made accordingly. The valuation list so made is by sect. 45, to be "conclusive evidence of the gross value and of the rateable value of the several hereditaments included therein, and of the fact that all hereditaments required to be inserted therein have been so inserted," for the purposes of the various rates and taxes mentioned therein. Sect. 54 provides for exceptional principles of valuation to be applied in any particular case, enacting that "nothing contained in this Act, or the Act incorporated herewith, shall affect any exemption or deduction from, or allowance out of any rate or tax whatever, or any privilege of, or provision for, being rated or taxed, on any exceptional principle of valuation." The assessment committee are bound to insert in the valuation list the true gross and true rateable value: it is not for them to apply or make allowance for the exceptional principles of valuation saved by sect. 54; that is the business of the particular local authority in each case. All the assessment committee have to do, is to see that the true gross and true rateable value of all the property in the metropolis are contained in the valuation list. It is submitted that they were right in doing this, and refusing to take account of the exceptional principle of valuation contained in the Foundling Hospital Act (32 Geo. 2, c. xxix).

Millward, Q.C. and Fullarton for the appellants.—The assessment committee, in making the valuation list, should have taken into account the exceptional principle of valuation affecting the property of the appellants by virtue of the Foundling Hospital Act (34 Geo. 2, c. xxix.), all exceptional principles of valuation being expressly saved by sect. 54 of 32 & 33 Vict., c. 67. No provision is made for any appeal from the determination of the assessment committee as to the rateable value of property, and by sect. 45, the assessment is to be conclusive for five years as to all taxes named in that section. [COCKBURN, C.J.—But sect. 54 preserves you the benefit of the exceptional principle of valuation contained in your Act.] The committee should have made allowance for that. [COCKBURN, C.J.—Are you not complaining before you are hurt? When a rate is made affecting you, you will be entitled to the benefit of the privilege contained in your Act; but the assessment committee are not imposing a rate, they merely prepare a statement of value.] At any rate there ought to be a memorandum attached to the entry in the valuation list, pointing out that the appellants' property is entitled to the privilege conferred by the Foundling Hospital Act. [COCKBURN C.J.—What power have we to order the committee to do that? And what would such a direction amount to, but simply calling their attention to the 54th section of the Act. We can only say that the valuation list must be made according to the Act of Parliament.]

COCKBURN, C.J.—It is unnecessary to add anything to what we have said in the course of the argument. This is neither a rate nor an assessment, but only a valuation with a view to an assessment, and the appeal must be dismissed.

MELLOR and HANNEN, J.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

EASTON (app.) v. RICHMOND HIGHWAY BOARD (resps.)

Highway Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 101) s. 51—Conviction for encroaching upon highway—Side of carriage way not dedicated to the public.

By sect. 51 of the Highway Act 1864, a penalty is provided upon summary conviction, "if any person shall encroach by making or causing to be made, any building, or pit, or hedge, ditch, or other fence, . . . on the side or sides of any carriage way or cartway, notwithstanding that the whole space of 15 feet from the centre of such carriage way or cartway has not been maintained with stones or other materials used in forming highways."

Upon a case stated by magistrates, who had convicted the owner of the neighbouring soil of encroaching upon a highway by building a wall within 15 feet of its centre, but upon part of a green which the carriage way crossed, and which had never been dedicated to the public.

Held that this section did not relate to any ground which was not part of the highway, and that the conviction was wrong.

THIS was a case stated by two of her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the division of Gilling West in the North Riding of the county of York, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on questions of law which arose as hereinafter stated.

At a petty sessions holden at Richmond in and for the division of Gilling West, in the North Riding of the county of York on the 3rd Sept. 1870, an information was preferred by John Hodgson (hereinafter called the respondent), the surveyor of the Richmond Highway District Board, in the North Riding of Yorkshire, against John Easton (hereinafter called the appellant), for that he, the said appellant, on or before the 1st Aug. 1870, at West Layton, in the parish of Hatton Long Villiers, unlawfully did encroach on the side of a certain carriage way there situate, called the East Layton Road, within 15 feet of the centre thereof, by making, or causing to be made, a certain building, to wit, a stone wall thereon, contrary to the form of the statutes in such case made and provided: and was heard and determined, the parties respectively being then present, and upon such hearing the appellant was duly convicted of the said offence, and the said appellant was adjudged for his said offence to forfeit and pay the sum of twenty shillings, to be paid and applied according to law, and also to pay unto the said respondent the sum of four shillings and sixpence for his costs in this behalf.

And whereas the appellant, being dissatisfied with this determination, upon the hearing of the said information, as being erroneous in point of law, hath, pursuant to sect. 2 of the said statute (20 & 21 Vict. c. 43), duly applied to the justices in writing to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and grounds of such determination as aforesaid for the opinion of this court, and hath duly entered into a recognisance as required by the said statute in that behalf.

Now, therefore, the said justices, in compliance with the said application, and the provision of the said statute, and by consent of the parties, hereby stated and signed the following case.

Upon the hearing of the said information it was admitted on the part of the appellant, and found as facts:

That the carriage way mentioned in the information is a highway repairable by the township of West Layton, and the portion of the highway on which the alleged encroachment was made, runs across the village green of West Layton aforesaid for the distance of 200 yards or thereabouts, into another highway, leading from the said village of West Layton to the village of Caldwill.

That the appellant is lord of the manor of West Layton, and the whole of the village, the green, and the property around belongs to him.

That before the alleged encroachment, the portion of the highway which crosses the said village green was wholly unenclosed, and the width of the metalled road crossing the green was 8ft.; the grass came up to the metalled road, and there was no difference between the grass adjoining the metalled road and the rest of the green.

That on the south side of the road, crossing the green for the greatest part thereof, the ground sloped gradually from the metalled road to the extent of from 1ft. to 2ft., or an average of 1½ft. all the way down the village green, and on the north side there was a hollow at about 3ft. distance from the metalled road, but neither the slope nor the hollow were of such a character as to prevent carriages or other vehicles passing along or crossing the same, if it were necessary to do so for the purpose of avoiding any carriage or other vehicle travelling in a contrary direction, although for a few feet in two or three places rather more than ordinary care would require to be taken to avoid any danger of overturning. On the east side of the village green, before entering on the green, the road is for a short distance enclosed between hedges, and the width of the enclosed part, including the waste on the side of the road, is 12ft. from hedge to hedge. The road is very little used.

That the appellant had lately enclosed the road across the said village green, for nearly the whole length thereof by building a wall on each side thereof. The said wall is built at the foot of the said slope on the south side of the road, and in the said hollow on the north side thereof, and upon both the north and south side the wall is built upon the green, and about 4ft. from the metalled road. The width from wall to wall is 16ft.

That the said village green had generally been depastured by the tenants of the adjoining farms, and the public have always been accustomed to ride and walk or take carts across the green where sufficiently level, without interruption, but they have not exercised any greater or other right of passage over the grass adjoining the metalled road than they have over the rest of the said green, which is about 5 or 6 acres in extent, and extends in width from 80 or 100 yards on each side of the road. It was alleged by the respondents that if two carts loaded with straw or hay met upon the road, one or other would have to go on the grass, although there was no evidence that two loaded carts had ever been seen to meet. It was admitted that in such event one or other might have to go on to the grass.

It was contended by the appellant that there was nothing in the Highway Acts to prevent his building on his own land within 15ft. of the centre of the highway, providing that he did not build upon the highway or boundaries thereof, and it was also contended that as the walls were built on the village green, and at the distance from the metalled road above stated, but leaving no more than a width of 16ft. between wall and wall, and that as the part of the green on which the walls were built (though open ground) had never, as the appellant contended, been dedicated to the public as a highway to any greater extent than the whole green had been dedicated, the walls were not built upon the highway or sides thereof, so as be an encroachment within the meaning of the Acts, and therefore that the appellant ought not to have been convicted.

The justices, however, being of opinion that the walls had been built upon the sides of the highway, leaving only a width of 16ft. between wall and wall, and that the appellant had thereby encroached on the said highway within the meaning of the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 101, s. 51; and being also of opinion that by reason of such encroachment the said highway had been reduced in width to less than 30ft. between the fences on each side thereof, within the meaning of the said section, gave their determination against the appellant in the manner before stated.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether, upon the facts above stated, the appellant was justified in building the walls in question, only leaving a width of 16ft. between wall and wall, or was bound to leave a space or roadway of the width of 30ft.

If the court should be of opinion that the appellant was not justified in building the walls as stated in this case, the conviction is to stand, but if the court should be of opinion otherwise, the information is to be dismissed.

Field, Q. C. (with him Herschell) argued for the appellant.—The section under which the appellant was convicted is the 51st of the Highway Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 101.) "From and after the passing of this Act, if any person shall encroach by making or causing to be made any building or pit or hedge, ditch or other fence, or by placing any dung, compost, or other materials for dressing land, or any rubbish, on the side or sides of any carriage way or cartway, except for the purpose of improving the road, and by order of the highway board, or where there is no highway board, of the surveyor, he shall be subject on conviction for every such offence to any sum not exceeding 40s., notwithstanding that the whole space of 15ft. from the centre of such carriage way or cartway has not been maintained with stones or other materials used in forming highways: and it shall be lawful for the justices assembled at petty sessions, upon proof to them made upon oath, to levy the expenses of taking down such building, hedge, or fence, or filling up such ditch or pit, and removing such dung, compost, materials, or rubbish, as aforesaid, or restoring the injury caused by the removal of such soil or turf, upon the person offending. Provided always that where any carriage way or cartway is fenced on both sides, no encroachment as aforesaid shall be allowed whereby such carriage way or cartway shall be reduced in width to less than 30ft. between the fences on each side." To understand the effect of this provision, it is necessary to consider the previous legislation on the subject, and the authorities upon it. The case of Lowen v. Kaye (4 B. & C. 3) was decided upon 13 Geo. 3, c. 78, ss. 6 and 64, by which a person was liable to a penalty if he "shall encroach by making any hedge, ditch, or fence on any highway;" it was held that upon an action for trespass against the surveyor for pulling down a fence which plaintiff had erected, so that the road was only 24ft. wide, a proper question for the jury was whether the fence was erected on the highway, or on the plaintiff's soil. By 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50 (The Highway Act 1835), s. 63, "where, in this Act, any matter or thing is directed or forbidden to be done within a certain distance of the centre of a highway, that portion of ground shall be deemed and taken to be the highway which has been maintained by the surveyor as highway and repaired with stones or other materials used in forming highways for the six months immediately preceding." And by sect. 69 a penalty is imposed, "if any person shall encroach by making or causing to be made any building, hedge, ditch, or other fence, on any carriage way or cartway within the distance of 15ft. from the centre thereof." Under this Act, it was held that the erection of a building within 15ft. of the centre of a carriage way which has been repaired by the surveyor for the six months preceding, but not on any part of the highway which has been lately used for passage, is not an encroachment of which justices can take summary cognisance: (Chapman v. Robinson, 1 E. & E. 25.) "The encroachment," Wightman J. said in his judgment, "must be within 15ft. of the centre of the highway, and also upon that which is highway." Another authority upon this 69th section is that of Maule J., who summed up, in an action against a surveyor for pulling down a fence built by the plaintiff by which the highway was rendered only 22ft. wide: "In order that a fence put up by a party should come within the provisions of the statute that has been cited, two things must concur, the one, that it must be within 15ft. of the centre of the road, the other, that it must be on the road. If an encroachment was made by putting up a fence at the edge of a road as wide as Portland-place, that would not be within this enactment, because it would not be within 15ft. of the centre of the road. So if the road was under 30ft. wide, and the encroachment was at the side of it, but not on the road, it would on that ground not be within the 69th section of the Highway Act. Here we find that there is a road running along this line, but that the two places inclosed never were parts of that road, as no carriage ever did or could go along the steep bank at The Pound, or over the rough uneven ground at Nichols; and if these places at which the fences were put up have never either of them been used by the public as a part of the road, the surveyor had no right to pull down the fences, because they were within 15ft. of the centre of the road: (Evans v. Oakley Car. & Kir. 125.) Now, under the last Act of 1864, there is certainly a change in the language, but the question is whether the change is so extensive as to meet this case. There must be an encroachment, which, according to Jacob's Law Dictionary, "Signifies an unlawful gaining upon the right or possession of another man." There must, therefore, be some injury to the rights of the public, which the building of these walls cannot be, unless this grass had been dedicated to the public. According to the case there has been no such dedication. [BLACK-BURN, J.—Your argument is, that although sect. 51 of the Act of 1864 was passed to overrule Chapman v. Robinson, it was not intended to overrule Evans v. Oakley?] Yes.

Manisty, Q.C. (with him Cave) for respondents.—In some cases it may be difficult to decide what is the side of a road, but it is clear that in this section the side must mean something different from the carriage way or cartway itself. In Grove v. West (7 Taunt. 39), cited in the note to Evans v. Oakley, Gibbs, C.J, said: "Primâ facie the presumption is, that a strip of land lying between a highway and the adjoining close belongs to the owner of the close, as the presumption also is that the highway itself ad medium filum viæ does. But the presumption is to be confined to that extent; for if the narrow strip be contiguous to, or communicate with open commons or larger portions of land, the presumption is either done away or considerably narrowed; for the evidence of ownership, which applies to the larger portions, applies also to the narrow strip which communicates with them." It must be a question of fact in every case how far a strip by the road is the side of the road, and here in effect the justices have found that the public had a right to use the land enclosed by the appellant. [COCKBURN, C.J.—The words of the case do not mean that the whole green is a highway, but they are express that the public have not exercised any greater or other right of passage over the grass adjoining the metalled road than they have over the rest of the green. MELLOR, J.—The justices do not find that these strips were dedicated to the public.] They find that it was used by the public. [MELLOR, J.—Yes; but they tell us the kind of user, in order that we may judge of its effect.] Taking the case as it is, clearly this is not like Evans v. Oakley, where the strip by the side of the highway could not be used as a road. Lord Denman said, in Elwood v. Bullen (6 Q.B. 409): "Where a highway passes through an inclosed country, it is not the formed road merely (whether of pavement, gravel, or other material), but the whole space from fence to fence which is the highway; and an obstruction in any part is equally the subject of an indictment. The extent of a highway, where it passes over a common, is frequently still more indefinite to the right and left of what may be the ordinary passage." Even if your Lordships hold that the side of a carriage way, to be within the Act must be dedicated to the public, I would ask that the case should be sent back to the magistrates, in order that they may find the facts on that point. [BLACKBURN, J.—I see nothing in the case to show us that the public had any right to go over the grass upon which the walls are built.]

COCKBURN, C.J.—In this case I am of opinion that the conviction was wrong, and that there was no encroachment on the appellant's part within the meaning of the 51st section of the Act of 1864. It is suggested by Mr. Field that this provision was not intended in any way to interfere with or limit the ruling of Maule, J. in Evans v. Oakley, and I think that its object certainly was rather to meet the circumstances of Chapman v. Robinson, and to set aside that decision so far as it was thereby held that this erection of a building by the side of a highway was not an encroachment, unless the place upon which it was built had been lately used for passage. It seems to me that the recent enactment on the subject was merely meant to meet the case of a highway wider than the metalled road. And the true construction of the statute is, not that it should include the case of building upon rough or waste land by the side of the road, which could not possibly be used by the public, but it is intended for the case of building upon that part of a highway which is not metalled or gravelled, but which has been dedicated to the public. This is reasonable; for the rough ground by the side of the road might be such as could never have been part of the highway, and it would be a confiscation of the owner's property to hold that he could not build upon it. But it would be reasonable that, whatever was part of the highway, though not gravelled, should be protected and preserved for the public, and this would be no interference with the rights of the owner, who has, indeed, abandoned all his rights to the strips by the side of the road when he dedicated them to the public. There could be no hardship or injustice in this; and by putting such a construction on the Act, the fair and proper objects of the Legislature would be attained, and all rights and interests would be reconciled and regarded. Applying this principle to the present case, the land by the side of the road, which formed no part of the highway, was not within the enactment, and therefore the magistrates were wrong in convicting the appellant for an unlawful encroachment on the highway, if, as we understand the case, the pieces of grass between the new walls and the metalled road had never been dedicated to the public.

BLACKBURN, J.—I also think that the magistrates have here mistaken the meaning of this Act, but I consider that theirs is a very natural mistake to fall into. When a highway exists of which a part only is metalled road, it is generally a question of fact how much between the fences is included in the highway. Primâ facie, the whole of it is highway, but this may be rebutted by evidence, and the facts of this case seem to show that none but the metalled part of this green was highway. Now at common law encroachments on the highway, whether it was gravelled or not, were unlawful and indictable. The early statutes, giving magistrates summary jurisdiction (13 Geo. 3, c. 78 and 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50) were restricted to the metalled or gravelled part. The two cases cited (Chapman v. Robinson and Evans v. Oakley) were clearly right. The recent Act simply adopted the principal of the common law, and related to the whole highway, gravelled or not. But it did not go beyond the boundaries of the highway, and therefore the magistrates in this case were wrong. The Legislature had a right to take away people's rights without compensation, but it was not to be presumed that they had done so without clear and express words to that effect. To have taken any land which was no part of the highway would have had this effect, and that construction did not appear to be required to carry out the object of the Act. The phrase, "on the side or sides of the highway," therefore, was to be confined to those parts which belonged to the highway. The conviction, therefore, will be quashed.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that it was not the intention of the Legislature to take away any person's property. Therefore, if on the sides of the carriage way there were any pieces of land not included in the highway, they were protected from the penalty of encroachment; but if they were pieces of land by the sides of the y, and forming part of that which had been ed to the public, the owner of the neigh-

; soil had no right to build upon them.
agree that there is no evidence of dedica-the public, and I think the magistrates have rpreted the Act.

Everton Drainage Act 1860 the owners and pro- embankment and drainage works, without l be considerably diminished. The rates so ed were made payable by the occupiers, who uthorised to deduct the amount from their rent:

hat the average annual cost of the works to be deducted from the occupier's rent, in to estimate the net annual value under the chial Assessment Act 1836.

eal from the decision of justices in special in the matter of a poor rate, the Court ter Sessions confirmed the decision of the tices, subject to the following case:

espondent is a farmer and occupier of cerıds in the parish of Misterton, in the poor on of Gainsborough, and the Duke of Port-the owner and proprietor of the said lands.
r the provisions of a local Act (23 & 24 cliv.), called the Everton, &c., Drainage 0, which is to be taken to form part of this d which was "An Act to Consolidate into t and to Amend, Extend, and Enlarge the and Provisions of the several Acts for king and Draining certain Low Lands and s in the Parishes or Townships of Everton, rth, Gringley-on-the-Hill, Misterton, and ingham, in the county of Nottingham, and e further and better Provision for such ument and Drainage," the said lands in the of Misterton, so occupied by the respondent said, became liable to be rated, and have ted, under the 58th section of the said Act, year since the passing of the said Act, for poses for which the said Act was passed, in n of 29*l.* 5*s.*, and a similar rate will be l in future years.

Duke of Portland, the owner and proprietor said lands as aforesaid, has duly paid the m when required, and the same has not id by the respondent at any time.

respondent was rated in the poor rate l against, which was made in accordance e valuation list then in force for the parish rton, as under:

Owner.	Description of Property.	Name of Situation of Property.	Estimated Extent.	Grosseet Rental.	Net Rateable Value.	Rated at in the Pound.
Duke of Portland.	Land	Misterton-	A. R. P. 148 3 22	£ s. d. 147 5 9	£ s. d. 132 10 0	£ s. d. 7 14 7 whole rate raised under the said Act is spent in each year in maintaining drainage works. No portion of it is expended in constructing new works, or in paying back money borrowed in former years, or in interest on such moneys.

Without such drainage rate the drainage works by which the land occupied by the respondent is drained could not be maintained.

Without such drainage works as those just mentioned, the land occupied by the respondent would be under water at certain seasons of the year, and could not be maintained in its present state, and the annual value thereof would be considerably diminished.

In assessing the respondent to the above poor rate, no deduction or allowance whatever was made for or in respect of the said drainage rate of 29*l.* 5*s.* in arriving at the net rateable value. In other respects the respondent admits that the assessment is proper and just. But the respondent appealed against the rate to the justices in special sessions for the petty sessional division of East Retford on the ground that he was entitled to deduct the said sum, and the said justices decided that he was so entitled.

The present appellants then appealed to the Court of Quarter Sessions, upon the ground that no deduction whatever ought to be made for or in respect of the said drainage rate, and the appeal was heard at the adjourned Quarter Sessions for the county of Nottingham, held at Newark, on the 24th day of Oct., 1870, before John Evelyn Denison, Esq., chairman, and a bench of magistrates. The said Court of Quarter Sessions, under the circumstances above mentioned, thought that the expenses of maintaining such drainage works were expenses necessary to maintain the said land in a state to command the rent at which the said land was assessed in the said rate, and gave judgment for the respondent; but granted this case for the Court of Queen's Bench, and ordered that the costs of the appeal and of this case should abide the event.

The question for the opinion of this court is, whether the said drainage rate of 29*l.* 5*s.* ought to be deducted from the gross estimated rental of the said lands.

If the court should be of opinion that the respondent is entitled to the said deduction, the order of sessions to be confirmed.

If the court should be of opinion that the respondent is not entitled to the said deduction, the order of sessions to be quashed.

Cave (with him Mellor) for respondent.—The question in this case arises under the Parochial Assessment Act 1836 (6 & 7 Will 4, c. 96), s. 1, which enacts that "no rate for the relief of the poor in England and Wales shall be allowed by any justices, or be of any force, which shall not be made upon an estimate of the net annual value of the several hereditaments rated thereunto; that is to say, of the rent at which the same might reasonably be expected to let from year to year, free of all usual tenant's rates and taxes, and tithe commutation rentcharge, if any, and deducting therefrom the probable average annual cost of the repairs, insurance, and other expenses, if any, necessary to maintain them in a state to command such rent." By the 62nd section of the local Act, "The tenant or occupier of any lands and grounds embanked and drained, or intended to be embanked and drained by virtue of this Act, is hereby authorised and required to pay such sum and sums of money, not exceeding half a year's accruing rent, as shall be assessed, taxed, or charged upon the owner or proprietor of any such lands or grounds in his occupation, and to deduct the same out of his rent then due or accruing due; and every tenant or occupier who shall make such payment shall be acquitted and discharged for so much money as the sum he shall so pay shall amount unto, as if the same had been actually paid unto the person to whom his rent was due and payable." This deduction is claimed by the respondent, not as a tenant's rate, but under the last branch of the above section of the Parochial Assessment Act, as expenses necessary to maintain the land in a state to command the rent. The case finds that, without these drainage works, the annual value of the land would be considerably diminished. [Stopped by the court.]

Lawrance and Horace Smith argued for the appellants.—All expenses to be deducted from the estimate must be ejusdem generis with those which are expressly mentioned in the section. The distinction between these drainage expenses, and repairs or insurance, is that the latter are expenses which a tenant would have to calculate upon as the cost of his holding, additional to the rent, whilst the former is a tax expressly imposed upon the landlord, and payable by him, whether his land is let or not, for the benefit, not of his own land only, but also for the whole district. The tenant's expenses, which are to be deducted from the estimate, vary according to the nature of the tenement and the land in each case, but the cost of drainage to each proprietor depends only upon the quantity of land which he owns. In the case of Reg. v. Vange (3 Q. B. 242), the appellant had received a grant of land in fee, subject to a liability to keep up an embankment which was necessary to maintain the lands in the neighbourhood in a state to command the rent from a tenant, or to be capable of occupation by the owner; it was held that the appellant was rateable to the poor for the full annual value of his land, without deduction on account of the expense of the embankment. [BLACKBURN, J.—The question there seems to have been whether the whole expense of the embankment ought to be deducted from the appellant's assessment, and not whether he had a right to have his proportion deducted.] Certain deductions were allowed in Reg. v. Hall Dare (5 B. & S. 785), but the reasons given by the court for allowing them do not apply to this case. The expenses here are analogous to the salary of a curate: (Reg. v. Sherford, L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 503.) The case of Rex. v. Adames (4 B. & Ad. 60) is distinguishable from this, in that the sewers' rate there considered was imposed only on some of the lands in the parish.

BLACKBURN, J.—I think this annual cost of draining these lands is one of the "expenses necessary to maintain them in a state to command the rent." From the facts found in the case, it appears that this farm is part of a wet fen, in order to cultivate which it is necessary to maintain these drainage works. By the local Act the cost of the works is apportioned among the landlords of the district, and the Duke of Portland pays his proportion for this estate. Why is not this an expense necessary to maintain the land in a state to command the rent? It is contended that all such expenses must be ejusdem generis with those of which the annual costs are expressly deducted in the section; but I am unable to perceive why this expense, which is necessary to keep off water, is not ejusdem generis with insurance, which is necessary to keep off fire. It is also said that repairs and insurance are expenses which vary in each particular estate, and that this is an expense which applies in the same way to all the neighbouring farms, which are compelled to club together to defray them in shares proportionate only to their extent. The Legislature has imposed this rate primarily upon the occupiers, but for certainty in the distribution of the burden the owners are liable. This is like the case of Rex v. Adames, and I do not see why these expenses should not be deducted from the assessment in the same way as the sewers rate was deducted there.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. The appellant's argument is, that unless they are incurred for tenant's rates or taxes, no expenses ought to be deducted from the estimated rental. The last part of the section, however, must also be considered; and we should deduct the other expenses upon the lands which are necessary to maintain them in a state to command the rent. These drainage expenses are clearly necessary to command the rent, and it is not material in my opinion whether they are paid by the tenant or the landlord. It seems to me that these expenses are certainly in principle ejusdem generis with those expressly mentioned.

KNARESBOROUGH UNION (apps.) v. PATELEY BRIDGE UNION (resps.)

Status of irremovability of a pauper—Breach of residence—Legal right to return.

In June 1868 a pauper sold off some of her furniture, and removed the rest to a spare room in the house of her brother-in-law, with whom she stayed off and on until Jan. 1869. She then went away, and stayed with other relations and at an infirmary in other unions until after September of that year, when she returned to the house of her brother-in-law as before. In May 1870 she took a cottage in the same union as that of the house in which she was staying, and put her furniture into it. In the following month she became chargeable to the union.

The quarter sessions found that the pauper had no legal right to return to the house of her brother-in-law after her departure in Jan. 1869; and therefore held that she had not acquired a status of irremovability in that union.

The court sent the case back, in order that the justices might find as a fact whether or not her brother-in-law intended, when she went away, to receive her again as before; and intimated that their judgment would depend upon that fact.

UPON appeal to the Epiphany Quarter Sessions for the West Riding of Yorkshire, held at Wakefield, on the 2nd Jan. 1871, against an order for the removal of Alice Slinger, a pauper, from the Pateley Bridge Union to the Knaresborough Union, the sessions confirmed the order, subject to the opinion of the court on the following case:—

At the trial of the appeal before the sessions it was proved that Alice Slinger, the pauper was

y settled in the Knaresborough Union. The lants then relied on a ground of appeal, ı alleged that Alice Slinger had gained a s of irremovability in the Pateley Bridge n by the requisite residence, actual or con- tive, of one year.

appeared that the pauper, who had previously ed in Leeds, gave up her house in that town me 1868, and sold off some of her furniture. he 22nd of the same month she came to the e of her brother-in-law, Mr. Hainsworth, who rmer residing in Bishop Thornton, a township n the Pateley Bridge union. The remainder r furniture was brought to his house, where s stowed away in a spare room which the er did not occupy, and she lived there till tmas 1868, except during several short ls, which she spent at the houses of her er, Mr. Stead, also of Bishop Thornton, and r. Ellis, of Clint, a township adjoining Bishop ton, and in the same union. As one of the sses said, "she moved about among her ons."

Jan. 1869 the pauper left Mr. Stead's, where vas then staying, and was absent from the for six weeks, on a visit to a nephew, who es at Knaresborough, in the appellant's union, e purpose of keeping house for him, in con- nce of his sister's temporary absence, but ned to Mr. Stead's, at Bishop Thornton, and ned in the union either with Mr. Hainsworth, ith Mr. Stead, or with Mr. Ellis, with rt interval (in which she paid a visit to a e relative at Harrogate, for the purpose of ng her in her confinement) till the end of mber. Owing to an accident she was taken e infirmary at Leeds, without the union, where mained five weeks, after which she stayed in s on a visit to her daughter for a fortnight. st with her daughter at Leeds she applied to mitted into the institution of the Sisters of y there, but did not succeed in her application, ltimately returned to the Pateley Bridge Union, first for a night or two to Mr. Ellis, of Clint, se neither Mr. Hainsworth nor Mr. Stead receive her just then, but afterwards living at Hainsworth's, and partly at Stead's, until l, 1870, when she took a cottage in the same , and removed her furniture to it. She had greement or legal title to live either at Mr. sworth's or Mr. Stead's, but it appeared that as allowed to live with them as a poor relation f charity. On the 20th June 1870, she became eable to the Pateley Bridge Union.

was not contended, on behalf of the respon- , that the pauper had not actually lived iently long in their union to give her a status removability by construction, if she were, r the circumstances, capable of possessing an animus revertendi as would give rise to nstructive residence during the periods of ce above set forth. But it was argued that auper, not having before May 1870 had any of her own, or place of residence in the to which she had a right to return, had not d there within the meaning of the Acts ing and defining irremovability, and could ave such animus revertendi thither.

e question for the opinion of the court is ner they were right. If the court should think they were, the order of sessions confirming the order of removal is to stand. If otherwise, both orders are to be quashed.

Maule, Q.C. and Waddy appeared for the respondents.—These absences of the pauper from the respondents' union were sufficient to constitute a break of residence fatal to her status of irremovability in that union. In Reg. v. Glossop Union (13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 672; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 227), it was held that a pauper's intention to return was immaterial when she had no residence of her own to return to. And in Reg. v. Stourbridge Union (34 L. J. 179, M. C.; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 542), a pauper left a parish in which he had occupied lodgings, intending to return as soon as his trade became better; he did not retain his lodgings, but left some old clothes there in the hands of the landlord, and in his absence his lodgings were not occupied, and he could have had them at any time on his return. After three months' absence he returned. It was held that the pauper was not constructively resident in the parish during the three months, and that the absence formed a break in the residence. [BLACKBURN, J.—The case finds that this pauper had no legal right to return, but it does not state whether her friends would receive her or not.]

Campbell Foster appeared for the appellants, but was not heard.

BLACKBURN, J.—It is not necessarily a legal right to return which constitutes a constructive residence sufficient to create a status of irremovability. It would be monstrous to say that an absence of this kind would be a break of residence, if not only this pauper herself, but the relations whom she left, entertained an intention that she should come back. If, however, her relations had at the time of her last departure in Jan. 1869 no intention to receive her again to live with them as before, she would come within the rule of Reg. v. Glossop Union and Reg. v. Stourbridge Union. On this point the case is ambiguous, and must go back to be restated. With this intimation the justices will probably be able to dispose of the matter.

SECOND COURT.

GILL (app.) v. BRIGHT (resp.)

Wine and Beerhouse Act Amendment Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 29), s. 15—Seizure and sale of liquors in suspected houses—Right of owner to be heard.

The Wine and Beerhouse Act Amendment Act 1870, sect. 15, gives a justice power upon information to grant a warrant to seize liquors in a suspected house, and provides that "any liquor seized in pursuance of this section shall be sold in such manner as two justices in petty sessions may direct." Two justices refused to allow the owner of some liquor, seized under this section, to be heard in explanation, or to cross-examine the informer, and ordered the liquor to be sold.

Held upon a case stated, that the words of the section implied that the owner should have an opportunity of showing cause why his liquor should not be sold.

THIS was a case stated by two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the county of Devon, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

On the 29th April 1871, Richard Bright, a police constable, deposed to an information which he laid before De Castro Fisher Lyne, Esq., a justice of the peace for the county of Devon, under the 33 & 34 Vict. c. 29, of which the following is a copy:

Devon to wit. The information and complaint of Richard Bright, of the parish of Stoke Gabriel, in the said county, police constable, taken this 29th April 1871, before the undersigned, one of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the county of Devon, who saith that he he had reasonable ground to believe that certain fermented, distilled, or excisable liquors or sweets are being unlawfully sold or kept for sale at certain premises in the occupation of one Thomas Gill, jun., at Churston Ferrers, in the said county, and he therefore prays that a warrant may be granted him to enter the said premises, and to search for and seize such liquors which there is reasonable ground to suppose are in such premises or place for unlawful sale contrary to law.

RICHARD BRIGHT.

Taken and sworn before me on the day and year first above written, at Paington, in the said county.

DE CASTRO F. LYNE.

The said De Castro Fisher Lyne, Esq., as such justice of the peace, in the exercise of the discretion given to him by the said Act, thereupon issued his warrant to the said Richard Bright, authorising him to enter and search the premises of the said Thomas Gill the younger, and seize any excisable liquors found thereupon. The said Richard Bright executed the warrant aforesaid on the 29th April last, and there found on the premises of the said Thomas Gill the younger, six pipes of cider, which he then seized and conveyed in safe custody.

On the 3rd May 1871, he, the said Richard Bright gave notice to the said Thomas Gill, the younger, under the hand and seal of Henry Studdy, Esq., one of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the said county, that he the said Richard Bright would apply for an order for the sale of the said cider on Wednesday, the 10th May 1871, at the court room, Brixham, in the said county, when and where the said Thomas Gill the younger might attend and show cause why the said cider should not be sold, as the law directs.

On the said 10th May, two justices of the peace in petty sessions assembled at the court room at Brixham aforesaid, when the said Richard Bright, hereinafter called the respondent, for whom Mr. F. R. Carter, solicitor, of Torquay, appeared, and the said Thomas Gill the younger, hereinafter called the appellant, for whom Mr. Baker, solicitor, of Newton Abbot, appeared, were present; and the respondent gave the following evidence.

Richard Bright, having been duly sworn, saith:

I am a police constable, living at Stoke Gabriel. I produce the information upon which I obtained the warrant against Thomas Gill the younger. I also produce the warrant. I went to Thomas Gill the younger on Saturday the 29th April 1871, at Churston Ferrers, the place indicated in the warrant. I saw Thomas Gill the younger there, and read the warrant to him. I went into the cellar and found five pipes of cider, which I believe were full. In a sixth pipe a tap was in, and some gallons drawn. There were there also four empty pipes. I went and hired horses and trucks and took the cider to Churston Court, Mr. Rendle's farm, where it now is. I apply to the magistrates for an order for the sale of the cider so seized, and to direct how the proceeds of the sale may be applied.

Whereupon the appellant's attorney proceeded to cross-examine the said respondent with a view to impeach the grounds on which the warrant had been granted, and also proposed to call witnesses for the appellant.

To this, objection was made by the respondent's attorney, and on referring to the Act under which they were proceeding, the justices allowed the objection of the respondent's attorney, and refused to permit the appellant's attorney to cross-examine the respondent, or to call his witnesses; and made the order directing a sale of the liquor seized pursuant to the Act, holding that the appellant by the statute had no locus standi in the court, and the summons or notice, served on him to appear and show cause why the cider so seized should not be sold, was unnecessary, and not contemplated or provided for by the Act.

Whereupon the appellant, being dissatisfied with this ruling as being erroneous in point of law applied to the justices pursuant to sect. 2 of the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, to state and sign a case setting forth the facts, and the grounds of such determination as aforesaid for the opinion of this court.

The questions for the opinion of the court are, whether in point of law the said justices were right in refusing to allow the appellant, on the application of the said respondent for an order to sell the cider so seized, to cross-examine the respondent on the facts on which the justice who granted the warrant had exercised his discretion, or for the alleged purpose of impeaching the proceedings taken by the justice who had granted the warrant aforesaid, or its execution; the justices considering that the cider having been seized under the warrant aforesaid, no further hearing of the case was contemplated by the Act, and that on the application by the respondent in petty sessions as aforesaid, they had no power delegated to them by the statute beyond that of making an order for the sale of the cider.

Collins argued for the appellant.—By the Wine and Beerhouse Act Amendment Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 29) s. 15, "Where an information on oath is made before any justice of the peace that there is reasonable ground for believing that any fermented, distilled, or exciseable liquors or sweets are being unlawfully sold or kept for sale at any premises or place for the retail whereat of fermented, distilled, or exciseable liquors or sweets no licence is in force, such justice may in his discretion grant a warrant under his hand to any superintendent, serjeant, or other officer or officers of police, by virtue whereof it shall be lawful for the officer or officers named in the warrant at any time or times within one month from the date thereof to enter, and, if need be, by force, the premises or place named in the warrant, and every part thereof, and to search for and seize any fermented, distilled, or exciseable liquors or sweets there found which there is reasonable ground to suppose are in such premises or place for the purpose of unlawful sale at such or any other premises or place; and if any person by himself, or by any other person acting by or with his direction, permission, or consent, refuse or neglect to admit to any part of any such premises or place any officer or person demanding admittance in pursuance of the provisions of this section, he shall be liable, upon summary conviction, to a penalty not exceeding 20*l.* Any liquor seized in pursuance of the provisions of this section shall be sold in such manner as two justices in petty sessions may direct, and the proceeds shall be applied in the same manner as penalties summarily imposed by the same justices for sale without a licence might be applied." Although this Act does not expressly say so, the last part of this section, the provision that liquor seized shall be sold, must be read as if words were interpolated to the effect "unless cause be shown to the contrary." Although silent on the subject, the Legislature could not have intended that in this matter the justices were to act contrary to the principles of natural justice. The object of the section seems to be to enable justices to seize liquors under suspicious circumstances, before the owner could conceal them; this object would be defeated if the owner had an opportunity to show cause before the warrant was issued. It cannot therefore be said that the proper time for the owner to be heard was at any other stage of the proceedings than that at which the justices here refused to hear the appellant. In Rex v. Simpson (10 Mod. 250), Parker, C.J., said: "It is more agreeable to the course of the common law that he (the defendant on a penal information) should be summoned." The cases of Reg. v. Benn (6 T. Rep. 198), and Rex v. the Chancellor of the University of Cambridge (1 Str. 557), are to the same effect. There is also a more recent case, Cooper v. the Wandsworth Board of Works (8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 278; 32 L. J. 185, C. P.), where, under the Metropolis Local Management Act 1855, s. 76, a district board of works ordered a house to be demolished, in default of notice by the owner before he commenced building; it was held that the board could not legally do this without giving to the owner an opportunity of showing cause why the house should not be demolished. Willes, J., said: "Every tribunal invested with the power of affecting the property of her Majesty's subjects, is bound to give the parties against whom the powers are to be exercised an opportunity of being heard. This rule is universally applicable." [Stopped by the court.]

No one appeared for the respondent.

LUSH, J.—It is a clear and established rule of law and justice, that no one shall be subject to a penalty either upon his person or property, without an opportunity of being heard, and I think that rule applies to this case. The words of the section necessarily imply that the owner should have an opportunity of showing that the evidence upon which the warrant had been granted was not true, or of giving an explanation of the suspicious circumstances, before the justices make an order to sell.

HANNEN, J., concurred.

CORE (app.) v. JAMES (resp.)

6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 37, s. 8—Conviction for using an adulterating ingredient in bread—Absence of guilty knowledge.

By 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 37, s. 8, no baker or other person who shall make bread for sale, nor any journeyman or other servant of any such baker or other person shall use any mixture or ingredient as therein provided, upon pain that every such person shall pay a penalty, and it shall be lawful for the magistrates to cause the offender's name to be published in a newspaper. By sect. 9 a penalty is imposed upon any person who shall knowingly sell any such ingredient mixed with meal or flour. By sects. 12 and 13 a penalty is imposed upon a baker having such ingredients on his premises, and a remedy is given to a master against his servant, if the former be convicted in consequence of the fault of his servant.

Held, upon a case stated by magistrates, that a baker could not be convicted under sect. 8 of using an adulterating ingredient in making bread, unless he or his servant had guilty knowledge of such use.

CASE stated under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

At a petty sessions holden at Bolton in and for the borough of Bolton in the county of Lancaster, on the 24th Dec. 1870, before three of Her Majesty's justices of the peace, acting in and for the said borough, James Core, the above-named appellant, was charged on an information laid by William James, the above-named respondent, being the inspector of nuisances and provisions to the local board of health for the borough of Bolton, "for that he the said appellant being a person making bread for sale beyond the limits mentioned and set forth in the Act of Parliament hereinafter mentioned, to wit, out of the city of London and the liberties thereof, and beyond the weekly Bills of Mortality, and ten miles of the Royal Exchange, did on the 16th Dec. instant in a certain shop in Newport-street, in Great Bolton aforesaid, use a certain mixture or ingredient, to wit, alum, in the making of certain bread for sale in such shop, such mixture or ingredient being other than and except such as are mentioned and enumerated in the second section of the statute made in the sixth and seventh years of the reign of his late Majesty King William the Fourth, chapter 37, intituled 'An Act to repeal the several Acts now in force relating to bread to be sold out of the city of London and the liberties thereof, and beyond the weekly Bills of Mortality, and ten miles of the Royal Exchange, and to provide other regulations for the making and sale of bread, and for preventing the adulteration of meal, flour, and bread beyond the limits aforesaid.'"

Evidence was given of the purchase of a loaf of bread in the shop of the appellant, and the appellant also admitted at the time that the loaf was his own making; the evidence in this respect being that when the loaf was bought on the 16th Dec., the witness who made the purchase said to appellant, "I want a two pound loaf of your own making." Further evidence was given that on analysis the said loaf contained 40·97 grains of alum. The appellant also produced his baker, who, being duly sworn, deposed that the bread sold on the 16th Dec. was made by him from a sack of flour in appellant's shop; that he, the baker, did not put any alum in the flour, and that none could have got in without his knowledge; that he was the only person who made the bread; that he made it purely from the flour; and that no other person worked on the premises but himself.

In cross-examination of the analyst by the appellant's attorney, the following were the chief answers elicited by the attorney's questions:

"If the bread was pure and the flour impure, I should say the bread was not the production of that flour. The loaf in question came from impure flour. The loaf might be impure from pure flour, as impurities might be added. I cannot say whether the alum was in the flour before the bread was made. It might have been in the flour. I can give no opinion as to whether it was in the flour or the bread first."

The appellant's attorney contended that the Act of Parliament being highly penal, the utmost stringency should be exercised in the inquiry, and if the evidence was equally reconcileable with innocence as with guilt, the appellant ought not to be convicted, and, further, that beyond the simple finding of the alum in the loaf of bread in question there was no evidence whatever even of a primâ facie character that the appellant had used the mixture, to wit, alum. And that the appellant was ready to give the name of the miller from whom he had, prior to the 16th Dec., the day of the alleged sale by him of the said loaf of bread, purchased wholesale ten sacks of flour, and produce a portion of the whole of what he had still on hand, so that the party really culpable might be reached, pursuant to the provisions of the 9th section of the Act of Parliament under which the appellant was sought to be convicted. The appellant's attorney further contended that the appellant was not a practical baker, and had only recently given up the trade of a tailor, and never took any part whatever in the making of bread.

The justices were of opinion that the appellant did use a certain mixture or ingredient, to wit, alum, in the making of the said bread for sale in such shop, and convicted the appellant in the sum of 5*l.* and costs. The said appellant being dissatisfied with this decision, as being erroneous in point of law, made application in writing within three days to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and grounds of such determination for the opinion thereon of her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench at Westminster; and the said appellant having duly entered into the recognizances required by the said statute, the justices stated the following questions for the consideration of the Court of Queen's Bench:—

1. Whether, supposing the said alum to have been mixed in the said flour previous to the purchase thereof by the appellant, the said appellant was entitled to his acquittal on the ground that he did not mix the said alum in the said flour.

2. Whether the fact of the said loaf of bread being upon the appellant's premises, admitted to be his own making — that is to say, by the appellant admitting to the officer, Ratcliffe, that the bread was of his own making—and containing alum mixed in the bread, was sufficient to ground a conviction "for using a certain mixture or ingredient, to wit, alum in the making of such bread."

The case had, at a previous hearing, been sent back to the justices in order that they should find as a fact whether the appellant knew that alum had been used in making this bread.

The justices amended the case as follows:—

"At the hearing of the case in question no evidence was adduced tending to prove the knowledge of the appellant that alum was used in the bread in question, and we did not find that appellant knew that alum was used in such bread."
